CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE FORTY-FOURTH CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, December 4, 1876.

The first Monday of December being the day prescribed by the Constitution of the United States for the annual meeting of Congress, the second session of the Forty-fourth Congress commenced this day. The Senators assembled in the Senate Chamber at the Capitol, in the city of Washington.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (THOMAS W. FERRY, of Michigan) called the Senate to order at twelve o'clock m., there being a quorum of Senators present.

PRAYER.

Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D., Chaplain to the Senate, offered the following prayer:

O, Thou, Almighty and Everlasting God, in Whom we live, and move, and have our being, we come here together this day to lift up to Thee our united prayer in worship and adoration. We come to thank Thee for the kindness of that providence which has gone over us and over all the land during the months that are past. We thank Thee that in Thy goodness Thou hast preserved the lives of so many of these, Thy servants, and brought them hither again to greet each other and to resume their serious labors in this place. We thank Thee for that great measure of mercy which Thou hast vouchsafed to our country during this centennial year. We thank Thee for the success of those wonderful arrangements by which it has been commemorated. We thank Thee that in the midst of a momentous political contest so much of right sense and good order has prevailed among the people. And we come to confess and to deplore before Thee and before the nations whatever of evil, in any quarter or upon any side, may have been in the violation or abuse of the great franchise of freemen. And now that we and this whole nation are in the midst of this vital business, which has yet to be concluded, we humbly entreat Thee to remember all those who have any part to take in the solemn juncture of our national affairs.

We beseech Thee to remember and bless Thy servant, the President of the United States, and his Cabinet; Thy servants, the officers and members of the Congress now convened; the judges and magistrates of the land; the officers and men of the Army and Navy; and all those who have any rule or authority to bear over us.

O, we beseech Thee, grant to these, Thy servants, special wisdom and understanding, that they may be able to determine and to do that which is right in accordance with Thy most gracious will and in furtherance of the welfare of all the people. O, Thou Father of Light, may they see light in Thy light. O, Thou Author of all Peace, suffer us not for our sins to fall into confusion, but breathe peace and stability over all the land. And forasmuch as the members of this Congress first came together under the shadows that yet lingered about these halls for the death of him who once presided here, and forasmuch as they parted away in the anticipation of the same sad event for him who presided yonder, and whose memory yet claims our reverent attention, we entreat Thee, O Lord, that these united voices, speaking from the grave, may give tender counsel to all the living; and we beseech Thee that there may be a continual effort to understand and to know the way of right, and truth, and justice.

O, Thou God of our fathers, keeping covenant and mercy for thousands of them that love Thee and obey Thy law, forsake us not, we beseech Thee, before the eyes of all the nations in such a time as this; but do Thou be graciously pleased to preside over us in all our affairs, and do not, for any single instant, let go Thy care upon us. Through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

SWEARING IN OF SENATORS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the credentials of Jerome B. Chaffee, elected by the Legislature of the State of Colorado a Senator from that State; which were read.

He also presented the credentials of Henry M. Teller, elected by the Legislature of the State of Colorado a Senator from that State; which were read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senators-elect who are present will please advance to the desk and take the constitutional oath.

Messrs. Chaffee and Teller advanced to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands there are other Senators-elect present, who will please advance to the desk to be sworn at the same time.

James G. Blaine (whose credentials of appointment by the governor of Maine as Senator from that State to fill until the next meeting of the Legislature the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Lot M. Morrill were presented at the last session) advanced to the desk.

The oaths prescribed by law having been administered by the President pro tempore to Messrs. BLAINE, CHAFFEE, and TELLER, they took their seats in the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS presented the credentials of Samuel Price, appointed by the governor of the State of West Virginia a Senator from that State to fill, until the next meeting of the Legislature thereof, the vacancy caused by the death of Allen T. Caperton.

The credentials were read; and, the oaths prescribed by law having been administered to Mr. PRICE, he took his seat in the Senate.

CLASSIFICATION OF COLORADO SENATORS.

Mr. HITCHCOCK submitted the following resolution and order; which were considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Senate now proceed to ascertain the classes to which the Senators from the State of Colorado shall be assigned, in conformity with the resolution of the 14th of May, 1789, and as the Constitution requires—

Ordered, That the Secretary put into the ballot-box two papers of equal size, one of which shall be numbered two and the other shall be a blank. Each of the Senators of the State of Colorado shall draw out one paper, and the Senator who shall draw the paper numbered two shall be inserted in the class of Senators whose term of service will expire the third day of March, 1879.

That the Secretary then put into the ballot-box two papers of equal size, one of which shall be numbered one and the other shall be numbered three. The other Senator shall draw out one paper. If the paper drawn be numbered one the Senator shall be inserted in the class of Senators whose terms of service will expire the 3d day of March, 1877, and if the paper drawn be numbered three the Senator shall be inserted in the class of Senators whose terms of service will expire the 3d day of March, 1881.

The Secretary having put into the ballot-box two papers, one numbered two and the other a blank, Mr. CHAFFEE drew the paper numbered two, and is accordingly in the class of Senators whose terms of service will expire on the 3d day of March 1879.

The Secretary having then put into the ballot-box two papers, one numbered one and the other numbered three, Mr. TELLER drew the paper numbered one, and is accordingly in the class of Senators whose terms of service will expire on the 3d day of March, 1877.

NOTIFICATION TO THE HOUSE.

Mr. ANTHONY offered the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled and that the Senate is ready to proceed to business.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. ANTHONY offered the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of two members be appointed to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives, to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House is assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication that he may be pleased to make.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the committee on the part of the Senate; and Messrs. ANTHONY and MCCREERY were appointed.

HOUR OF MEETING.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, it was Ordered, That the hour of the daily meeting of the Senate be twelve o'clock meridian until otherwise ordered.

RECESS.

Mr. THURMAN, (at twelve o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate take a recess for three-quarters of an hour.

The motion was agreed to; and at the expiration of the recess (at one o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the Senate re-assembled.

ANNUAL REPORTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the report of the Secretary of the Senate, communicating, in obedience to law, a statement of the receipts and expenditures of the Senate from July 1, 1875, to June 30, 1876; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate the annual report of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, communicating, in obedience to law, a statement of property belonging to the United States in his possession December 4, 1876; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate the report of the clerk of the Court of Claims, communicating, in obedience to law, a statement of all judgments rendered by that court for the year ending December 4, 1876; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

VOTERS IN CERTAIN STATES—ELIGIBILITY OF ELECTORS.

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted the following resolutions; which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

Whereas it is provided in the second section of the fourteenth article of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States that "Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State;" and

Whereas it is alleged that in several of the States, and particularly in the States of South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Louisiana, and Mississippi, the right of male inhabitants of said States, respectively, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, to vote at the late elections of the electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, and for Representatives in Congress, and for the executive and judicial officers of such States, and for members of the Legislatures thereof, has been denied or greatly abridged: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections, when appointed, be and it hereby is instructed to inquire and report as soon as may be—

1. Whether in any of the elections named in said amendment, in said States, in the years 1875 or 1876, the right of any portion of such inhabitants and citizens to vote as aforesaid has been in any wise denied or abridged.

2. To what extent such denial or abridgment has been carried.

3. By what means such denial or abridgment has been accomplished.

4. By whom has such denial or abridgment been effected.

5. With what motives and for what purposes has such denial or abridgment been carried on.

6. By what authority or pretended authority has such denial or abridgment been exercised.

Resolved further, That the said committee have power to employ such number of stenographers as shall be needful, and to send for persons and papers, and have leave to sit during the sessions of the Senate, and to appoint subcommittees with full power to make the inquiries aforesaid, and report the same to the committee.

Resolved further, That said committee, in order to the more speedy performance of its duties, have power to provide for the taking of affidavits on the subjects aforesaid before any officer authorized by the laws of the United States to take affidavits; and to receive and consider the same.

Resolved further, That the said committee be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire into the eligibility to office under the Constitution of the United States of any persons alleged to have been ineligible on the 7th day of November last, or to be ineligible as electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, to whom certificates of election have been or shall be issued by the executive authority of any State as such electors, and whether the appointment of electors, or those claiming to be such in any of the States, has been made either by force, fraud, or other means otherwise than in conformity with the Constitution and laws of the United States and the laws of the respective States; and whether any such appointment or action of any such elector has been in anywise unconstitutionally or unlawfully interfered with; and to inquire and report whether Congress has any constitutional power, and, if so, what, and the extent thereof, in respect of the appointment of, or action of, electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, or over returns or certificates of votes of such electors; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, and to employ a stenographer, and have leave to sit during the session of the Senate.

PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION.

Mr. INGALLS. I offer a joint resolution, and ask that it be read, laid on the table, and printed.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 27) recommending a convention to revise and amend the Constitution of the United States; which was read twice, and ordered to lie on the table and be printed. It is as follows:

Whereas article 5 of the Constitution empowers Congress to call a convention for proposing amendments to the Constitution, on the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States; and whereas it is apparent that there are important defects in the system of the Federal Government which render the situation of the United States at this time delicate and critical, calling for an exertion of the combined virtue and wisdom of all the people: Therefore,

Be it resolved, &c., 1. That in the opinion of Congress a convention of delegates from the several States should be held for the sole and express purpose of revising the Constitution of the United States and reporting such alterations and amendments in the nature of an entire instrument as shall, when ratified as provided in said article 5, render the Federal Constitution adequate to the exigencies of the Government and the preservation and support of the Union.

2. That in the opinion of Congress each State should be represented in said convention by as many delegates as it is entitled to Senators and Representatives in Congress; two of said delegates from each State to be chosen by the Legislature thereof, and one to be elected from each congressional district by the qualified voters thereof, at such time and places as the Legislature may prescribe; and that no person holding an office of honor, trust, or profit under any State or under the United States should be eligible as a delegate to said convention.

3. That in the opinion of Congress said convention should be held at Columbus, in the State of Ohio, on the second Monday in May, 1877, and sit without unnecessary interruption till its deliberations are concluded.

4. That in the opinion of Congress the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court should be the presiding officer of said convention, and that each delegate should receive compensation at the rate of $20 per day, with mileage at the rate of twenty cents for each mile necessarily traveled in going to and returning from the place of meeting, and that all the expenses of said convention should be defrayed from the Treasury of the United States.

5. That in the opinion of Congress the revised and amended Constitution should be reported to the President of the United States upon the adjournment of said convention, and that it should thereupon immediately be submitted by the President to a convention of delegates chosen in each State by the people thereof, under the recommendation of its Legislature, for their assent and ratification.

6. That it is recommended to the Legislatures of the several States of the Union to apply to Congress without delay to call a convention as aforesaid, as provided in article 5 of the Constitution.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at one o'clock and thirteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 4, 1876.

This being the day designated by the Constitution for the meeting of Congress, the members of the House of Representatives of the Forty-fourth Congress assembled in their Hall for their second session.

At twelve o'clock m. the Clerk, Hon. GEORGE M. ADAMS, called the House to order in the following words:

The time for the meeting of the second session of the Forty-fourth Congress having arrived, the Speaker of the House having since the last session of Congress departed this life, the Clerk, in conformity with the rules of the House, now requests the House to be in order. If there be no objection, the roll will be called to ascertain whether there be a quorum of members in attendance.

The CLERK. Two hundred and fourty-eight members have answered to their names, more than a quorum to transact business, and the Clerk is now prepared to receive nominations for the office of Speaker.

Mr. HOLMAN. I offer the following memorandum and move its adoption by the House.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire, Mr. Clerk, to have entered the reason for the absence of my colleague, Mr. CLARKE, who, as I am informed by telegram, is detained at home by serious illness in his family.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move the adoption of the order which I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. BANKS. I rise to a question of privilege, Mr. Clerk. I hold the certificate of the election of the member from the State of Colorado, which State was admitted——

Mr. WIKE. I object.

Mr. BANKS. It is a question of privilege.

Mr. HOLMAN. The highest privilege is the organization of this House by the election of a Speaker.

The CLERK. The gentleman from Indiana was recognized by the Clerk to submit a motion.

Mr. BANKS. The motion I have made is of higher privilege than the one in reference to the organization of the House.

Mr. WIKE. I object.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to say that the right of a member to vote is the highest possible privilege which can be presented to the House. The election of Speaker is a secondary matter which can be determined only after the right of members to vote has been decided. The prima facie right of a member, that upon which we were all admitted, is the certificate of the governor of a State.

Mr. WIKE. I object.

Mr. BANKS. I send the credential of the member from Colorado——

Mr. COX. There is nobody to administer the oath to the member from Colorado until we organize by the election of a Speaker.

Mr. BANKS. The oath can be administered by any member of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. The administration of the oath is not necessary. The statute prescribes in reference to the proceedings in the organization of the House the manner in which the roll of members shall be made out, and who shall participate in the organization of the House. Under that law the Clerk of Congress has prepared the roll of members which has just been called, and he has announced the presence of a quorum for the transaction of business. I therefore submit, Mr. Clerk, that the highest step in the progress of the House at this moment is its complete organization, which is effected, upon the basis of the roll made out in pursuance of law, by the election of Speaker. No gentleman is prejudiced by this action.

Mr. BANKS. Yes; he loses his vote.

Mr. HOLMAN. But he could not be placed on the roll of the House in conformity with law. The Clerk could not place him there. The law does not authorize the placing of a gentleman on the roll representing a State not represented in the preceding Congress.

Mr. BANKS. I desire the privilege of saying, in reply to the gentleman from Indiana, that the election of a Speaker, which is necessary to the completion of the organization of the House, is a matter secondary to the determination of who is to participate in the vote upon that election. Now, sir, the making up of the roll which the Clerk has read, and to which members have responded when their names were called, is, as far as the Clerk is concerned, a mere ministerial duty. He receives the certificates of governors of States as to the election of members, and upon the prima facie evidence he placed the names upon the roll. That does not prevent the House from changing it, if in the intermediate time another member should be elected.

Now, sir, I think there are half a dozen members here from different States of the Union whose seats are uncontested, about which no question can be made, who are ready to be sworn. The executive officers of the States, according to the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the several States, have certified to their election; and they should not be deprived of their right to vote in this case. But I say to the gentleman from Indiana that in the history of this House he cannot find a single instance where a certificate of a governor of a State has been presented to the House certifying to the proper and legal election of a member, and that election has been undisputed, that that certificate has not been received as prima facie evidence of this election and he has not been permitted to vote.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts one question: What evidence have we of Colorado being a State?

Mr. BANKS. The President has proclaimed it a State. I hold the President's proclamation in my hand. I ask that the credentials of the Representative elected from that State shall be received; and I would ask that the oldest member of the House should administer the oath to him, and also to other members who have credentials and who have not been sworn.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Clerk, the administration of the oath is not a prerequisite of the right to vote in the election of Speaker. That is not a prerequisite.

Mr. BANKS. I do not think it is.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts himself [Mr. BANKS] was not sworn as a member before he voted in the organization of the present House. The only prerequisite to the act of electing a Speaker of the House is the preparation of the roll under the law. And the gentleman from Massachusetts must bear in mind that since the enactment of the present law upon the subject declaring who shall be placed upon that roll, and providing in effect that the persons so placed upon the roll shall alone participate in the organization of the House, the question to which he has referred has never arisen.

There is at present no House organized. There is no person to determine whether the gentleman from Colorado is entitled to have his name placed upon the roll or not. The embarrassment in the way is that the law does not provide for a case such as that of Colorado. The Clerk has not the right to place upon the roll the name of the gentleman claiming to represent Colorado; but he is not prejudiced, except in the particular act of the organization of the House.

Mr. BANKS. And that is the most important act of all. The law, Mr. Clerk——

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. BANKS. I trust the gentleman will permit me one remark in reply.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well.

Mr. BANKS. The law to which the gentleman from Indiana refers is for the instruction of the Clerk of the House alone, in the performance of a ministerial duty. It is for his instruction alone. He can do nothing except what the law specifies and provides he may do. But the Constitution of the United States gives to this House the power to determine who are its members and who shall vote on this very question of the election of Speaker. Now, sir, there is not a precedent in the history of this House—I venture to say there is not one single precedent, where the certificate of the governor of a State has been presented, certifying to the election of a member of this House, there being no dispute and no contest in regard to it, that it has not been received.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him?

Mr. BANKS. In a moment. In this case it is essential that the member presenting the certificate should vote in what may be the most important act of the session. I will now hear the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. I beg to remind the gentleman that in the New Jersey case in 1838 those holding the certificates were not admitted. In that case the members had received certificates from the proper officer of the State.

Mr. BANKS. The gentleman from New Jersey is mistaken, I think, upon that point. A part of the members-elect from the State of New Jersey had the governor's certificate and a part of the members had certificates from the secretary of the State. The governor who had given the certificates stated in an argument which was presented to the House of Representatives that he regretted that under the laws of the State of New Jersey he was not able to do justice to the contestants by giving them certificates.

Mr. WADDELL. Allow me to correct the gentleman from Massachusetts in regard to what has been the former practice of this House. I will state what occurred in my own case. I came here with a certificate from the governor of the State of North Carolina to the Forty-second Congress, and when I went up to be sworn in, Mr. Maynard, of Tennessee, objected and I was made to stand aside.

Mr. BANKS. That was on account of disabilities.

The CLERK. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WIKE. Mr. Clerk——

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] must perceive that the precedents to which he refers have no application to the present law and the present rule of the House.

Mr. COX. I call for the reading of the resolution now pending.

Mr. WIKE. What is before the House?

The CLERK. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] submitted a resolution, which has not yet been read.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before it is read——

Mr. WIKE. I call for the reading of the resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before it is read I desire to submit two points in reply to what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] has said.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to have it stated by the Clerk that I have presented a question of privilege involving the right of a member of this House to take part in its organization.

The CLERK. The RECORD will show what the gentleman from Massachusetts has submitted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to have read the present rule of procedure in the organization of this House. I will then ascertain the views of the House, so far as one member can do so, by calling the previous question on the resolution which I have submitted. I ask that so much of the thirty-first section of the Revised Statutes as I have marked be now read, together with that portion of the rules of this House relating to the subject.

The following was read:

> In making up of said roll, he is directed to place thereon the names of all persons claiming seats as Representatives-elect from States which were represented in the next preceding Congress, and of such persons only, and whose credentials show that they were regularly elected in accordance with the laws of their States respectively, or the laws of the United States.—(Laws Second Session Thirty-ninth Congress, Session Laws, page 28.) Having ascertained whether or not a quorum is present, he announces the fact to the House. If a quorum shall have answered, it is then usual for some member to move "that the House do now proceed to the election of a Speaker viva voce."

Mr. HOLMAN. It will be perceived from these provisions, the one of the statutes found as section 31 of the present Revised Statutes, and the other a rule of this House, that, avoiding the very question which the gentleman from Massachusetts now seeks to raise, it is made clearly the duty of the Clerk to proceed as he has done in conformity with that statute and with that rule of the House in making up the roll. I therefore call the previous question on the pending resolution.

Mr. BANKS. I trust the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. COX. I call for the reading of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The CLERK. The Clerk begs to state the condition of the two questions submitted here that the House may properly understand them. The gentleman from Indiana submitted a resolution which has not yet been read.

Mr. WIKE. I claim the floor, Mr. Clerk.

The CLERK. By what right?

Mr. WIKE. I submit to the Clerk the question whether I have the floor or not?

The CLERK. The Clerk does not understand that the gentleman is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WIKE. I want to state my understanding of the question. I rise here to object to the introduction of Colorado as a State into the Union.

The CLERK. The Clerk does not understand that that question is now pending,

Mr. WIKE. I want to make my objection in time.

The CLERK. The Clerk will state the question before the House. When it was announced by the Clerk that a quorum had answered to their names and the Clerk was ready to receive any motion which the House might be pleased to entertain, the gentleman from Indiana rose and submitted a resolution, which has not yet been read. Pending that question, the gentleman from Massachusetts arose to a question of privilege and presented the certificate of a member-elect to the present Congress. The House must perceive that it is impossible for the Clerk to make any decision upon any question of privilege or as to which question shall take precedence, that of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] or that of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] until the Clerk and the House have heard read the resolution of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] That resolution will now be read:

The resolution was read, as follows:

The House being informed that since its last adjournment Hon. Michael C. Kerr, who at the commencement of the present Congress was elected Speaker of the House, has departed this life, creating a vacancy in the office of Speaker, it is therefore ordered that the House do now proceed to the election of a Speaker viva voce.

Mr. HOLMAN. This being a question of the highest privilege, and a necessary result of proceedings already had, the reading of the roll made out in conformity to law, it not being contended but what every gentleman entitled by virtue of the present law to have his name placed on the roll has had his name placed on that roll, I call the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. BANKS. I hope the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will allow me to say only this, that the law to which he refers concerns only the opening of a new Congress; it has nothing to do with the case now presented. Even if it had it is only an instruction to the Clerk in regard to his performance of a ministerial duty. The Constitution of the United States gives to a man who has the certificate of his election from the governor of the State which he has been chosen to represent—the Constitution gives to him, until the question is decided otherwise, the prima facie right to vote upon this very question of the organization of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not the gentleman see that it is far better to act under the law and the rule of the House in these preliminary proceedings than to go into questions upon which there may be diversity of opinion? I have, myself, no doubt that the gentleman referred to as representing the new State of Colorado is entitled to be sworn in as a member of this House. But under the law he is not entitled to have his name placed on this roll, and the persons whose names are placed on this roll are those who are entitled to take part in the election of Speaker of this House.

Mr. BANKS. The House can direct that his name shall be placed on the roll.

Mr. HOLMAN. I insist upon the previous question.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to say, Mr. Clerk——

Mr. WILLIS and others called for the regular order.

Mr. FRYE. I rise to a question of privilege.

The CLERK. What question of privilege?

Mr. FRYE. I hold in my hand the certificate of the governor of the State of Maine of the election of Edwin Flye in place of JAMES G. BLAINE, resigned.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I rise to a question of order. Until the pending question is disposed of, that involved in the resolution submitted by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] any other proposition is clearly out of order. The organization of the House is a question of the highest privilege, and this is the question now pending.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Clerk, this is a proposition to proceed to the election of a Speaker. Under the rule read at the instance of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] the case of Edwin Flye clearly demands that his name should be placed upon the roll, and that he be permitted to vote upon the question of the election of Speaker. I therefore ask that the name of that gentleman may be placed on the roll.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. There are four or five cases in which since the last session of this Congress elections have been held to fill vacancies. I propose that the ordinary course of procedure of this House from time immemorial shall be followed in those cases. We should first elect a Speaker, commencing as it were de novo, according to the roll made up by the Clerk under the law, from the credentials filed in his office. After the Speaker shall have been elected, his first duty will be to swear in those members who have the proper credentials and present themselves at the Clerk's desk for that purpose. It does appear to me that this attempt to interpose objections and dilatory proceedings—I do not accuse gentlemen of any such intention, but such is the effect of their propositions—before we organize the House by the election of a Speaker, is, to say the least, unnecessary and inopportune. I suggest therefore that if those gentlemen will wait twenty minutes or a half an hour, until we have organized the House, these other proceedings will be clearly in order. But taking precedence of all other questions, as a matter of the highest privilege, is the organization of this House. We now have no Speaker, no properly constituted official organ or presiding officer of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must insist upon my demand for the previous question. The Clerk has made up the roll in conformity to law from the data furnished to him from the several States of the Union. There is no pretense to the contrary. If the question was raised whether the Clerk had properly performed his duty, I admit that it would be a very grave question. But no such question is raised. He has made up the roll according to law, upon official documents furnished to him and on file in his office. I insist upon the previous question.

Mr. FRYE. The Clerk has——

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. BANKS. I want the regular order.

The CLERK. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] demand the previous question?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have been demanding the previous question with great patience.

Mr. BANKS. I rise to a question of order. I submit that this question should be submitted to the House. The Clerk cannot decide that a member, with a certificate of his State government that he is a member, has not a right to vote on this question of the choice of Speaker. Mr. Clerk, you should submit the question to the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not the gentleman from Massachusetts know very well that, since the unhappy contest in the opening of the Thirty-sixth Congress, the present rule, conferring upon the Clerk the power to administer the rules of the House, has operated with admirable effect in the public interest and in maintaining the peace and order of this body? On an occasion like this, the Clerk administers the rules as the Speaker would administer them. I therefore call upon him to administer that rule which gives effect to the demand for the previous question.

Mr. FRYE. One moment——

The CLERK. The gentleman from Massachusetts has risen to a question of order. Questions of order must be decided, as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] very well understands, without debate.

Mr. FRYE. I wish to say that the question of order——

The CLERK. Questions of order are not debatable. The point of order raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts is, as the Clerk understands, the first thing under consideration. That point was that the Clerk had no right to decide this question. For the information of the House, the Clerk begs to call attention to Rule 146, which reads as follows:

All elections of officers of the House, including the Speaker, shall be conducted in accordance with these rules, so far as the same are applicable; and, pending the election of a Speaker, the Clerk shall preserve order and decorum, and shall decide all questions of order that may arise, subject to appeal to the House.

Mr. BANKS. I am perfectly aware of that rule. I remember very well the fact that at the opening of a previous Congress the Clerk presided for nine weeks. But I understood the position of the gentleman to be that there was to be no decision upon the question I made, and that it was not to be submitted to the House in such a way that the House could pass its judgment upon it. If the Clerk decides the question, then I am perfectly satisfied; for upon his decision we can take an appeal and thus have a vote of the House.

The CLERK. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will allow, the Clerk will say that he understands it to be his duty to decide these questions of order as they may arise.

Mr. BANKS. Yes, sir.

The CLERK. The gentleman from Indiana has submitted a resolution, pending which the gentleman from Massachusetts rose to a question of privilege. The Clerk is of opinion that the resolution submitted by the gentleman from Indiana, looking to the organization of the House, is also a question of privilege, and that it takes precedence of the question of privilege submitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts. These are, however, questions which the House can decide for itself. If any member is dissatisfied with the ruling of the Clerk in this regard, he can of course appeal to the House.

Mr. BANKS. I make that appeal on the ground that the right of a member to participate in this election is a question of higher privilege than the election of Speaker.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is not a question higher than the law or the rules of the House.

Mr. COX. I move to lay the appeal on the table. This motion, I am aware, is not debatable; but I would like to say one word upon it.

Several members objected.

The CLERK. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] appeals from the decision just made, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] moves to lay that appeal on the table. The question will be upon laying on the table the appeal taken by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BANKS, and Mr. TOWNSEND of New York, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask that the Clerk will again state the question.

The CLERK. Before the roll-call begins the Clerk begs to state again the question under consideration. It has been ruled by the Clerk that the motion submitted by the gentleman from Indiana relating to the organization of the House is a question of privilege, and that it takes precedence of the questions of privilege raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] respectively. From that decision the gentleman from Massachusetts appeals; and the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] moves to lay the appeal upon the table. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Before the vote is taken I ask for the enforcement of the rule in regard to admission to the floor, so that all persons who are not entitled to the privilege of the floor shall be excluded.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

The CLERK. For the information of persons who may be upon the floor without authority, the rule in reference to admission to the floor will be read.

Mr. STONE. And let the rule be enforced.

The CLERK. The Clerk will now read the one hundred and thirty-fourth rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

No person except members of the Senate, their secretary, heads of Departments, the President's Private Secretary, foreign ministers, the governor for the time being of any State, Senators and Representatives elect, judges of the Supreme Court of the United States and of the Court of Claims, and such persons as have by name received the thanks of Congress—March 15, 1867—shall be admitted within the Hall of the House of Representatives—March 19, 1860—or any of the rooms upon the same floor or leading into the same—March 2, 1865; provided that the ex-members of Congress who are not interested in any claim pending before Congress, and shall so register themselves, may also be admitted within the Hall of the House; and no persons except those herein specified shall at any time be admitted to the floor of the House.—March 15, 1867.

Mr. STONE. I demand the enforcement of that rule before the roll-call proceeds.

The CLERK. Persons not entitled to the privilege of the floor are requested to retire. The Doorkeeper has been requested to remove all such persons, but the Clerk himself sees a number of persons present who are not entitled to the privilege of the floor, and the roll-call will not be proceeded with until they retire.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to inquire of the Clerk whether his ruling includes the motion of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] as well as the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS?]

The CLERK. The pending question is on the motion to lay on the table the appeal from the decision of the Clerk, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 165, nays 84, not voting 37; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Ainsworth, Anderson, Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, John H. Bagley, jr., Banning, Beebe, Bell, Blackburn, Bland, Bliss, Blount, Boone, Bradford, John Young Brown, Buckner, Samuel D. Burchard, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. Caldwell, Candler, Cate, Caulfield, Chapin, John B. NOT VOTING—Messrs. William H. Baker, Bass, Bright, Campbell, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, Dobbins, Garfield, Hale, Hays, Hendee, Goldsmith W. Hewitt, Hoge, Hubbell, Kelley, Levy, Lewis, McDill, McFarland, Nash, Platt, Purman, Rainey, Randall, Schleicher, Schumaker, Sinnickson, Smalls, William E. Smith, Stowell, Thornburgh, Wait, Ward, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Wigginton, and Willard—37.

So the appeal was laid on the table.

During the vote,

Mr. LUTTRELL stated that his colleague [Mr. WIGGINTON] was detained at home by sickness in his family.

Mr. COX. I move to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I object.

The reading of the roll was concluded.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof Mr. HOLMAN's resolution was adopted.

ELECTION OF SPEAKER.

Mr. COX. I propose the name of Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL, of the third district of Pennsylvania, as Speaker of this House.

Mr. McCRARY. I place in nomination Hon. JAMES A. GARFIELD, of the nineteenth district of Ohio.

The CLERK. There being no further nominations, the Clerk requests that Mr. CLYMER of Pennsylvania, Mr. BANNING of Ohio, Mr. BANKS of Massachusetts, and Mr. WILSON of Iowa, act as tellers, and the tellers will please take their places.

The House then proceeded to vote viva voce for Speaker, with the following result; which was announced by Mr. CLYMER on behalf of the tellers:

Whole number of votes cast, 246; necessary to a choice, 114; of which—

SAMUEL J. RANDALL received	162
JAMES A. GARFIELD received	82
CHARLES G. WILLIAMS received	1
W. R. MORRISON received	1
GEORGE F. HOAR received	1

The following is the vote in detail:

For Mr. Randall—Messrs. Abbott, Ainsworth, Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, John H. Bagley, jr., Banning, Beebe, Bell, Blackburn, Bland, Bliss, Blount, Boone, Bradford, John Young Brown, Buckner, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. Caldwell, Candler, Cate, Caulfield, Chapin, John B. For Charles G. Williams—Mr. Magoon—1.

For George F. Hoar—Mr. Seelye—1.

For William R. Morrison—Mr. Potter—1.

The Clerk announced that SAMUEL J. RANDALL, one of the Representatives from the State of Pennsylvania, having received a majority of all the votes given, was duly elected Speaker of the House of Representatives for the remainder of the Forty-fourth Congress.

Mr. COX, of New York, and Mr. McCRARY, of Iowa, having been nominated by the Clerk for that purpose, conducted Mr. RANDALL to the chair amid applause, when he addressed the House as follows:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

Called to this position because of the death of the late Speaker, Mr. Kerr, of Indiana, I only express the universal sentiment in saying that he was a good and great man, whose public and private life was characterized by purity, patriotism, and unswerving integrity.

Nobody can more completely appreciate than I do the high honor of presiding over the deliberations of the Representatives of the American people, and for this mark of your esteem and confidence I return my profound and heart-felt acknowledgments.

In the discharge of the important duties confided to me I shall endeavor to be absolutely fair and impartial. While enforcing the rules and upholding the constitutional prerogatives of this body I shall at the same time protect each and every member in the rights and privileges to which he may justly be entitled.

In the exercise of the parliamentary powers of the Chair it will be my duty and my pleasure to give true expression in the appointment of committees to the opinions and wishes of the House upon every question presented, believing myself, as I really am, no more than the voice of the House itself.

We stand in the presence of events which strain and test to the last degree our form of government. Our liberties, consecrated by so many sacrifices in the past and preserved amid the rejoicings of an exultant people to our centennial anniversary as one among the nations of the earth, must be maintained at every hazard. [Loud applause.] The people look confidently to your moderation, to your patient, calm, and firm judgment, to your wisdom in this time fraught with so much peril. Let us not, I beseech you, disappoint their just expectations and their keen sense of right, but by unceasing vigilance let us prevent even the slightest departure from the Constitution and the laws, forgetting in the moment of difficulty that we are the adherents of party and only remembering that we are American citizens with a country to save which may be lost if unauthorized and unconstitutional acts of executive officers be not frowned down at once with relentless and unsparing condemnation. [Great applause.]

I am now ready to take the oath of office, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will be kind enough to administer it.

Mr. HOLMAN then administered to the Speaker-elect the oath prescribed by law.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate was announced; when Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, said: I am directed by the Senate to inform the House that a quorum of the Senate has assembled and that the Senate is ready to proceed to business; also that a committee has been appointed by the Senate to join such committee as may be appointed by the House to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House has assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication that he may be pleased to make, and that Mr. ANTHONY and Mr. MCCREERY have been appointed as such committee on behalf of the Senate.

SWEARING IN OF MEMBERS.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I rise to a question of privilege. I move that the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. Alexander H. Stephens, a member of this House, be now sworn in.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I request that, for reasons which will be obvious to the House, the gentleman from Georgia be permitted to remain in his seat while the oath is administered.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the gentleman will be allowed to remain in his seat.

Mr. A. H. STEPHENS was then qualified by taking the modified oath provided in the act of July 11, 1868.

Mr. LANDERS, of Connecticut. I ask leave to present the credentials of Mr. Levi Warner, Representative-elect from the fourth congressional district of Connecticut, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Mr. W. H. BARNUM.

Mr. FRYE. I also rise to a question of the same privilege, and present the credentials of Mr. Edwin Flye, Representative-elect from the second district of Maine, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Mr. JAMES G. BLAINE.

Mr. BANKS. I present the credentials of James B. Belford, Representative-elect from the State of Colorado.

Mr. HOLMAN. I present the credentials of Mr. Andrew Humphreys, Representative-elect from the second district of Indiana, and move that he be sworn in as a member of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests that these credentials should be all forwarded to the Clerk; that they should be read, that the members to whom there is no objection be sworn in, and that those to whom there are objections, if any, shall stand aside until the judgment of the House shall be determined thereon.

Mr. HOLMAN. The more usual practice, I think, has been where there has been no objection, and the reading of the certificate is not called for, not to require its reading.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the certificates should be read.

Mr. CLYMER. I present the credentials of Mr. W. H. Stanton, Representative-elect from the twelfth district of Pennsylvania, to fill the vacany created by the resignation of Mr. Winthrop W. Ketcham.

The various credentials presented were then read.

When the credentials of Mr. James B. Belford, Representative-elect from the State of Colorado, were read,

Mr. SPRINGER said: I object to the swearing in of the member from Colorado. I ask that he stand aside till the other members have been sworn.

Mr. BANKS. I am entitled to the floor on that question; and I move that the oath be administered to Mr. Belford.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a further question of privilege, and present the credentials of Mr. Nathan T. Carr, Representative-elect from the third congressional district of Indiana.

The credentials of Mr. Carr were read.

Mr. MCCRARY. I present the credentials of Mr. Charles W. Buttz, Representative-elect from the second district of South Carolina.

The credentials of Mr. Buttz were read.

Mr. MORRISON. There is a protest on file from sundry citizens of this congressional district, and, for the present, I object to the swearing in of this gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the protest.

Mr. HOLMAN. I presume it is more in accordance with precedent that the gentlemen to whom there is no objection shall now come forward and be sworn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that after all the certificates have been read he will then suggest that those to whom there is no objection shall qualify. No advantage will be taken in any respect as to those to whom there is objection.

Mr. MCCRARY. I suppose I will have the floor at the proper time to move that the gentleman from South Carolina be sworn in.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman shall have no advantage whatever taken of him.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is not necessary, then, to read this protest at this time.

The SPEAKER. If there is no call for the reading of the protest, it will be postponed until that case is before the House.

Mr. FLYE, Mr. WARNER, Mr. STANTON, Mr. CARR, and Mr. HUMPHREYS then presented themselves and were duly qualified by taking the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862.

COLORADO ELECTION CASE.

Mr. SPRINGER. In reference to the credentials which have been presented from Colorado, I submit a resolution, which I send to the desk.

Mr. BANKS. I believe I have the floor upon that matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] to make any motion that he sees fit.

Mr. BANKS. I move that the gentleman presenting credentials from the State of Colorado be sworn in.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] moves that the gentleman presenting credentials from Colorado be sworn in, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] moves a substitute, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the credentials of James B. Belford be referred to the Judiciary Committee, and that said committee be instructed to inquire and report at as early a day as possible whether Colorado is a State in the Union, and that until such report is received no person claiming to be a Representative from Colorado be sworn in as a member of this House.

Mr. SPRINGER. I now move the previous question on the substitute which I have offered.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to say that I was entitled to the floor upon my motion that the oath be now administered to the gentleman presenting credentials as a member from the State of Colorado.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts will bear with the Chair a moment. The gentleman will remember that when the credentials were read objection was made to the swearing in of the person claiming to be the Representative-elect from the State of Colorado. It was therefore the duty of the Speaker first to recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] to make his motion, and then to recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to submit his objection in the form of a substitute. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] that he allow a reasonable time to the gentleman from Massachusetts——

Mr. BANKS. I think the Chair misunderstands the precise state of the question. I moved that the oath be administered, and I have the floor upon that question. Of course there will be time for the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER,] but he cannot submit it while I have the floor. I am entitled upon this question to the floor for one hour if I desire to use that time; of course I do not intend to do so. But I submit to the Chair that that is the position of the question, and that is my right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw temporarily his motion for the previous question, so as to allow the gentleman from Massachusetts to be heard.

Mr. SPRINGER. In deference to the wishes of the Chair, I will withdraw for the present my motion for the previous question.

Mr. BANKS. The motion for the previous question could not be made by the gentleman from Illinois, because I am entitled to the floor upon this question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] is recognized by the Chair as now entitled to the floor.

Mr. BANKS. I have been requested to present these credentials for the gentleman claiming to be a Representative-elect from the State of Colorado. I have very little acquaintance with the historical part of the question, so far as the election or the circumstances connected with the election are concerned. I present these credentials as a question of privilege. Congress passed a statute which was approved March 3, 1875, authorizing the people of the Territory of Colorado to form a State government, with certain conditions to be embodied in ordinances to be passed by the convention, which was authorized at the same time to frame a constitution for the State. Upon that being properly certified to the President of the United States by the executive officer of the Territory, the President was authorized and directed to issue a proclamation declaring the State of Colorado admitted into the Union "without further action of Congress."

Now I have not the slightest objection to any possible inquiry that can be made into the history of this election. I simply state here in my place, as a member of the House, that there is not a precedent for the rejection of the credentials of the gentleman claiming a seat as a member of this House from the State of Colorado. I do not believe that there can be found one single precedent where the House has ever, under the same circumstances, refused to recognize such certificate as entitling a person prima facie to his seat. If a question of any kind arises in regard to the legality or propriety of any proceeding connected with this election, it can be referred by the House to any committee hereafter and full and complete investigation had thereof.

The reason for taking this course is one of great importance and ought to weigh upon the minds of members of the House. The reason is this: if any member is entitled to object to any person who presents himself with the certificate of the governor of a State that he has been elected, and upon that objection the question is sent to a committee for investigation, it may be, as very often it has been, a year or perhaps more before the question will be decided, and in that event there will be no person to represent the State. And such objection and action can be repeated in as many instances as the House may choose to enforce so arbitrary a rule, and thus effectually to impair if not defeat the right of a State to be represented in this House.

It is upon this principle, laid down by most of the writers upon this subject, that, wherever the officers of a State who are authorized to perform that duty by the constitution or the laws of the State certify that a member has been elected, that certificate is received as prima facie evidence of his right to a seat, and he is admitted without further question. After that, of course every avenue of inquiry is open. That is all I ask of the House in this case, and I believe it is perfectly in accordance with the precedents of the House, with the Constitution of the United States, and with the laws and constitution of the State of Colorado.

The precedents of the House with one single exception are uniform in favor of the admission of a member to his seat upon the certificate of the governor of the State. The case of New Jersey is perhaps the most remarkable exception to this rule that can be shown. In the text of parliamentary writers, especially in the text of the work by the distinguished gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. MCCRARY,] which is so often quoted here on both sides of the House, it is laid down as a rule of procedure that wherever a certificate is presented in proper form it is received as prima facie evidence upon the question of the right of the member to take the oath of office.

In the case of New Jersey, which was a remarkable contest growing out of the equally balanced condition of parties at that time, the certificates were sent to a committee; but there were two sets of contestants present in the House claiming seats: one set upon the certificates of the governor of the State, while the other set, with one exception, had certificates of the secretary of state of New Jersey. Therefore a question arose upon the right of the claiming members to the seats which they claimed. But, in addition to that, it appears to have been stated by the governor of New Jersey, in an argument upon that subject, that he regretted the laws of his State required him to give the certificates which he did give to one set of persons claiming seats, and that he was not able to do justice by giving certificates to the other parties. So that, upon the very evidence presented from the governor himself, the authority of the credentials in those cases was assailed. It was upon that ground, if upon any ground whatever, that the reference of those certificates to a committee was made.

There have been one or two other cases in which it has appeared upon the face of the certificate itself that there was a doubt of the election—a doubt of the right of the member to the seat. In such cases the certificate has been referred to a committee. But with exceptions of this kind, where the evidence impeaching the integrity or the truth of the certificate has been found in the circumstances attending its receipt by the House or upon the face of the certificate itself—with these exceptions, the practice has been uniform and unvarying; so that there is scarcely a single exception to the rule even upon the grounds which I have just indicated.

Now I do not know what may have been the condition of affairs in the State of Colorado which resulted in the election upon which Mr. Belford claims a seat. I do not express any opinion upon that point. I see here a certificate of the State of Colorado—a State that was authorized by the Congress of the United States to be formed, and which has complied with the conditions imposed by Congress in forming its constitution and adopting the proper ordinances; and the Congress of the United States, in the statute itself, has declared that, without any further proceedings by Congress—upon the declaration of the President of the United States that these conditions have been complied with—Colorado shall be admitted as a State of the Union upon an equal footing with all other States.

Now, under the laws of the United States, the House in view of the admission of this State has the right to add another member to its roll. This is the privilege which the House has of increasing its membership upon the admission of this State. All the circumstances being completely verified and every condition being complied with, there can be no objection—no just or proper objection—to the admission of a member claiming the right to a seat as Representative from the State of Colorado.

I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read a copy of the proclamation of the President of the United States upon this subject.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

A Proclamation.

Whereas the Congress of the United States did, by an act approved on the 3d day of March, 1875, authorize the inhabitants of the Territory of Colorado to form for themselves out of said Territory a State government with the name of the State of Colorado, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States upon certain conditions in said act specified; and

Whereas it was provided by said act of Congress that the convention elected by the people of said Territory to frame a State constitution should, when assembled for that purpose and after organization declare on behalf of the people that they adopt the Constitution of the United States, and should also provide by an ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of said State, that perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and that no inhabitant of said State shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship, and that the people inhabiting said Territory do agree and declare that they forever disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated public lands lying within said Territory, and that the same shall be and remain at the sole and entire disposition of the United States, and that the lands belonging to citizens of the United States residing without the said State shall never be taxed higher than the lands belonging to residents thereof, and that no taxes shall be imposed by the State on lands or property therein belonging to or which may hereafter be purchased by the United States; and

Whereas it was further provided by said act that the constitution thus formed by the people of the Territory of Colorado should by an ordinance of the convention forming the same be submitted to the people of said Territory for ratification or rejection at an election to be held in the month of July, 1876, at which election the lawful voters of said new State should vote directly for or against the proposed constitution and the returns of said election should be made to the acting governor of the Territory, who with the chief justice and United States attorney of said Territory, or any two of them, should canvass the same, and if a majority of legal votes should be cast for said constitution in said proposed State, the said acting governor should certify the same to the President of the United States together with a copy of said constitution and ordinances; whereupon it should be the duty of the President of the United States to issue his proclamation declaring the State admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States without any further action whatever on the part of Congress; and

Whereas it has been certified to me by the acting governor of said Territory of Colorado that within the time prescribed by said act of Congress a constitution for said proposed State has been adopted, and the same ratified by a majority of the legal voters of said proposed new State in accordance with the conditions prescribed by said act of Congress; and

Whereas a duly authenticated copy of said constitution and of the declaration and ordinance required by said act has been received by me.

Now, therefore, I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States of America, do, in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress aforesaid, declare and proclaim the fact that the fundamental conditions imposed by Congress on the State of Colorado to entitle that State to admission to the Union have been ratified and accepted and that the admission of the said State into the Union is now complete.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and have caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this first day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-six, and of the Independence of the United States of America the one hundred and first.

[SEAL.]

U. S. GRANT.

By the President:
HAMILTON FISH,
Secretary of State.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, this proclamation is in accord with the directions given to the President upon this subject in section 5 of the act of March 3, 1875, to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government. That section provides that—

If a majority of legal votes shall be cast for said constitution in said proposed State, the said acting governor shall certify the same to the President of the United States, together with a copy of said constitution and ordinances; whereupon it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to issue his proclamation declaring the State admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, without any further action whatever on the part of Congress.

The record is therefore complete. The State of Colorado is admitted by the Congress of the United States. It is a State. A Representative from that State has been legally elected. He has the certificate of the governor and secretary of the State. Such a certificate under circumstances similar to these has never been disregarded by this House, and it ought not to be in this case. Desiring that the fullest possible inquiry may be made hereafter into this subject, I trust that the usual course may be adopted in reference to this member claiming a seat under his certificate and that the oath of office may be administered to him.

I now yield the floor for ten minutes to my colleague, [Mr. HOAR.]

Mr. HOAR. My colleague [Mr. BANKS] has very well stated the law and usage of the House, if this were a mere question of the sufficiency of credentials of the due election of a member. But no such question is made. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] bases his objection on the extraordinary suggestion that he desires a legal inquiry to be made as to what country he belongs to—as to the question who constitute the States of the American Union. Now, Mr. Speaker, he might as well refer to the Judiciary Committee the question whether the Declaration of Independence ever took effect, whether the Constitution of the United States was ever adopted by the proper number of States, what amendments have been ingrafted upon it since, or any other question which goes to that simple fundamental inquiry what makes up the country called the United States of America—a matter which every American citizen and every American law-giver is conclusively presumed to take notice of as of right, without proof from any other quarter.

The Congress of the United States (the present House of Representatives concurring in the act) directed the President to signify to the American people at large by executive proclamation, the highest evidence known to legislative or judicial processes, the addition of this State to the number which make up the American Union—the same formality which has always conclusively attested and proved the changes which have taken place in the Constitution of the United States itself.

Now it is utterly idle and trivial. The territorial government of Colorado, as a matter of history, is ended. The State government, the State judiciary, the State legislature, the State executive have taken its place. The Senators from Colorado are already sworn and in their seats at the other end of the Capitol. In what attitude would the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois place the House, to refer to a committee to take evidence as to the constituent parts which make up the country of whose Legislature we form a branch?

Mr. BANKS. I now yield for ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT.]

Mr. HURLBUT. Mr. Speaker, this question is altogether too important to pass on suddenly, and, in order to be passed upon with care and with consideration, there is or ought to be in business of all kinds some final adjudication, some complete testimony.

Now, under the law of the 3d of March, 1875, in the fifth section, I find certain things required to be done by the territorial convention and the territorial officers as evidences of the fact that the action of the people of that Territory had converted under this law their territorial condition into a State condition. The Congress of the United States made the President by that law their organ to put forth the final determination, not of the law question, but of the fact. The fifth section, after prescribing various things to be done, concludes, "whereupon it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to issue his proclamation declaring the State admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," without any further action whatever on the part of Congress. That is the law; that is the direction given by the joint action of the two Houses exercising the legislative sovereignty of the United States to the President of the United States; and his proclamation which has been read to you is the assertion by the agent whom you constituted that all those facts had taken place, and that the great fact of the change of territorial condition in Colorado was accomplished without requiring any further legislation on the part of Congress.

Nor is that assertion capable of being questioned in any court or in any body of Congress. It is final and conclusive upon the people, and upon the courts, and upon Congress.

There is no new State in this Union but what stands precisely upon the same grounds. It is just as competent for any one to challenge the right of my comrade to sit from the State of Illinois, as it is for him to make this question in regard to the Delegate from Colorado, because both States stand upon the same consummation of authority—the power given by Congress, completed by the act of the Executive.

Now, sir, if Colorado became a State, that is a fact, and a fact we are presumed to know. If Colorado became a State, she is entitled under the Constitution to her Representative, and when that Representative comes and presents the regular form of certificate, such as we all hold, it is not competent to refuse him, unless upon attacking the validity of the election; and that, as a rule, has always taken place as a secondary thing, in the nature of contest.

I can imagine no possible ground upon which the proposition made by my colleague can stand. I know him to be a man of infinite ingenuity, but I think it would puzzle all the ingenuity of all the perverse men of the world to get clear of that plain statement of fact, and that completes the action of both Houses of Congress.

I do not know, because he has not yet stated upon what grounds he bases it, but believing as I do that the absolutely final action has taken place, that the Congress of the United States authorized the people of that Territory to do certain things, and upon their doing certain things and reporting in the regular way to the President of these United States that they had done certain things it authorized the President by proclamation, the highest evidence, as stated by my friend from Massachusetts, to put that fact officially before the country. Now, sir, the day when that proclamation took place the territorial government of that State had disappeared. Its territorial Delegate has no right here, and the State can be and must be represented, and in justice ought to be represented, by the man whom the people of that State under the forms of law have selected to perform that duty.

Mr. BANKS. I have only a few words to say in addition.

This State, as has been stated, has been admitted by the Congress of the United States, and the people of the State of Colorado, and nobody else, has anything to do with it. It is in exact accordance with the conditions of the Constitution for the admission of new States. The Constitution requires that every State of the Republic shall give full faith and credit to every act of this State of Colorado, and we are bound to do the same thing ourselves. We cannot require of other States that recognition which we refuse ourselves.

It is quite possible, I suppose, to discuss the question of the destructibility of a State. I do not know whether it can be done or not; whether a State that has been created by the act of the Congress of the United States, and by the people of the State itself, can be destroyed by Congress or by any other power in the Government. That is a question which is involved in the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois. It has been tried once in another field; but it is believed, and I think justly believed by the people of this country, and it is a recognized principle in regard to the governments in every part of the world, that a government once established and recognized cannot be destroyed. It may encounter defeat in war; it may be subjected to misfortunes of various kinds; but so long as there is anybody to represent it the State has an existence. It is indestructible; and this State of Colorado is indestructible. Its star is upon the flag of our country. That place cannot be made vacant by anything that is within the power of the House of Representatives.

These questions are involved in the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois. I do not propose to enter upon the discussion of them now, because the question that is presented to the House does not involve considerations of that character. Here is a State, made so by the Congress of the United States and the act of the people of the Territory, declared upon the instructions given to the President by Congress as a conceded and completed fact. The member has been elected by the people of that State and claims his seat. He has a certificate from the governor of the State in the form required by the Constitution and laws of the United States, and by the constitution and the laws of the State of Colorado. And where there is no contestant, where no one else is contending for the seat, there is no precedent for the rejection of the motion now before the House, which is that the member shall be permitted to take his oath upon the presentation of these credentials. If afterward the House shall think proper to institute an inquiry into the history connected with the organization of the State it has full power to do so. This will not interfere with it in any degree whatever. We recognize the fact that there is prima facie evidence of the election of the member, and for the time being will give him the seat upon the credentials presented.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield the floor?

Mr. BANKS. I do.

Mr. SPRINGER was recognized, and yielded ten minutes to Mr. WOOD, of New York.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I do not propose in this preliminary discussion of this matter to follow the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] in discussing the questions they have referred to. But I submit, sir, that this House is made the judge of the qualifications of its own members; and that implies that we have the full right to consider not only whether a man presents a prima facie case, but to go behind that case and institute an inquiry into the election, and into every thing appertaining to the claim which he sets up to become a member of this body. That involves in this case not only a consideration as to the regularity and form of the credentials he may present, but also the question what constituency he claims to represent.

Now, sir, I agree with these gentlemen that Congress did pass an act authorizing the Territory of Colorado to become a State under certain conditions. I also admit that the President of the United States has issued his proclamation in which he declares certain facts, and upon those alleged facts he proclaims Colorado a State. I go further. I admit that this person who is presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] may, in form, present a proper certificate signed by the so-called governor of that so-called State. But are we to be deprived of the privilege of examining the records? Is this House in judging of the qualification of this person, who claims the right to sit here as our peer, to be deprived of the right of knowing whether he is entitled to sit here or not?

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] tells us, give him his seat and inquire afterward. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts not know that in giving him his seat we give full recognition to his position that Colorado is a State, and are precluded from investigation into that fact afterward? Now, sir, I am quite sure that there is no disposition on this side of the House to exclude this gentleman from his seat if he be entitled to it. But as Colorado when we adjourned last August was a Territory represented by a Delegate without the right to vote, it is our right and duty to institute an inquiry as to the facts whether Colorado as a Territory has been converted into a State in pursuance of the Constitution and laws of the United States; whether she has adopted a constitution for the State which is republican in form. We have no proof of that fact. A few years ago our republican friends were exceedingly anxious that every State should have a government republican in form. And now, sir, I hold it is entirely legitimate and appropriate, preliminary to swearing in this gentleman, that we shall institute an inquiry into all these questions. And if Colorado be a State, then I am certain we shall not object to this gentleman being sworn in as a member.

Mr. SPRINGER. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. JENKS.]

Mr. JENKS. Before deciding on the regularity of the election of the gentleman who comes from Colorado, it is first necessary that it shall be determined that there is a State in existence in this Union known as Colorado. Next, the question arises, is Colorado a State in this Union. Before speaking further on that question, I would remark that there is sufficient doubt to justify the reference of this question to the Judiciary Committee.

I do not propose to commit myself upon the question whether Colorado is or is not now a State of this Union. But I propose to show that there are questions of doubt surrounding the case sufficient to justify the reference of the subject to a committee for inquiry. The act under which it is claimed that Colorado has been admitted provides in the fifth section as follows:

> And if a majority of legal votes shall be cast for said constitution in said proposed State, the said acting governor shall certify the same to the President of the United States, together with a copy of said constitution and ordinances; whereupon it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to issue his proclamation declaring the State admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, without any further action whatever on the part of Congress.

Now, by that provision of the fifth section it is devolved upon the President to admit the State of Colorado when it shall have been established that a certain state of facts exists. The President of the United States is to be the judge of those facts. Suppose a law should be passed to authorize the President to admit as a State any portion of the territory of the United States when the inhabitants thereof shall petition to be so admitted, provided they have framed and adopted a constitution of a given form. That would only be extending this act a little farther than it goes, for the principle would be identically the same. It would be a delegation to the President of legislative powers or judicial powers, or of both. The third section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States provides that—

New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State, &c.

This act, from which I have read, provides that the President shall admit Colorado as a State. Now, before a new State can be admitted the Constitution of the United States provides that the constitution of said State shall be republican in form. Judicial action or legislative action is required to determine whether said constitution is republican in form.

Now, if Congress has power to delegate any portion of its legislative functions to the President it may delegate them all, and if Congress may delegate all its legislative functions to the President, we may then dissolve this Congress and allow the President of the United States to rule this country by his mere proclamations.

Taking this view of the question, it seems to me to be sufficiently doubtful to justify its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary to determine whether the provisions of the act have been complied with, and whether Congress can delegate to the President any of its legislative or judicial functions, as the case may be.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not know that it is necessary for me to say anything in behalf of the motion I have made, in addition to what has been said by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. JENKS.]

In reference to the remark of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] that this question has been settled and that Colorado is now as much a State of the Union as is Illinois, and that it is now too late to raise that question, I desire to say that it is not too late for this House now and at all times to judge of the election returns and qualifications of its own members, and one of the chief qualifications of a member of this House is that he shall have a State behind him to represent.

As has been remarked by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. JENKS,] certain formalities have passed between the President of the United States and the Legislature of the late Territory of Colorado. The Territory of Colorado has formed what purports to be a State constitution. Who has seen that instrument? Who has read it? Who knows one of the provisions of that instrument which is to be received as the constitution of one of the States of this Union? Is it republican in form? Have the boundaries of that State been fixed in conformity with that provision of the Constitution of the United States which requires that no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State? And have the other provisions of the Constitution been complied with? No one knows. I do not know; nor do I know what will be the result of the proposed investigation by the Judiciary Committee.

As the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JENKS] has well said, the facts will justify an inquiry on the part of the Committee of the Judiciary of this House to determine whether the law of Congress has been complied with, and whether the President of the United States may exercise legislative powers which by the Constitution, in the third section of the fourth article, have been committed to Congress alone, and whether new States should be admitted into this Union by the Congress and not by a proclamation of the President of the United States.

I think, therefore, that no injustice can be done to the territory of Colorado, which in point of population is smaller than any congressional district represented upon this floor. That territory is now claiming the right to have two representatives in the Senate Chamber and one upon this floor, and to cast three votes in the electoral college for President and Vice-President of the United States. I say that no injustice can be done to that handful of population about to be endowed with so important prerogatives by having the question determined by the highest judicial power of this House, and in the mean time requiring the Representative to wait as Representatives from other States have long waited about the lobbies of this House, before being admitted upon an equality with other members upon this floor.

I ask that this resolution be adopted in the form in which I have modified it by the addition of a provision directing the committee to inquire whether the election has been held in pursuance to the acts of Congress. I ask that the resolution, as modified, be read.

The resolution, as modified, was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the credentials of James B Belford be referred to the Judiciary Committee, and that said committee be instructed to inquire and report at as early a day as possible whether Colorado is a State in the Union, and whether an election has been held therein in pursuance to law for a Representative in Congress; and that until such report is made no person claiming to be a Representative from Colorado be sworn in as a member of this House.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that the reference proposed is irregular under the rules; that this matter should go to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] is raising a point of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. Excuse me; I did not hear it.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that under the rules of the House this question can only be referred, except by a suspension of the rules, to the Committee of Elections.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. It is competent for the House to make any reference it may choose of a legal question of this sort: either to the Committee of Elections or to the Committee on the Judiciary or to any other committee.

Mr. CONGER. Then I move an amendment so as to refer the question to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have the floor and do not yield it. I call for the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. I made my motion before the call of the previous question.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman took the floor upon a point of order, which has been overruled by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves the previous question.

Mr. BANKS. I hope the gentleman will not press the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Illinois to allow the motion of the gentleman from Michigan to be made, so that if the majority of the House wish to adopt it they may have an opportunity to do so. That course may facilitate business.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is the amendment? I did not hear it.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Michigan is to strike from the resolution "the Committee on the Judiciary" and insert instead "the Committee of Elections."

Mr. SPRINGER. I think the Judiciary Committee is the proper committee to make this examination; and I prefer not to yield for the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois declines to yield and demands the previous question upon his resolution.

Mr. BANKS. I hope he will not press the demand for the previous question.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will yield for the amendment and then move the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. If the gentleman does not yield to allow me to speak upon the proposition, I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BANKS. Let us have a little time for debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan withdraws the amendment and the gentleman from Illinois renews the demand for the previous question.

Mr. BANKS. I hope that the call for the previous question will not be pressed.

The question being taken, the previous question was seconded; there being—ayes 120, noes 71.

The question then recurring on ordering the main question, there were—ayes 116, noes 73.

Mr. CONGER. I demand the yeas and nays on ordering the main question, because gentlemen wish to speak further upon this subject and the opportunity is refused.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 147, nays 95, not voting 48; as follows:

So the main question was ordered to be now put.

During the vote,

Mr. JOYCE stated that his colleague, Mr. HENDEE, was absent on account of sickness.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The question then recurred on the adoption of Mr. SPRINGER's substitute for the resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 133, noes 88.

So the substitute was agreed to.

Mr. BANKS demanded the yeas and nays on the resolution as amended.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 142, nays 99, not voting 49; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Ainsworth, Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, John H. Bagley, jr., Banning, Beebe, Bell, Blackburn, Bland, Bliss, Boone, Bradford, John Young Brown, Buckner, Samuel D. So the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution as amended was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MEMBER-ELECT FROM SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. McCRARY. I rise for the purpose of making a privileged motion, that the member from the second district of South Carolina be sworn in. The motion will call for some debate, and as it is quite late I will yield to a motion to adjourn if gentlemen desire it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move the House adjourn.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I ask the gentleman to yield to me a moment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not allow the gentleman from Indiana to yield to any other motion to interrupt the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana. I ask my colleague to yield to allow me to introduce a resolution in reference to the death of Mr. Kerr.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain a motion to adjourn, but will not permit the mover of that motion to yield to any other motion that will interfere with the motion of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from New York desires to submit a request to the House of general importance, and I think there will be no trouble about it.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Iowa will hear the motion of the gentleman from New York, the Chair has no objection.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. My motion will require unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Iowa that the motion of the gentleman from New York, whatever it may be, will require unanimous consent, so that by hearing it read he will not lose any of his rights.

ELECTION INVESTIGATION.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution.

Mr. CONGER. While there is a member waiting to be sworn in I object to anything.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read and then the gentleman can make his objection.

Mr. CONGER. I object to its being read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has yielded to have it read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That three special committees, one of fifteen members to proceed to Louisiana, one of six members to proceed to Florida, and one of nine members to proceed to South Carolina, shall be appointed by the Speaker of the House to investigate recent elections therein and the action of the returning or canvassing boards in the said States in reference thereto, and to report all the facts essential to an honest return of the votes received by the electors of the said States for President and Vice-President of the United States, and to a fair understanding thereof by the people, and whether the electoral votes of the said States should be counted; and that for the purpose of speedily executing this resolution the said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to take testimony, and, at their discretion, to detail subcommittees, with like authority to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to take testimony, and that the said committees and their subcommittees may employ stenographers, clerks, and messengers, and be attended each by a deputy sergeant-at-arms; and said committees shall have leave to report at any time, by bill or otherwise.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCRARY] yield that that resolution may be offered.

Mr. McCRARY. I do not.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Is it in order to move a suspension of the rules?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCRARY] is on the floor for a question of privilege; and the Chair would therefore rule that a motion to suspend the rules is not in order.

Mr. McCRARY. I agreed to yield to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] if he proposed to move an adjournment.

THE LATE HON. M. C. KERR.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana. I ask the gentleman from Iowa to yield to me that I may offer a resolution in regard to the death of the late Speaker, Mr. Kerr.

Mr. McCRARY. I yield for the purpose of hearing it read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the special order for Saturday, December 16, at two o'clock, shall be the presentation of suitable resolutions on the death of Hon. M. C. Kerr, Speaker of this House during its last session, and the expression by the members of the esteem in which he was held for his unblemished character, for his eminent services as a representative, and for his ability and impartiality as a presiding officer.

Mr. McCRARY. I have no objection to that resolution if the gentleman will add at the end of it, "and that, as a mark of respect for the memory of the deceased Speaker, the House do now adjourn."

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield for that resolution?

Mr. McCRARY. I do not, unless with the amendment I have stated.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana. I do not accept the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. McCRARY. I wish to understand whether it is proposed to adjourn immediately upon the adoption of this resolution?

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir.

Mr. McCRARY. Then we will proceed with the other matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCRARY] is entitled to the floor.

SECOND DISTRICT OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. McCRARY. The credentials of the member-elect from the second district of South Carolina, now submitted to the House, are under the great seal of that State. They are in due form, and while it may be a matter of very little consequence to this House, or to the country, whether that member shall be sworn in to-day or at some future time, the precedent which will be established by refusing to swear him in on these credentials is one that, I trust, the House will pause long before it establishes. There is a long but unbroken line of decisions in this House which hold that it is the absolute and imperative duty of the House in all cases to respect credentials that come here from the various districts of the country bearing the great seal of the State and certified in due form of law, so far as to swear in persons holding these credentials, and leaving to the future action of the House anything in the nature of a contest as to the legality, the fairness, the regularity of the election. There is scarcely in the history of the country an exception to this rule, and I submit to the House that it is of the utmost importance that this rule and this long-established principle shall be adhered to in this case. A departure from it, Mr. Speaker, may lead to the most serious consequences in the future.

What is it that is proposed here on this occasion? Here is a gentleman who presents the usual certificate under the seal of the State of South Carolina. He asks to be sworn in. He has presented such credentials as we have all presented. The proposition is to antagonize this certificate, to go behind it, to consider a protest, signed by some half dozen or more citizens of the State of South Carolina, alleging something against the regularity or legality of this election. Now, sir, what are we doing when we establish a precedent like that? We are saying that in all future cases, when we come to organize a Congress, when the credentials of members are presented at the Clerk's desk bearing the great seal of a State in due form of law, if a gentleman upon the floor may rise in his place and present an unsworn and unattested petition, or protest, or paper of any kind purporting to come from some citizen or citizens of a State, that thereupon the House may refuse to swear the member in and give him a voice in the organization of the House, or, it may be, may refuse to swear him in, and thereby deny to the people he represents a voice in the election of a President of the United States.

Sir, when a case shall arise, as a case may arise in any Congress when parties are equally divided, when two or three votes on one side or the other will determine the organization and control of the House of Representatives, it is proposed here to establish a precedent by which by mere petition, by mere protest, a number of members may be kept out of their places and denied a voice in the organization of the House. There is no case on record that begins to establish any such precedent as will be established here by refusing to swear in this gentleman. The case from New Jersey is not like this; and that is the strongest case that can be found against the doctrine that a man shall always be sworn in when he presents the proper credentials under the proper seal and executed by proper authority. That certainly was not a case where the governor of a State certified to the election of Representatives, and where citizens sent in a protest against it. Not at all, sir. It was a case where the governor had certified the election of one set of members, and the secretary of state had certified the election of another set of members. And even as regards that case it has been ever since universally conceded that the House made a grave mistake in it in going behind the certificate given by the governor of the State. But now it is proposed, not that we shall act upon the certificate of the secretary of state; not that we shall decide between two certificates coming from officials of the State, but that we shall set aside the regular and formal certificate of the governor of South Carolina under the great seal of that State, and shall refuse to swear in a member on this floor, upon the petition or protest of some citizens of South Carolina.

Sir, you open the door if you establish this precedent, and at the organization of the very next Congress, if the two parties shall be divided almost evenly, with but a small majority on the one side or the other, you establish a precedent whereby members may be kept out of their places upon this floor until the House has been organized and the power of legislation placed in the hands of a Speaker and of committees of this House that represent only a minority of the legally elected members. This is what is proposed; and, in the presence of a proposition to establish a precedent like this, the claims of individuals, the claims of parties ought to sink out of sight. There is no safety for us but to stand by the precedents so often repeated, that in the swearing in of members in the first instance we will not go behind the regular credentials from the governor of a State.

If we ever establish the doctrine that the House may do this upon any pretense, especially upon the mere petition or protest of a citizen, from that day on we are at sea, and it may be that in some cases the House could not be organized at all. If you may keep one man out of his seat by the presentation of a protest from private citizens against the regularity or legality of his election, calling upon the House to go behind the credentials, issued by the governor of a State, you may keep all men out of their seats upon this floor in the same way, because it is not required by this proposition that there should be proof that the objection is well founded. There is no evidence filed in this case, nothing but the protest of certain citizens, not even under oath, a protest setting forth false grounds of contest.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McCRARY. Certainly.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I would ask the gentleman whether Mr. Pinchback, of Louisiana, did not come here with credentials of the same character and he was refused admission?

Mr. McCRARY. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] knows very well that when that claimant came here there were two governments in the State of Louisiania, two gentlemen claiming to be the governor of that State. One set of claimants came here with the certificates of Governor Kellogg and the other set of claimants came with the certificates of Mr. McEnery, and the question was unsettled as to who was the governor of the State. In such a case as that there may be some reason for pausing and instituting an investigation.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I would ask the gentleman whether he himself or his political friends had any doubt as to who was then the governor of Louisiana?

Mr. McCRARY. We are not now, I believe, discussing the Louisiana question, and I do not wish to be drawn off into a discussion of it. But I say that the refusal to swear in Mr. Pinchback was put upon the ground that there was another gentleman here claiming to have the certificate of the governor of Louisiana; and also upon another ground, that Mr. Pinchback also held a certificate for a seat in the Senate of the United States.

I challenge the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] or any other member upon this floor, to find one single case in the whole history of Congress where the regular certificate was set aside, and the House went behind it and refused to swear in a member who was certified to be elected, merely upon the protest of a half dozen private citizens of any State of this Union.

I beg the House to pause before it establishes any such precedent. It does seem to me that the House will not take this step; I cannot believe the House will do it. Why, sir, at the beginning of this very Congress a similar objection and protest was made against the swearing in of Mr. Morey, of Louisiana. After debate, this House, with its large democratic majority, ordered that he be sworn in, and under the lead of the honorable gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] confirmed the doctrine for which I contend here to-day, that we cannot, we must not go behind the regular credentials in determining whether a man shall be sworn in or not.

I trust that the usual course will be taken; that this regular credential shall be respected; that the great seal of the State of South Carolina shall be respected, and that this man shall be sworn in. If any gentleman has cause to contest his election, the way is open for him to do it. But there is no contestant here; there is nothing upon which the House can act as against this credential except the protest of some private citizens of South Carolina.

The fact is that this gentleman has a majority, I believe, of about 8,000 votes; that he carried every county in his district; that there is no question made in the State of South Carolina as to his right to a seat in this House; that no objection was made that any votes were thrown out, and that there is not a particle of ground for claiming that he is not entitled to his seat even upon the merits of the case, and that question is not now here.

What I ask is that the House will not depart from this simple and necessary rule. It is a right, and I claim it here as the right of the people of that district of South Carolina under the Constitution to be represented upon this floor by the man who comes here and presents the credentials which the Constitution and laws of the land require.

Deny that right in this case, deny it to this claimant, and you have opened a door whereby you may deny it in the future to anybody and everybody who comes here with similar credentials. I trust, I say, that the House will not take this step, but that the usual course will be observed.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] desires, I believe, to offer a resolution; and I yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. MORRISON. I desire that the protest in this case be read, which is all the speech I have to make on the subject. When that has been read, I desire to offer a resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the honorable the House of Representatives of the United States:

The memorial and protest of M. P. O'Conner, Edward McCrady, G. L. Buist, C. R. Miles, F. W. Dawson, T. G. Barker, Henry E. Young, Aug. T. Smythe, H. A. M. Smith, T. R. McGahan, and C. H. Simonton, on behalf of themselves and others, citizens of South Carolina and voters in the second congressional district thereof, respectfully showeth unto your honorable body that upon the 3d day of November, 1874, there was had in the State and district aforesaid, a general election for the choice of a member of Congress for the said second congressional district.

That E. W. M. Mackey and C. W. Buttz were candidates thereat, the said E. W. M. Mackey receiving a majority of the votes cast.

That the said C. W. Buttz protested the election of the said Mackey, and, the said protest having been heard before the Committee of Elections, the said committee reported to the House of Representatives the following resolution, which was adopted by the House of Representatives upon the 19th day of July, 1876:

Resolved, That neither C. W. Buttz nor E. W. M. Mackey was lawfully elected to the Forty-fourth Congress from the second congressional district of South Carolina, nor is either of them entitled to a seat in said Congress.

By the adoption of which resolution a vacancy was created in the representation of said second congressional district of South Carolina.

And your petitioners further show that the said C. W. Buttz now claims to have been elected to fill such vacancy, and to take his seat under a certificate from the secretary of state of the State of South Carolina, forwarded to your honorable body, and purporting to be a legal certificate of said election, whereas no such legal election has ever been had, and the said certificate is null and void for the following reasons:

1. The Constitution of the United States, section 2, article 1, provides, "When vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancy." But in this case of vacancy the executive authority of the State of South Carolina failed and neglected to issue any writ of election to fill such vacancy.

2. That the vacancy created and declared by the resolution of the House of Representatives was a vacancy in the representation of the second congressional district of South Carolina composed by law of the counties of Charleston, Orangeburgh, Clarendon and Lexington, while the said pretended election was held only in the counties of Charleston, Orangeburgh, and Clarendon, altogether omitting the county of Lexington.

3. By the election law of the State of South Carolina it is provided (chapter viii, section 24, Revised Statutes) that the board of State canvassers "shall upon certified copies of the statements made by the board of county canvassers proceed to make a statement of the whole number of votes given at such election for the various officers, and for each of them voted for, distinguishing the several counties in which they were given. They shall certify such statements to be correct, and subscribe the same with their proper names."

"SEC. 25. They shall make and subscribe on the proper statement a certificate of their determination, and shall deliver the same to the secretary of state."

By section 32 it is provided that the secretary of state "shall prepare a general certificate, under the seal of the State, and attested by him as secretary thereof, addressed to the House of Representatives of the United States in that Congress for which any person shall have been chosen, of the due election of the person so chosen at such election as Representative of this State in Congress, and shall transmit the same to the said House of Representatives at their first meeting."

But the certificate issued in this case by the said board of State canvassers in pretended obedience to this law was issued in defiance and contempt of a prohibitory order of the supreme court of the State of South Carolina, prohibiting them to take any action thereunder until the decision of said court of certain questions then properly pending before it, and that for such contempt of the order of said court the said board of State canvassers was duly and lawfully committed to custody by the said supreme court and have not by purging said contempt been discharged therefrom. Wherefore the said certificate and the certificate of the said secretary of state based thereon are null and void.

And your petitioners pray that your honorable body will therefore refuse to receive said credentials, and declare said pretended election null and void.

Attorney for Petitioners.

Mr. MORRISON. As a substitute for the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. McCRARY,] I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the credentials of C. W. Buttz, claiming to be a member-elect to fill the vacancy which under a resolution of this House has occurred in the second congressional district of South Carolina, together with the protest on behalf of certain citizens of said congressional district, which has been filed with the Clerk of the House, alleging that the said credentials are null and void, and all the papers relating to said matter in the possession of the Clerk, be referred to the Committee of Elections, with instructions as early as possible to report upon the prima facie right of the said C. W. Buttz to a seat on the floor of this House as the representative of said second congressional district of South Carolina.

On this resolution I move the previous question, if I have the floor.

Mr. McCRARY. I will yield to the gentleman in a moment for that purpose; but before doing so I wish to make one suggestion. I desire simply to call the attention of the House to the fact which is very apparent, even if the statements in this protest be true from beginning to end, that everything in it is a matter for subsequent inquiry and investigation, and forms nothing more than the basis for an ordinary contest of a seat on this floor. It does not relate to the prima facie case at all, but goes altogether to the question of the merits. The prima facie case stands upon the face of the certificate; and the gentleman makes no objection to the prima facie case.

I say furthermore, however, that it is a matter of public history that the mandamus about which that protest speaks had nothing to do with the election of members of Congress. That mandamus commanded the issuing of certificates in accordance with the votes as actually cast; and if it applied at all to this case it would support this very certificate, because there was a majority of 8,000 votes in favor of Mr. Buttz.

I yield to the gentleman from Illinois to demand the previous question.

Mr. MORRISON. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the election claimed by this man is by only a portion of the district in which the vacancy existed.

Mr. McCRARY. My friend from Illinois is mistaken. At the last session of the Legislature of South Carolina, that defect was remedied; and the district is now entirely contiguous. The question which arose in the other case does not arise here at all.

Mr. MORRISON. The district is the same in number.

Mr. McCRARY. It is the same in number, but not in territory.

Mr. MORRISON. When the original election was held before the contest, four counties voted; now only three vote; so that the admission of this man is the disfranchisement of one county.

Mr. McCRARY. Does the gentleman from Illinois claim that the Legislature could not make a district containing only three counties? If so, I think he is mistaken.

Mr. MORRISON. I do not claim that; but the vacancy existed in the second congressional district as it was then formed, and not in the district as newly made.

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman from Illinois be kind enough to inform the House whether that change was not made by the Legislature to remedy the defect in the original districting of the State, upon the recommendation of the Committee of Elections of this House? In the original arrangement of the districts, the Legislature being required to form each district of contiguous territory, failed in this one instance, so that a portion of the district was separated from the remainder of it by another district.

That case went before the Committee of Elections of this House, and was fully argued, and thereupon they held that the original district was a void district, so that it could not be represented in this House, not being composed of contiguous territory, and the Legislature, in pursuance of their opinion, accepted by this House, remedied the defect in this way.

Mr. MORRISON. I do not know what the exact facts are, but I know that the counties composing the district from which these gentlemen were contesting are not the same as those composing the present district.

Mr. HOAR. Any democratic member of the Committee of Elections of this House will inform the gentleman from Illinois, unless I am mistaken——

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I will inform the gentleman from Massachusetts that he is wrong.

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps the gentleman will be good enough to state the facts.

Mr. MORRISON. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. McCRARY. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to have the gentleman from Virginia answer my question.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I desired to answer the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. The main question having been ordered, it can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I expected to have had time to do so before the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. I object.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 141, nays 89, not voting 60; as follows:

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William H. Baker, Bass, Bright, Campbell, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, Culberson, Danford, De Bolt, Dobbins, Durand, Fort, Garfield, Goodin, Hale, Hays, Hendee, Henkle, Abram S. Hewitt, Goldsmith W. Hewitt, Hoge, Hubbell, Kehr, Kelley, Le Moyne, Levy, Lewis, Lynde, McDill, McFarland, Nash, Odell, Piper, Platt, Purman, Rainey, Sobieski Ross, Savage, Sayler, Schleicher, Schumaker, Sheakley, Sinnickson, Smalls, William E. Smith, Stephens, Stone, Stowell, Swann, Thornburgh, Wait, Walsh, Ward, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Wigginton, Willard, Wilshire, Woodburn, Woodworth, and Young—60.

So Mr. MORRISON's resolution was adopted.

Mr. MORRISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELECTION INVESTIGATIONS.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I ask unanimous consent to introduce some resolutions for adoption at this time.

Mr. HURLBUT. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Then I move to suspend the rules and pass the resolutions.

Mr. HURLBUT. It is not in order to suspend the rules.

Mr. HOLMAN. If there has been no morning hour and these resolutions cannot be introduced——

Mr. BLACKBURN. The motion to suspend is in order one hour after the reading of the Journal and not after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the fifty-first and fifty-second rules.

Mr. KASSON. I ask particularly for the reading of the one hundred and thirtieth rule, to which I call the attention of the Speaker.

The Clerk read as follows:

51. As soon as the Journal is read, and the unfinished business in which the House was engaged at the last preceding adjournment has been disposed of, reports from committees shall be called for and disposed of; in doing which the Speaker shall call upon each standing committee in regular order, and then upon select committees; and if the Speaker shall not get through the call upon the committees before the House passes to other business, he shall resume the next call where he left off—September 15, 1837—giving preference to the report last under consideration: Provided, That whenever any committee shall have occupied the morning hour on two days, it shall not be in order for such committee to report further until the other committees shall have been called in their turn.—December 7, 1857.

52. Reports from committees having been presented and disposed of, the Speaker shall call for resolutions from the members of each State and Delegate from each Territory, beginning with Maine and the Territory last organized, alternately; and they shall not be debated on the very day of their being presented, nor on any day assigned by the House for the receipt of resolutions unless where the House shall direct otherwise, but shall lie on the table, to be taken up in the order in which they were presented; and if on any day the whole of the States and Territories shall not be called, the Speaker shall begin on the next day where he left off the previous day: Provided, That no member shall offer more than one resolution, or one series of resolutions, all relating to the same subject, until all the States and Territories shall have been called.

Mr. HOSKINS. Rule 51 has no relation to the business of Monday. I call attention to Barclay's Digest, page 150, in reference to Rule 130.

The Clerk read as follows:

130. All the States and Territories shall be called for bills on leave and resolutions every Monday during each session of Congress; and, if necessary to secure the object on said days, all resolutions which shall give rise to debate shall lie over for discussion, under the rules of the House already established; and the whole of said days shall be appropriated to bills on leave and resolutions, until all the States and Territories are called through.—February 6, 1838. And the Speaker shall first call the States and Territories for bills on leave; and all bills so introduced during the first hour after the Journal is read shall be referred, without debate, to their appropriate committees: Provided, however, That a bill so introduced and referred, and all bills at any time introduced by unanimous consent and referred, shall not be brought back into the House upon a motion to reconsider.—March 16, 1860, and January 11, 1872. And on said call, joint resolutions of State and territorial legislatures for printing and reference may be introduced.—January 11, 1867.

Mr. HURLBUT. I call the Speaker's attention to Rule 145.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that as there has been no reading of the Journal to-day there is no morning hour and that a motion can be entertained to suspend the rules.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I renew my motion to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution which I have sent to the desk.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a privileged motion. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of three members be appointed on the part of the House, to join such committee as has been appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait upon the President and inform him that a quorum of both Houses has assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

The SPEAKER. That resolution is not in order pending a motion to supsend the rules. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] moves to suspend the rules and adopt a resolution, which the Clerk will read.

Mr. HOAR. My proposition is that, under the usage which has prevailed since the foundation of the Government, this resolution which I submit takes precedence of any other business under the rules.

The SPEAKER. This is a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. BANKS. It is not in order until we have had the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has ruled upon that point.

Mr. KASSON. I appeal from the ruling of the Chair, because it is in violation of the one hundred and thirtieth rule of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will submit his appeal in writing.

Mr. HURLBUT. Pending that I ask the Clerk to read Rule 145 on page 205 of the Digest.

Mr. HOSKINS. I submit to the Chair that, without reference to the reading of the Journal, Rule 130 says that—

All the States and Territories shall be called for bills on leave and resolutions every Monday during each session of Congress.

The SPEAKER. That relates to the morning hour on Monday.

Mr. HOSKINS. That rule is imperative; and in Barclay's Digest, on page 150, in the paragraph relating to Rule 130, it is also there made imperative. The morning hour shall be held on every Monday, whether there be any journal to read or not, for the reference of bills on a call of the States and Territories. Barclay's Digest says:

On every Monday it is made the duty of the Speaker to call the States and Territories; first for bills on leave for reference only, and without debate, and not to be brought back by motions to reconsider, at which time joint resolutions of State and territorial Legislatures may be introduced for reference and printing; then for resolutions, at which time bills on leave may be introduced; and all resolutions which shall give rise to debate shall lie over for discussion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HOSKINS] will notice that the morning hour is the hour after the reading of the Journal. There has been no Journal read to-day; and this is a motion to suspend all rules, including the very rule to which the gentleman has just called the attention of the Chair.

Mr. HOSKINS. The morning hour is not necessarily one hour after the reading of the Journal on Monday. The Digest says:

On every Monday it is made the duty of the Speaker to call the States and Territories.

The Speaker shall call the States and Territories without reference to whether there has been a reading of the Journal or not. It is imperative. The question whether there is a Journal or not has nothing to do with it.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Rule 145 forbids the Speaker to entertain a motion to suspend the rules until one hour after the Journal is read.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Let Rule 145 be read.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I submit, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. If gentlemen will preserve order each will have an opportunity of being heard in order. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] is now upon the floor.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I rise to a question of order. The Chair has ruled on this question. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] has taken an appeal from the decision of the Chair and has been requested to submit his appeal in writing. Pending that, I hold that the introduction of references to these various rules is out of order, unless the Chair desires to reconsider its decision.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say that the gentleman from Iowa appealed from his decision; that the Chair then requested the gentleman from Iowa to submit his appeal in writing; and pending that, and while the gentleman from Iowa was preparing that statement of his appeal in writing, the Chair did, for the time being, allow and still allows the gentleman from New York on the left [Mr. HOSKINS] to call the attention of the Chair to other rules, for the reason that he wants to be well informed.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. The Chair will pardon me for saying that a number of gentlemen around me desire to know if the appeal of the gentleman from Iowa has been reduced to writing; and we desire that the House shall act upon that appeal so that we may not be kept here the whole night.

The SPEAKER The Clerk will read the appeal of the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KASSON appeals from the decision of the Chair just rendered as a violation of the rule of the House, No. 130.

Mr. KASSON. I believe that under the rules I am entitled to be heard. I desire only to make a very brief explanation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can be heard, but will confine himself to the question of order.

Mr. KASSON. Certainly; I have no other purpose.

I regret the necessity of taking an appeal from the decision of the Chair; but as it is the first time such a ruling has been rendered in the history of the House, I think it should not be allowed to pass into a precedent without, at least, having it also on record that the House deliberately sustained that ruling. This is the first day of the second session of Congress. Touching that day there is no provision in the rule whatever that distinguishes it from any other corresponding day during the session. It is Monday, and being Monday it comes under the general provision of the rule which says that a certain order of business shall be pursued on Monday, binding of course upon the House as well as upon the Speaker. That order of business is to devote one hour to the calling of the States and Territories for bills on leave and joint resolutions.

The question, therefore, for the Speaker to decide is, Whether there is any authority under the rules that takes that Monday, being the first instead of the second Monday of the session, out of the ordinary rules of the House. I thought if the attention of the Speaker and the House was directed to that question they might in the absence of all precedents to the contrary adhere to the usual course of procedure in the House, and hold that the rules of the House applied to this Monday as to other Mondays during this session. At any rate I have myself found no precedent or authority for distinguishing the first Monday of the second session of Congress, after it has had a first session, and has adopted rules and put them in force, from any other Monday of the session.

It is for that reason that I have desired to take this appeal, that the House may not inadvertently consent to a precedent which to many of its members seems to violate the written rules of the House, which I know the Speaker is as anxious to respect as any members of the House. I will add to my exception Rule 145, the latter rule simply prohibiting the entertainment of a motion to suspend the rules until the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that Rule 145 be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read Rule 145.

The Clerk read as follows:

No standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded or changed without one day's notice being given of the motion therefor; nor shall any rule be suspended, except by a vote of at least two-thirds of the members present; nor shall the order of business, as established by the rules, be postponed or changed, except by a vote of at least two-thirds of the members present; nor shall the Speaker entertain a motion to suspend the rules, except during the last six days of the session, and on Monday of every week at the expiration of one hour after the Journal is read, unless the call of States and Territories for bills on leave and resolutions has been earlier concluded, when the Speaker may entertain a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. KASSON. One single word further. It is proper to call for the regular order, this being a continuation of the former session of Congress. The Journal of the last day never having been read and approved, under the call for the regular order the reading of that Journal would now be in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that as a matter of fact there has been no Journal read to-day, and the rule provides that the morning hour shall be the hour after the reading of the Journal. The Chair entertains the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] to suspend the rules and decides that motion is in order. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] appeals from that decision of the Chair.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I move to lay that appeal upon the table.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Will the Chair allow me to make one suggestion.

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The Chair bases his ruling upon the fact that there has been no reading of the Journal to-day. Now, it is quite a common practice of the House when business presses to dispense with the reading of the Journal. The ruling of the Chair, if it passes into a precedent, as it undoubtedly will, would put it in the power of every member, on a Monday when the reading of the Journal has been dispensed with, to move to suspend the rules and pass a resolution while a State was being called for bills; for it is a well-established practice of the House that when it is in order to suspend the rules the motion to do so will take any member from the floor; consequently I am afraid that this decision of our Speaker will lead us into this complication.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state in reply to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] that, in the first place, dispensing with the reading of the Journal is not a practice of this House, and if it was it could only be done by unanimous consent, which is equivalent to the Journal having been approved without reading. So that, even under the statement of the case as presented by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] the Journal is practically approved and agreed to.

Mr. HURLBUT. I understand the Chair to base his right to entertain this motion to suspend the rules upon the fact that there has been no Journal read to-day. If that is so, then Rule 145 unquestionably defeats the doctrine of the Chair, because under that Rule 145 the rules cannot be suspended, even on a Monday, until the Journal has been read.

The SPEAKER. This is a motion to suspend that rule with all others.

Mr. HURLBUT. And by that rule the Speaker is expressly forbidden to entertain such a motion. "Nor shall the Speaker entertain a motion to suspend the rules, except during the last six days of the session and on Monday of every week at the expiration of one hour after the Journal is read." If the Journal is not read, the Speaker cannot entertain any such motion.

[Cries of "Regular order."]

The SPEAKER. The pending question is upon the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] to lay on the table the appeal of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. HURLBUT. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 145, nays 73, not voting 72; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Ainsworth, Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, John H. Bagley, jr., Banning, Beebe, Bell, Blackburn, Bland, Blount, Boone, Bradford, John Young Brown, Buckner, Samuel D. Burchard, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. Caldwell, Candler, Carr, Cate, Caulfield, Chapin, John B. Smith, Stanton, Stephens, Stone, Stowell, Swann, Teese, Thomas, Thornburgh, Wait, Waldron, Walsh, Ward, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Wigginton, Willard, Charles G. Williams, Wilshire, Woodburn, and Young—72.

So the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I beg to submit a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman's point.

Mr. KASSON. It is that the first business now in order is the reading of the Journal; and I desire to say a word in support of this point. By the first rule of the House it is made the duty of the Speaker to cause the Journal of the preceding day to be read. It thus appears by the rules to be the duty of the Speaker (when there is one) to make that the first business of the day. The other business that has come in to-day by the consent of the Speaker, and also because it involved questions of very high privilege relating to the organization of the House and the admission of persons authorized to vote and authorized also to call for the reading of the Journal, is all the business that has yet been transacted prior to the points of order which have been made. Inasmuch as the interpretation given to the rule by the Speaker, and from which we on this side have dissented, rests upon the fact that the Journal has not been read, and as it thus appears that there has been a neglect to do a thing which the rule calls for, I desire to submit that it is now in order for any member to call for the reading of the Journal, the reading of which has simply been postponed without any order of the House and by the intervention of certain business of high privilege.

I find that at the second session of the Forty-third Congress (and this is one of the precedents to which I alluded when I was up before) a point like that which the House has been considering was distinctly made. I read from the proceedings of the first day of the second session——

Mr. LUTTRELL. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. LUTTRELL] will allow the Chair to ask him not to interrupt the gentleman from Iowa, because the Chair is desirous beyond all measure to be right in all these decisions. He therefore wants to hear everything that the gentleman from Iowa has to say.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I supposed that the House had voted upon the question and the case had been decided.

Mr. KASSON. The point to which I am now speaking has not been decided, so far as I know. In addition to that, as I understand, it is the usage for the Chair to hear an explanation of any point of order submitted.

The SPEAKER. It has been the usage, and, more than that, it is the wish of the present occupant of the chair to do so.

Mr. KASSON. I was going to say that the reason the point is now made is because of the importance which the fact assumes in the recent ruling of the Chair. On turning to the first day's proceedings of the second session of the Forty-third Congress, I find this record:

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I demand the regular order of business. I think the rules require that the States shall be called for bills and joint resolutions.

The SPEAKER. If the regular order be demanded, that is the regular order of business.

Then the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] insisted on a motion to adjourn, which the House supported.

It thus appears that at the second session of the Forty-third Congress there was a decision of the Speaker (there may have been others previously; I have not had time to examine further back) that this business was in the regular order of business for Monday. Now, as I say, the Speaker having stated as a reason for a different opinion, overruling precedents of the House heretofore, that the Journal has not been read, I desire to present to the Chair and to the House the point that it is in order for any member to call for the reading of the preceding day's Journal at any time during the day on which it is in order to make corrections, if, by inadvertence or by anybody's neglect of the duty pointed out by the ruling of the Chair, the Journal has not been read. And the rule requiring it—I simply make the point that we have the right to the reading of the Journal, that we may know whether it is to be approved or not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair states the fact that the last session of Congress was adjourned without day, sine die, and that there is not, therefore, any preceding day's Journal to be read.

Mr. KASSON. Then the reason of the Chair's ruling fails.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I now renew my motion to suspend the rules and pass the resolution.

Mr. PAGE. I now move the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. One motion to adjourn is in order pending the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. PAGE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and decided in the negative; yeas 75, nays 145, not voting 70; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, George A. Bagley, John H. Baker, Ballou, Banks, Blair, Bradley, William R. Brown, Horatio C. Burchard, Cannon, Cason, Caswell, Conger, Crounse, Darrall, Davy, Denison, Dunnell, Eames, Evans, Flye, Fort, Freeman, Frye, Haralson, Benjamin W. Philips, Piper, Poppleton, Powell, Rea, Reagan, John Reilly, James B. Reilly, Rice, Riddle, John Robbins, William M. Robbins, Roberts, Miles Ross, Scales, Singleton, Slemons, Sparks, Spencer, Springer, Stanton, Stenger, Tarbox, Terry, Thompson, Throckmorton, Tucker, Turney, John L. Vance, Robert B. Vance, Waddell, Charles C. B. Walker, Gilbert C. Walker, Walsh, Warner, Watterson, Erastus Walling, Wells, Whitthorne, Wike, Alpheus S. Williams, James Williams, Jeremiah N. Williams, Willis, Benjamin Wilson, Fernando Wood, and Yeates—145.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, William H. Baker, Banning, Bass, Bell, Bright, Burleigh, Campbell, Chittenden, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, Crapo, Culberson, Danford, Dobbins, Ely, Foster, Garfield, Glover, Goodin, Hale, Haymond, Hays, Hendee, Hoge, Hubbell, Hurd, Kelley, Le Moyne, Levy, Lewis, Lynde, McDill, McFarland, Nash, Odell, Pierce, Platt, Potter, Pratt, Purman, Rainey, Sobieski Ross, Savage, Sayler, Schleicher, Schumaker, Sheakley, Sinnickson, Smalls, William E. Smith, Southard, Stevenson, Stephens, Stone, Stowell, Swann, Teese, Thomas, Thornburgh, Wait, Waldon, Ward, Warren, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Wigginton, Willard, Wilshire, Woodburn, and Young—70.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question then recurred on the motion of Mr. HEWITT, of New York, to suspend the rules and pass the resolution.

Mr. KASSON. Let the resolution be again read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. KASSON. I ask the gentleman from New York to modify his resolution so as to confine it to Federal officers.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from New York to suspend the rules and pass the resolution as it has been just read. Debate and amendment are out of order.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. KASSON. I ask, according to the usual custom heretofore, to suggest a modification of the resolution, if the gentleman is willing to accept it.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I insist on the resolution as presented.

Mr. COX. I object to any modification or debate.

Mr. KASSON. It refers to State elections and State officers, and I ask it be limited to Federal officers, as it is now an encroachment upon State rights in that respect.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I demand the regular order of business, which is on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the resolution, and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LYNCH. I wish to make an inquiry.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order.

Mr. LYNCH. But the gentleman from New York has a right to yield.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. LYNCH. I merely wish to ask the gentleman from New York to yield to allow Mississippi to be included.

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules cannot be amended.

Mr. LYNCH. But he can modify his motion.

Mr. COX. Let the roll-call proceed.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 156, nays 78, not voting 56; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Ainsworth, Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, John H. Bagley, jr., Banning, Beebe, Bell, Blackburn, Bland, Bliss, Blount, Boone, Bradford, John Young Brown, Buckner, Samuel D. Burchard, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. Caldwell, Candler, Carr, Cate, Caulfield, Chapin, John B. Smith, Stephens, Stone, Stowell, Swann, Teese, Thomas, Thornburgh, Wait, Ward, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Wigginton, and Young—56.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the resolution was adopted.

During the call of the roll the following proceedings took place:

Mr. CONGER. The name of my colleague, JAY A. HUBBELL, a republican Representative from Michigan, was read by the Clerk as voting in the affirmative; he is not in the city.

The SPEAKER. The clerks have informed the Chair that there was a mistake in the reading of the name of Mr. HUBBELL. He is not recorded as voting at all. His name was read by mistake for that of Mr. HUMPHREYS, which is inserted on the roll-call in writing.

Mr. STRAIT. My name was read in the affirmative and also in the negative vote.

The SPEAKER. That, of course, cannot be allowed. [Laughter.]

Mr. STRAIT. I voted in the negative.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the names be read again.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for the regular order. Let the vote be announced.

Mr. WHITE. I understand that my name was read on both sides.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] is recorded as voting in the negative.

The Chair will now announce the vote. On the motion to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution submitted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] the yeas are 156 and the nays 78. Two-thirds having voted in the affirmative, the rules are suspended and the resolution adopted. [Applause.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DURHAM. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The House will come to order. Gentlemen will please take their seats. [After a pause.] The gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] is recognized. The Chair will afterward recognize the gentleman from Kentucky.

NOTIFICATION OF ORGANIZATION.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I move the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed on the part of the House, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses has assembled and that Congress is ready to receive any communication that he may be pleased to make.

Mr. KASSON. I ask if there has not been a message from the Senate announcing the appointment of the committee on the part of that body. If so, I would suggest that the language of the resolution be modified so that it shall read: "Such committee as has been appointed."

Mr. WOOD, of New York. That is a technical matter, but I have no objection to modifying the resolution in the way suggested.

The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces as the committee to wait upon the President of the United States, under the resolution just adopted, Mr. WOOD of New York, Mr. CLYMER of Pennsylvania, and Mr. HOAR of Massachusetts.

Mr. MORRISON. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform that body that a quorum of the House of Representatives has assembled and that Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL, one of the Representatives from the State of Pennsylvania, has been chosen Speaker, and that the House is now ready to proceed to business.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe, sir, that the law requires that the President of the United States shall be notified of the election of the Speaker. If so, I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House inform the President of the United States that Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL, one of the Representatives from the State of Pennsylvania, has been elected Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HOAR. I would suggest that both that resolution and the last one be modified by the addition of the words "in room of Hon. Michael C. Kerr, deceased."

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that is hardly necessary.

The resolution was agreed to.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. DURHAM. I rise to a question of privilege. On the last day of last session a vote was taken on the report of the conference committee on the bill (H. R. No. 4146) to authorize the President to accept the services of volunteers to aid in the suppression of Indian hostilities. I was reported as voting in the affirmative on that bill. I desire to state that I voted in the negative. I did not know that I was recorded as having voted in the affirmative on that proposition until I saw it so announced in the Louisville Courier of August 17. I immediately addressed a letter to the Clerk of the House, asking him to make the correction. He wrote to me that it was not in his power to make that correction of the Journal. I take this the first opportunity I have to set myself right on the record.

The SPEAKER. The Journal cannot now be corrected, but the Chair supposes the gentleman has accomplished his object by making his statement.

Mr. DURHAM. Yes, sir; that is all I desire.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I hope the gentleman will yield to me that I may offer a resolution.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana. I desire to offer the resolution which I submitted some time ago.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to yield?

Mr. HOLMAN. I presume that by unanimous consent the resolution of my colleague may be adopted.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] does not yield, the question is on his motion that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for this resolution. I think it is a little early to begin these tactics. I have been on my feet for some time with the promise of the Chair that I should be permitted to offer this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACDOUGALL] that he has no power to prevent a member from making a motion to adjourn.

Mr. HOLMAN. Without withdrawing the motion to adjourn, as it seems to be the wish of gentlemen that a resolution should be adopted fixing a day upon which proper respect may be shown to the memory of the late Speaker of this House, I will yield for that resolution. I suppose there will be no objection to that.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. We have no objection to that. We were willing to adjourn some time ago out of respect to the late Speaker, but there was no respect for him then. All I desire is to submit the resolution which I have in my hand.

Mr. HOLMAN. I cannot yield for any other resolution than the one I have indicated. I hope that it will be read and considered without my withdrawing the motion to adjourn.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I object to the reading of any resolution until——

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I insist upon the motion to adjourn. And in order to comply with the rule I will move that the House now adjourn until twelve o'clock to-morrow, inasmuch as no time has been fixed for the regular meeting of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that that is the regular hour of meeting.

Mr. HOLMAN. By the rule the regular hour of meeting must be fixed by the House. As it has not yet been fixed, I move that the House now adjourn to twelve o'clock to-morrow.

ELECTION IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

The SPEAKER. Before putting the motion to adjourn, the Chair will announce as the select committee authorized by the resolution this day adopted to investigate the late election in South Carolina, Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio; Mr. ABBOTT, of Massachusetts; Mr. STENGER, of Pennsylvania; Mr. EDEN, of Illinois; Mr. JONES, of Kentucky; Mr. PHILLIPS, of Missouri; Mr. BANKS, of Massachusetts; Mr. HALE, of Maine, and Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. HALE, of Maine, as I am informed, is not in this city. Putting him on that committee will deprive the republicans of this House of one of their number.

The SPEAKER. That is not the wish of the Chair, who will appoint Mr. WILLARD, of Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. I wish there might be a republican appointed in place of Mr. HALE.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is not Mr. WILLARD a republican?

Mr. CONGER. He voted with the other side.

Mr. WILLARD. I am already on an important committee, which will employ all my time during this entire month. I therefore ask to be excused.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair will appoint Mr. LAPHAM, of New York.

The motion of Mr. HOLMAN was then agreed to; and accordingly (at seven o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned till twelve m. to-morrow.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 5, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

JAMES L. ALCORN from the State of Mississippi, GEORGE GOLDTHWAITE from the State of Alabama, TIMOTHY O. HOWE from the State of Wisconsin, JOHN W. JOHNSTON from the State of Virginia, JOHN P. JONES from the State of Nevada, SAMUEL J. R. MCMILLAN from the State of Minnesota, and RICHARD J. OGLESBY from the State of Illinois, appeared in their seats to-day.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, as follows:

Mr. President, I am directed by the House of Representatives to inform the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives has assembled, and that SAMUEL J. RANDALL, one of the Representatives from the State of Pennsylvania, has been chosen Speaker, and that the House is now ready to proceed to business.

Also that a committee of three on the part of the House has been appointed, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House has assembled and that Congress is ready to receive any communication which he may be pleased to make, and that the Speaker has appointed Mr. FERNANDO WOOD of New York, Mr. HEISTER CLYMER of Pennsylvania, and Mr. GEORGE F. HOAR of Massachusetts the said committee on the part of the House.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in obedience to law, an inventory of the property belonging to the United States in the buildings and grounds in the District of Columbia under the charge of the Interior Department; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a resolution of the board of supervisors of Woodbury County, Iowa, in favor of dividing the State of Iowa into two judicial districts, to be known as the northern and southern districts, and fixing Sioux City as one of the places at which sessions of the United States courts shall be held in the northern district; which was ordered to lie on the table, to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary when appointed.

He also presented the petition of T. A. Walker, a citizen of Iowa, praying to be re-imbursed for the amount of certain money paid by him for clerk hire while acting as register of the United States land office at Des Moines, Iowa; which was ordered to lie on the table, to be referred to the Committee on Public Lands when appointed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SPENCER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1048) to establish the Territory of the Black Hills, and to provide a temporary government therefor; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

POPULAR VOTE FOR PRESIDENT.

Mr. MORTON. I offer a joint resolution, which I ask to have printed and laid on the table until committees are appointed, and then referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 28) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, so as to elect the President and Vice-President by the direct vote of the people, was read at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of each House concurring therein,) That the following article is hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as a part of the Constitution, to wit:

ARTICLE —.

I. The President and Vice-President shall be elected by the direct vote of the people in the manner following: Each State shall be divided into districts, equal in number to the number of Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress, to be composed of contiguous territory, and to be as nearly equal in population as may be; and the person having the highest number of votes in each district for President shall receive the vote of that district, which shall count one presidential vote.

II. The person having the highest number of votes for President in a State shall receive two presidential votes from the State at large.

III. The person having the highest number of presidential votes in the United States shall be President.

IV. If two persons have the same number of votes in any State, it being the highest number, they shall receive each one presidential vote from the State at large; and if more than two persons shall have each the same number of votes in any State, it being the highest number, no presidential vote shall be counted from the State at large. If more persons than one shall have the same number of votes, it being the highest number in any district, no presidential vote shall be counted from that district.

V. The foregoing provisions shall apply to the election of Vice-President.

VI. The Congress shall have power to provide for holding and conducting the elections of President and Vice-President, and to establish tribunals for the decision of such elections as may be contested.

VII. The States shall be divided into districts by the Legislatures thereof, but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter the same.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to state that that is the identical proposition reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections two years ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will lie on the table and be printed, being considered as read twice.

MANNER OF COUNTING ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I have here a compilation prepared by Major McDonald, our very able and experienced Chief Clerk, containing the action of the Senate and House of Representatives in regard to the manner of counting electoral votes for President and Vice-President from 1789 to 1873, with a statement in detail of the electoral votes for President and Vice-President for the same period. I think that the information contained in this compilation is very important and will be of great interest to Congress and to the country at this time. In this matter, Major McDonald has simply carefully and accurately compiled the action taken, and has given no opinion of his own. I move that 10,000 copies of this compilation be printed for the use of the Senate. The cost will be $327.72.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves that the compilation presented by him be printed. The question is on that motion.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I should like to inquire whether this compilation was not made in pursuance of a resolution adopted by the Senate two or three years ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that two or three years ago there was a similar statement made in response to a resolution, but that there was no resolution inviting the present compilation.

Mr. CONKLING. It may not be important; but I am quite sure there was a resolution adopted by the Senate, I think in 1873 or 1874——

Mr. EDMUNDS, (to Mr. CONKLING.) Which was offered by yourself.

Mr. CONKLING. As my friend from Vermont reminds me, and that is my recollection, I had the honor to offer myself the resolution which was adopted by the Senate. It directed this compilation, and directed it to be made by the gentleman who has made it; and for that reason, as well as for others, it seems to me a matter of course that it should be printed. Although I speak from recollection, I am quite sure I am not mistaken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is advised, in answer to the Senator from New York, that the Chief Clerk reported a statement, which was printed, in answer to the resolution referred to by the Senator, but it was not so full as the present compilation.

Mr. CONKLING. That is quite possible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the statement of the Chief Clerk.

Mr. THURMAN. What is the motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to print 10,000 copies of the compilation.

Mr. THURMAN. That motion will have to go to the Committee on Printing, will it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will, unless the motion be considered by unanimous consent.

Mr. THURMAN. I have no doubt of the general accuracy of the compiler of this statement, but I have not seen it at all and know nothing whatsoever about it. I should like to see it before ordering 10,000 copies of it to be printed for distribution among the people, of course. Ten thousand copies cannot be needed for the use of the Senate. I say this the more freely because I have seen what purport to be com-pilations by other persons which my own researches have shown me to be extremely inaccurate; in some cases, inaccurate by way of omission, and in other cases inaccurate by way of misstatement; and while no one is more ready to bear testimony to the integrity, and assiduity, and ability of the compiler of this compilation than I am, yet I should like to see for myself what it is before distributing it among the people in the profuse manner that the Senator from Indiana proposes. If his motion were only for the printing of the ordinary number for the Senate, I would not have a word to say; but to order the printing of 10,000 copies of this work without knowing what it is, without anybody having examined it in the Senate or in committee, strikes me as being, in these times, rather unadvised. I may be wrong about it; but I should prefer very much myself to see it in print before ordering an extra number of copies.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I think that by the rules of the Senate, under the construction which has been given, a motion to print an extra number must go to the Committee on Printing, such being the law, and we have no authority here to order it in violation of law; but the ordinary number we may order to be printed without such a reference. We shall then have it before us; and I agree with the Senator from Ohio entirely that it is well we should have it before us, so that each member for himself may examine it and test its accuracy, before we order an extra number. I hope therefore the usual number will be printed, and let the motion for an extra number stand until after we shall have examined it.

Mr. MORTON. I will move, then, Mr. President, that there be fifteen hundred copies printed for the use of the Senate, and I will subsequently submit another motion which can go to the committee to print eighty-five hundred extra copies.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Indiana as modified, that fifteen hundred copies be printed for the use of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORTON. I move now that eighty-five hundred extra copies be printed, and let that motion go to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to that course? The Chair hears none; and the motion to print extra copies will go to the Committee on Printing, when appointed.

VOTERS IN CERTAIN STATES—ELIGIBILITY OF ELECTORS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolutions I offered yesterday directing the Committee on Privileges and Elections to make certain inquiries.

Mr. BAYARD. Let the resolutions be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is provided by the second section of the fourteenth article of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States that "Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State."

And whereas it is alleged that in several of the States, and particularly in the States of South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Louisiana, and Mississippi, the right of male inhabitants of said States, respectively, being twenty-one years of age and citizens of the United States, to vote at the late elections of the electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, and for Representatives in Congress, and for the executive and judicial officers of such States, and for members of the Legislature thereof, has been denied or greatly abridged: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections, when appointed, be, and it hereby is, instructed to inquire and report as soon as may be—

1. Whether in any of the elections named in said amendment in said States in the years 1875 or 1876 the right of any portion of such inhabitants and citizens to vote as aforesaid has been in anywise denied or abridged.
2. To what extent such denial or abridgment has been carried.
3. By what means such denial or abridgment has been accomplished.
4. By whom has such denial or abridgment been affected.
5. With what motives and for what purposes has such denial or abridgment been carried on.
6. By what authority or pretended authority has such denial or abridgment been exercised.

Resolved further, That the said committee have power to employ such number of stenographers as shall be needful, and to send for persons and papers, and have leave to sit during the sessions of the Senate, and to appoint subcommittees with full power to make the inquiries aforesaid and report the same to the committee.

Resolved further, That said committee, in order to the more speedy performance of its duties, have power to provide for the taking of affidavits, on the subjects aforesaid, before any officer authorized by the laws of the United States to take affidavits, and to receive and consider the same.

Resolved further, That the said committee be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire into the eligibility to office under the Constitution of the United States of any persons alleged to have been ineligible on the 7th day of November last, or to be ineligible as electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, to whom certificates of election have been or shall be issued by the executive authority of any State as such electors; and whether the appointment of electors or those claiming to be such in any of the States has been made, either by force, fraud, or other means, otherwise than in conformity with the Constitution and laws of the United States and the laws of the respective States; and whether any such appointment or action of any such elector has been in anywise unconstitutionally or unlawfully interfered with; and to inquire and report whether Congress has any constitutional power, and, if so, what, and the extent thereof, in respect of the appointment of or action of electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, or over returns, or certificates of votes of such electors, and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, and to employ a stenographer, and have leave to sit during the session of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up these resolutions for present consideration.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, owing to my temporary absence from the Senate Chamber yesterday, when these resolutions were presented, I was not made aware of their purport until this morning. I have heard them read now for the first time. The subject-matters to which they relate are not only of the most fundamental character and of the deepest importance to our very system of government, but they are also, as plainly appears, exceedingly multifarious, touching not simply the existence of the forms of constitutional republican government in seven of the States of the Union, but also another and very different matter—the question of the eligibility of persons for the office of elector of President and Vice-President of the United States.

I need not say, sir, how deeply interesting and important are these subjects at any time, and perhaps never more than now, and I shall be most glad for every information and all light that can be given to my mind upon any and all of these subjects. If, therefore, it is the purpose of the honorable Senator from Vermont to discuss the origin of powers under which it is proposed that this committee shall act, and if indeed he shall discuss and give us in some way the result of his own study and opinion upon these important and as I say multifarious questions, I shall be a most willing and obedient listener. But I rose for the purpose of asking him, (unless he desire to discuss these matters at this time, and if so, as I said I shall be one of the most willing of his hearers,) to allow the resolutions to pass over, because I think there are many members, or, I was going to say, most members of this body, who would desire to be heard upon the subjects involved.

I do not now suggest objections or make a suggestion even of the separation of these questions, which might well perhaps occur, but merely ask the honorable Senator if he will consent to a postponement of the consideration of his resolutions for a short period, that there may be some preparation for a discussion, the importance of which can scarcely be exaggerated. I shall leave it to his own convenience and discretion as to what day he would prefer to postpone this discussion to, and not make any motion of my own on the subject, although I am one of those who desire to be heard upon the subject-matters of the resolutions.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, nothing would give me greater pleasure personally than to yield to the wishes of my honorable friend; but in my opinion the condition of public affairs is such that the inquiries which I propose in these resolutions ought to be ordered at once; and my purpose in moving to take up these resolutions now was that the Senate should pass them to-day, with such changes and corrections as the wisdom of the Senate may think fit to introduce. But in the present attitude of public affairs and in the present movements of political inquiries in other quarters, I think the Senate of the United States would be wanting in its duty to the States and the people, and the Constitution, and peace, and justice if it spend much time in discussing the questions which these resolutions open, in advance of the report of the committee. If the Senate should be willing to take up the resolutions now, I think I can point out in a moment to my honorable friend, and to all other Senators, that, so far as the substance is concerned, the Senate commits itself to no opinion whatever; but I do not go into that now, because the resolutions are not up, and I prefer to adhere to the wise rule of the Senate that we are not to discuss the substance of a proposition until we have it before us. I hope therefore the Senate, without any objections from any quarter, will take up the resolutions now.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I regret that the suggestion made by me to the honorable Senator does not appear to meet his views and his sense of public duty at this time. It is perfectly plain that these resolutions open up anew the whole question of the relation of certain States of this Union to the Federal Union itself. They open up anew the whole question of the duty and powers of Congress to make inquisition into the domestic and internal affairs of the States themselves. It proceeds upon an allegation, unsupported by petition or even affidavit, that there is an occasion for the exertion of this power by the Government of the Union of inquisition anew into the condition of affairs in several of the States.

Mr. President, the preamble of these resolutions is copied in the words themselves from the second section of the fourteenth article of amendment, which provides for the appointment of representation among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. It declares that "when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State."

Now, sir, it will be observed that this amendment is addressed to the States and is an inhibition upon the States as separate political communities. Article 15, not referred to here, is in the same language prohibiting the denial or abridgment by the United States or any

State of the right to vote for certain causes. This is addressed to States; it is addressed to States as communities; and therefore, when it comes to be ascertained whether this abridgment or denial has been made, it will be ascertained by the examination of the State action; it will be ascertained by the examination of the State constitution, and the examination of the State laws. It is the action of the State as a political community which it is contemplated shall be made to control the question of the ratio of her representation in the popular branch of Congress. The State shall be deprived of her representation, and for what? By the State's refusal to grant equality of the right to vote, except where crime or participation in rebellion shall have authorized the denial and withholding of the right to vote. But, Mr. President, to suppose that the abridgment of the right of one man or the right of ten or a hundred men, or even more, by the wrongful act of fraud or violence of individual citizens of a State is to control the right of the State and to disfranchise the people of that State pro tanto, is to my mind the clearest abuse and perversion of the language and the meaning of this amendment to the Constitution. It was addressed to the States as political communities. It said to them, "You shall not abridge or deny this right; if you do your representation shall be shortened to that extent." How is that to be ascertained? It is the State, the community, whose representation is to be abridged in proportion to the denial which the laws and constitution and authority of that State shall have made in violation of the intendment and language of the Constitution of the United States. But if you proceed on the basis now suggested, this will be a never-ending question.

There is not an election held in any State in the Union, and never will be until some political millenium shall come, in which officers of election willfully or ignorantly will not accept and receive votes which should not be accepted, or will not refuse votes which ought to be received. The experience of every man who hears me, the common sense and common experience of political affairs in this country assure it in the mind of every man who hears me, that there are errors made or willful abridgments made of the right to vote by partisan feeling or sometimes by the ignorance of those in whose charge is the receiving of votes; nay, further, that men are prevented from voting or their votes changed by inducements of a pecuniary and corrupt nature. That is often done, and men are prevented from exercising their free choice by the promise of office, by the promise of employment, by the withholding of employment, by a thousand of those reasons that cannot be defined, which influence the mind and the action of the citizen about to vote. There is that general name which seems of late to have been imported into our political dictionary, intimidation, whatever it may arise from, to whatever degree it may have been exerted; and that undefined and undefinable fact is sought to be created now into a cause of congressional inquisition. All these things have occurred and will occur while men are men, and subject to the hopes and the fears of humanity. And yet, if there be an abridgment of the right to vote, if votes be rejected wrongfully or received wrongfully, this power will exist if the construction contained in these resolutions be approved by the Senate, and this power will ever exist and we shall never have an end to the continual inquisition by Congress into the domestic and internal affairs of the States. The opportunities for the examination given to Congress would be, in the first place, most incomplete and unsatisfactory; and, in the second place, they are not within the spirit or the meaning of our form of government, or the charter of powers under which we act.

Therefore it is, Mr. President, that I think it most important that this Senate should pause before committing itself to such a doctrine as lies within the language of the first part of the preamble to these resolutions, that it is in the power of Congress, and it is the duty of Congress, to inquire, and by legislation to amend the ratio of representation of a State, because of the abridgment or denial of the right of suffrage to a greater or less extent, of the individual voters who reside within that State. Mr. President, no such power was ever given, and no such power was ever intended to be given. The constitutional amendment addresses itself to political communities which we call States, and which form this Union. It forbids them under penalty of decreased representation pro tanto, to abridge or deny suffrage for certain reasons, and if they do abridge or deny it must be by State authority, and that is expressed in the usual and only manner by which States can express their voice, to wit: by the Constitution of the State or by the statutes of the State. Why, sir, to adopt any other construction of this constitutional amendment would make us sit here the whole year round, and forever ascertaining how far at any given election the officers of election had honestly or justly, according to the laws of the State, conducted the election, and received or rejected votes.

I merely wished to point out to the Senate what a never-ending task they are now invited to. Need I say further that such powers are fatal to our Federal system? The exertion of such powers is incompatible with the performance of our regular and constitutional duties. We have no right to undertake this duty, and we cannot in reason, either in the years allotted to man to live or in the hours which are necessary for our other duties, embark upon this system which is nothing more nor less than that of contested election for every one of the officials mentioned in this preamble; for such is the necessary and logical result, that we must sit here to contest elections for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President, of Representatives in Congress, of the executive and judicial officers of a State, because we must examine the basis upon which that choice is declared, the mass of the vote which was given, how it was given, how it was received, or how and why it was rejected.

Mr. President, this is a step beyond any that we yet have had. It is a step that undoes all that has been claimed to be done and is a confession of the worse than worthlessness of the congressional action of the last eleven years in relation to the States named and others. May not and will not the Senate pause to consider this question gravely and with more deliberation? These unprepared remarks fall from me on the first reading of these resolutions. My objection seems to me to be justified by that which appears upon "the very head and front" of the resolutions themselves, and I cannot shut my eyes to the consequences of assuming such a jurisdiction. I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that such a jurisdiction is forbidden. It is impracticable, if not forbidden, and it cannot be carried out and carried into effect without more than absorbing the time fixed by law for the continuation of this session of the Senate or any other session or any number of sessions of the Senate, because here are the elections of two years, 1875 and 1876, to be followed by the elections of 1877 and 1878, and so on in æternam, and of course we shall then become at all times the tribunal for the adjustment of all contests of elections where there has been any abridgment or denial of the right to vote.

Now, sir, the case is perfectly plain. The material for judgment on this subject is all at hand; it is here in the manner provided for by law and contemplated by the Constitution. It is here in your census upon which was based your ascertainment of the number of citizens and people of every sex and grade and age in every State and Territory of this Union. Upon that tabulation of the population your laws for the apportionment of Representatives have been duly approved according to the Constitution. When therefore——

Mr. MORTON. I should like to put an inquiry to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. BAYARD. Allow me to finish the sentence, and then I will listen to the Senator with pleasure. When, therefore, these facts being before the country and the ratio of representation to which any State has been entitled having been ascertained and fixed by law, there shall arise the question whether that State has violated the letter and the spirit of the second section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, that inquiry can be answered immediately by the production of the State's constitution and her statutes, and if upon them is found a denial and the State has assumed to deprive herself of the right of representation by excluding any class who were not to be excluded except under this penalty, the fact can be perceived and the information sought by these resolutions will be fully and accurately ascertained, and it can be ascertained in no other manner.

Mr. MORTON. I rise to inquire whether it is in order to discuss the constitutional power to pass these resolutions or the merits of them, on the mere motion to take up?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. MORTON. I make that point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana has made the point of order indicated by him. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, if I have in any degree passed beyond the question of taking up into the merits of the resolutions themselves, it has been unwittingly. I thought it was, and I still think it was, eminently proper to appeal to the Senate as a reason for not taking up or acting on these resolutions now, the importance of the questions involved and their far-reaching nature upon us and our present and future duties. In that I have sought to give some reasons, and perhaps I have been betrayed in some degree into a discussion of what may be called constitutional merits and powers in this matter.

I do not think it necessary to pursue this further; but I have said enough, and I think enough that is regular, to show why the consideration of these resolutions ought not to be pressed to a hasty determination, and therefore, to show why they should be allowed to remain over until such time as opportunity for their examination shall have been given. I do not know that this ever has been refused before at the opening of a session, and in a time like the present. I do trust that what I have said may have impressed the minds of those who have heard me to reach the determination that I have come to, that time should be given for the proper discussion of the important matters embraced in these resolutions.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I will not violate the rules by making any reply to the observations of the Senator from Delaware upon the subject-matter of these resolutions at this time. I will simply ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to take them up, as I wish to place myself—for one, on record, in the present state of the country, as to whether we are going to be forever in making this inquiry or not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks for the yeas and nays on the motion to take up the resolutions.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAYARD, (when Mr. SAULSBURY'S name was called.) I desire to state that my colleague is detained from his seat by the death of a member of his family.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 39, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Chaffee, Christiancy, Clayton, Conkling, Cragin, Dawes, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill, Morton, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Sargent, Spencer, Teller, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—39.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kernan, Key, McDonald, Maxey, Merrimon, Price, Randolph, Ransom, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Barnum, Blaine, Cockrell, Conover, Gordon, Hamilton, Kelly, McCreery, Norwood, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sharon, and Sherman—14.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions are before the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I wish to modify the language of the resolutions in several particulars at the suggestion of some Senators. I believe I have the power of modification, which will save putting the question to the Senate. I will add after the word "abridged," in the first clause after the preamble, the words "and that said committee be authorized to extend this inquiry to the elections of 1874." I make this modification because it has been suggested to me that in several State elections occurring in the year 1874 important circumstances, either under State authority or without it, occurred, which it is desirable that the committee should be authorized to look into.

[Mr. ANTHONY and Mr. MCCREERY, the committee appointed to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that the two Houses were ready to receive any communication he had to make, appeared below the bar of the Senate.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, the committee appointed by the two Houses of Congress to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that the two Houses were organized and ready to receive any communication he might have to make have performed the duty with which they were charged, and the President replied that he would communicate to the two Houses of Congress forthwith in writing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There are one or two other modifications which have been suggested to the mere phraseology of the latter resolutions, which I will make.

At the top of page 2 of the document print of the resolutions, lines 2 and 4, I strike out the word "affidavits" and insert the word "depositions" in each line, and after the word "made," in the last resolution, line 8, I wish to insert the words "declared or returned" before the comma and after the word "made," so as to leave no ground for doubt of the fullness of the power of the committee to make a complete inquiry. Then in line 11, I wish to strike out the word "such" where it first occurs, so as to read "whether any appointment or action of any such elector has been in any wise," &c.; and in line 14 after the word "Congress" to insert "or either House thereof." These modifications, I think, correct the phraseology to my present satisfaction.

Now, I merely wish to say, in reply to my honorable friend from Delaware, that I am greatly surprised at the views which he seems to entertain touching these resolutions. His points appear to be two: the first of which is that the Senate has no power to make inquiry into the fact whether there has been a denial or abridgment of the right of citizens of the several States to vote as provided in this section of the fourteenth article of amendments to the Constitution. I confess I am greatly surprised at that. The very phraseology itself declares, not what we can find in the statutes of the States or in their constitutions, but that representation shall be based upon the whole number of the inhabitants of a State, except when in any State there shall be either denial or abridgment to any class of citizens who ordinarily are voters, males over twenty-one years of age, and the ratio of that State shall be diminished in that proportion of denial or abridgment. Ever since the foundation of the Government, the Senator knows just as well as I do that the ascertainment of the amount of representation fixed by the Constitution, where this fixes it, has to be left to the legislative will. The Constitution cannot do it; and the legislative will, therefore, always has ascertained as a fact the whole number of inhabitants in the respective States; and, upon that ascertainment, it has fixed the proportion of members of the House of Representatives to which each State shall be entitled. Now, this Constitution says that, in a certain event, the whole number of inhabitants in a particular State shall not be the rule that fixes its representation, but that that whole number shall be diminished to a certain number, to be ascertained how? By the Constitution? No; by law of course; and the very article itself (if it were necessary to refer to it on a question of this kind) provides that Congress is to have the power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation. How are we to know what legislation is appropriate, whether any is needed, whether any such case in fact exists as is stated in half the newspapers of the country, as has been stated over and over again by petitions and memorials addressed to Congress and to this body of it, as appears from the testimony of committees more than once taken and reported to this body, unless we have a careful inquiry into the facts. We get at it by investigation. When we do get at it and know exactly what the truth is, then the question will come up—and it appears to me not before—whether the particular sort of abridgment or denial, if there be any, that has occurred in a particular State is that sort of abridgment and denial that the Constitution refers to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator will suspend a moment, the Chair will receive a message from the President of the United States.

At one o'clock and eleven minutes p. m., Mr. U. S. GRANT, jr., Secretary to the President of the United States, appeared below the bar of the Senate and said:

Mr. President, I am directed by the President of the United States to deliver to the Senate a message in writing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When we ascertain these facts, Mr. President, it may be—I wish I could believe it would be—that in every State there has been the free, unabridged, and undenied right of every citizen entitled to vote, in the exercise of that privilege. It may be unhappily, Mr. President, that in some one State, or two or three or six or seven, there has been, by law, by executive action or otherwise, a real revolution of that dark power whose crime heaves upward in perpetual turbulence, and that the net result of the constitutional amendments which have given representation, as a rule, based upon the total population of States, has been to increase the representation of certain States in Congress and in the electoral college to the number of 15 or 20 votes, while it has not been to increase the effective franchise of the citizens of those States; and that, therefore, the tendency of the government in those States has been toward an increase of aristocratic power, where the political franchises are in the hands of the few, rather than to a diminution of it. I say I wish I could believe that the report of this committee, if the Senate should order the inquiry, will show that any such fear is wholly ungrounded. But the way to ascertain the truth, let it hit where it will, in the interest of peace, order, and good government, in the interest of liberty under the law and not above it, is for the Senate of the United States, the representative of all the States, to inquire and learn what the real condition is. When we ascertain it, as I have said, there will be time enough to discuss whether the facts ascertained warrant or require any species of legislative or other action whatever.

I do not propose to be drawn into a discussion of hypothetical cases at this time. I only wish to say enough to show to my honorable friends who voted against taking up these resolutions, that an inquiry into the state of the country, under this article of the Constitution, to ascertain, for public information, and for the information of this responsible body, what the truth is upon matters that have been so much asserted, so much stated in petitions and in newspapers and in public speeches—sometimes denied; sometimes admitted and justified and defended—in order that we may give peace to this country, either by such legislation as shall be fit under the circumstances, or by making public to all the people of the country that these allegations are either the spurious statements of dishonest demagogues and politicians, or the mistaken opinions of people who have mistaken their rights.

As to the last resolution, or the last branch of the subject, no suggestion has yet been made in opposition to it. That resolution, like the first, does not commit this body to any opinion whatever in respect of our powers, the powers of Congress, the powers of the House of Representatives, of the whole Government together, or of any one of its political or judicial branches. It only, under the Constitution, which does provide for the election of a President and a Vice-President by general methods pointed out, assumes that it is desirable that we should know, in the present condition of affairs more perhaps than any other time that has recently occurred, what has taken place in respect of the subject to which this resolution refers; that is, the eligibility of the persons elected or claiming to have been elected electors of President and Vice-President. It has been stated in the newspapers, and I believe it to be true, that steps of various kinds have been taken and are being taken to question the eligibility, perhaps upon good grounds, perhaps upon grounds that are not good, (I do not say, for I do not know,) of various of these electors, some because they are office-holders, some because they are under disabilities imposed by the Constitution for participation in rebellion in spite of the oaths they had taken to support the Constitution, and some for other reasons. Other allegations are made which this resolution covers as an inquiry and not as a judgment, that these electors in some States have not been lawfully appointed; that returning boards or whatever they are called have given certificates to the men who did not get the majority of votes and that they threaten to give them to others. Other allegations have been made that terror, violence, coercion, fraud, the purchase of the votes of electors in the interest of one candidate or another, has been going on. Is it not fit, therefore, that the Senate of the United States, under the Constitution, should inquire into the truth of these allegations that so much agitate the country, and justly agitate it, in order that, if there be any foundation for any of these allegations upon either side of the political contest that is going on, some lawful and peaceable means shall be ascertained to cure whatever of wrong has occurred upon either side?

Mr. CONKLING. As this discussion seems likely to proceed, and as I learn that the annual message of the President is on the table, I hope everybody will consent that the pending resolution may be laid aside informally while the Chair opens the message of the President and allows it to be read, that it may be printed and found on our tables.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no possible objection to that.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish the Senator from Vermont would let the resolutions go over until to-morrow morning, so that they may be printed with the amendments. The annual message probably will take up nearly the rest of to-day's session in reading, and I should like to see the resolutions, as they have been modified, in print before we act on them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I regret extremely that I cannot oblige my friend by consenting to that course. The amendments that I have made to the resolutions are purely phraseological. My friend has a note of them. They are only two or three words. As I said before, the present condition of affairs, the interval of time between this day and the second Wednesday in Febraary, when, if ever, it is desirable that we shall know something about the state of this case, makes me feel it to be my duty to ask the Senate, if it will, to act upon these resolutions to-day.

Mr. THURMAN. I made the suggestion not to waste any time upon the resolutions; I do not propose to waste a moment of time upon them. I have some few observations to make, and they are but few, before the vote is taken, and I should like very much to see them in the modified shape before doing so. I have no disposition whatsoever to prolong the debate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will send the resolutions over to my friend in the modified shape now.

Mr. THURMAN. Well, I should like to study them.

Mr. MORTON. I hope we shall hear the message read and then resume the consideration of the resolutions and not adjourn until they are disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to laying aside the resolutions informally in order to hear the annual message of the President read? The Chair hears no objection. The Chair lays before the Senate the annual message of the President of the United States, which the Secretary will read.

PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

The Secretary of the Senate, Hon. GEORGE C. GORHAM, read the message, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In submitting my eighth and last annual message to Congress, it seems proper that I should refer to, and in some degree recapitulate, the events and official acts of the past eight years.

It was my fortune, or misfortune, to be called to the office of Chief Executive without any previous political training. From the age of seventeen I had never even witnessed the excitement attending a presidential campaign but twice antecedent to my own candidacy, and at but one of them was I eligible as a voter. Under such circumstances it is but reasonable to suppose that errors of judgment must have occurred. Even had they not, differences of opinion between the Executive, bound by an oath to the strict performance of his duties, and writers and debaters must have arisen. It is not necessarily evidence of blunder on the part of the Executive because there are these differences of views. Mistakes have been made, as all can see and I admit, but, it seems to me, oftener in the selections made of the assistants appointed to aid in carrying out the various duties of administering the Government, in nearly every case selected without a personal acquaintance with the appointee, but upon recommendations of the representatives chosen directly by the people. It is impossible, where so many trusts are to be allotted, that the right parties should be chosen in every instance. History shows that no administration, from the time of Washington to the present, has been free from these mistakes. But I leave comparisons to history, claiming only that I have acted in every instance from a conscientious desire to do what was right, constitutional within the law, and for the very best interests of the whole people. Failures have been errors of judgment, not of intent.

My civil career commenced, too, at a most critical and difficult time. Less than four years before, the country had emerged from a conflict such as no other nation had ever survived. Nearly one-half of the States had revolted against the Government, and of those remaining faithful to the Union a large percentage of the population sympathized with the rebellion and made an "enemy in the rear" almost as dangerous as the more honorable enemy in the front. The latter committed errors of judgment, but they maintained them openly and courageously. The former received the protection of the Government they would see destroyed and reaped all the pecuniary advantage to be gained out of the then existing state of affairs, many of them by obtaining contracts and by swindling the Government in the delivery of their goods.

Immediately on the cessation of hostilities, the then noble President, who had carried the country so far through its perils, fell a martyr to his patriotism at the hands of an assassin.

The intervening time to my first inauguration was filled up with wranglings between Congress and the new Executive as to the best mode of "reconstruction," or, to speak plainly, as to whether the control of the Government should be thrown immediately into the hands of those who had so recently and persistently tried to destroy it, or whether the victors should continue to have an equal voice with them in this control. Reconstruction as finally agreed upon means this, and only this, except that the late slave was enfranchised, giving an increase, as was supposed, to the Union-loving and Union-supporting votes. If free, in the full sense of the word, they would not disappoint this expectation. Hence at the beginning of my first administration the work of reconstruction—much embarrassed by the long delay—virtually commenced. It was the work of the legislative branch of the Government. My province was wholly in approving their acts, which I did most heartily, urging the Legislatures of States that had not yet done so to ratify the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution. The country was laboring under an enormous debt contracted in the suppression of rebellion, and taxation was so oppressive as to discourage production. Another danger also threatened us—a foreign war. The last difficulty had to be adjusted and was adjusted without a war and in a manner highly honorable to all parties concerned.

Taxes have been reduced within the last seven years nearly $300,000,000 and the national debt has been reduced in the same time over $435,000,000. By refunding the 6 per cent. bonded debt for bonds bearing 5 and 4½ per cent. interest, respectively, the annual interest has been reduced from over $130,000,000 in 1869 to but little over $100,000,000 in 1876. The balance of trade has been changed from over $130,000,000 against the United States in 1869 to more than $120,000,000 in our favor in 1876.

It is confidently believed that the balance of trade in favor of the United States will increase, not diminish, and that the pledge of Congress to resume specie payments in 1879 will be easily accomplished, even in the absence of much desired further legislation on the subject.

A policy has been adopted toward the Indian tribes inhabiting a large portion of the territory of the United States which has been humane and has substantially ended Indian hostilities in the whole land, except in a portion of Nebraska, and Dakota, Wyoming, and Montana Territories—the Black Hills region and approaches thereto. Hostilities there have grown out of the avarice of the white man, who has violated our treaty stipulations in his search for gold. The question might be asked why the Government has not enforced obedience to the terms of the treaty prohibiting the occupation of the Black Hills region by whites. The answer is simple: The first immigrants to the Black Hills were removed by troops, but rumors of rich discoveries of gold took into that region increased numbers. Gold has actually been found in paying quantity, and an effort to remove the miners would only result in the desertion of the bulk of the troops that might be sent there to remove them. All difficulty in this matter has, however, been removed, subject to the approval of Congress, by a treaty ceding the Black Hills and approaches to settlement by citizens.

The subject of Indian policy and treatment is so fully set forth by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and my views so fully expressed therein, that I refer to their reports and recommendations as my own.

The relations of the United States with foreign powers continue on a friendly footing. Questions have arisen from time to time in the foreign relations of the Government, but the United States have been happily free during the past year from the complications and embarrassments which have surrounded some of the foreign powers.

The diplomatic correspondence submitted herewith contains information as to certain of the matters which have occupied the Government.

The cordiality which attends our relations with the powers of the earth has been plainly shown by the general participation of foreign nations in the exhibition which has just closed, and by the exertions made by distant powers to show their interest in and friendly feelings toward the United States in the commemoration of the centennial of the nation. The Government and people of the United States have not only fully appreciated this exhibition of kindly feeling, but it may be justly and fairly expected that no small benefits will result both to ourselves and other nations from a better acquaintance and a better appreciation of our mutual advantages and mutual wants.

Congress at its last session saw fit to reduce the amount usually appropriated for foreign intercourse, by withholding appropriations for representatives of the United States in certain foreign countries and for certain consular offices, and by reducing the amounts usually appropriated for certain other diplomatic posts, and thus necessitating a change in the grade of the representative.

For these reasons, immediately upon the passage of the bill making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the present fiscal year, instructions were issued to the representatives of the United States at Bolivia, Ecuador, and Colombia, and to the consular officers for whom no appropriation had been made, to close their respective legations and consulates and cease from the performance of their duties; and in like manner steps were immediately taken to substitute chargés d'affaires for ministers resident in Portugal, Denmark, Greece, Switzerland, and Paraguay.

While thoroughly impressed with the wisdom of sound economy in the foreign service as in other branches of the Government, I cannot escape the conclusion that in some instances the withholding of appropriations will prove an expensive economy, and that the small retrenchment secured by a change of grade in certain diplomatic posts is not an adequate consideration for the loss of influence and importance which will attend our foreign representatives under this reduction. I am of the opinion that a re-examination of the subject will cause a change in some instances in the conclusions reached on these subjects at the last session of Congress.

The court of commissioners of Alabama claims, whose functions were continued by an act of the last session of Congress until the 1st day of January, 1877, has carried on its labors with diligence and general satisfaction. By a report of the clerk of the court, transmitted herewith, bearing date November 14, 1876, it appears that within the time now allowed by law the court will have disposed of all the claims presented for adjudication. This report also contains a statement of the general results of the labors of the court to the date thereof. It is a cause of satisfaction that the method adopted for the satisfaction of the classes of claims submitted to the court, which are of long standing and justly entitled to early consideration, should have proved successful and acceptable.

It is with satisfaction that I am enabled to state that the work of the joint commission for determining the boundary line between the United States and British Possessions from the northwest angle of the Lake of the Woods to the Rocky Mountains, commenced in 1872, has been completed. The final agreements of the commissioners, with the maps, have been duly signed, and the work of the commission is complete.

The fixing of the boundary upon the Pacific coast by the protocol of March 10, 1873, pursuant to the award of the Emperor of Germany by article 34 of the treaty of Washington, with the termination of the work of this commission, adjusts and fixes the entire boundary between the United States and the British Possessions, except as to the portion of territory ceded by Russia to the United States under the treaty of 1867. The work intrusted to the commissioner and the officers of the Army attached to the commission has been well and satisfactorily performed. The original of the final agreement of the commissioners, signed upon the 29th of May, 1876, with the original "List of astronomical stations observed," the original official "List of monuments marking the international boundary line," and the maps, records, and general reports relating to the commission, have been deposited in the Department of State. The official report of the commissioner on the part of the United States, with the report of the chief astronomer of the United States, will be submitted to Congress within a short time. I reserve for a separate communication to Congress a statement of the condition of the questions which lately arose with Great Britain respecting the surrender of fugitive criminals under the treaty of 1842.

The Ottoman government gave notice under date of January 15, 1874, of its desire to terminate the treaty of 1862, concerning commerce and navigation, pursuant to the provisions of the twenty-second article thereof. Under this notice the treaty terminated upon the 5th day of June, 1876. That government has invited negotiations toward the conclusion of a new treaty.

By the act of Congress of March 23, 1874, the President was authorized, when he should receive satisfactory information that the Ottoman government or that of Egypt had organized new tribunals likely to secure to citizens of the United States the same impartial justice enjoyed under the exercise of judicial functions by diplomatic and consular officers of the United States, to suspend the operation of the act of June 22, 1860, and to accept for citizens of the United States the jurisdiction of the new tribunals. Satisfactory information having been received of the organization of such new tribunals in Egypt, I caused a proclamation to be issued upon the 27th of March last, suspending the operation of the act of June 22, 1860, in Egypt according to the provisions of the act. A copy of the proclamation accompanies this message. The United States has united with the other powers in the organization of these courts. It is hoped that the jurisdictional questions which have arisen may be readily adjusted and that this advance in judicial reform may be hindered by no obstacles.

The necessary legislation to carry into effect the convention respecting commercial reciprocity concluded with the Hawaiian Islands in 1875 having been had, the proclamation to carry into effect the convention as provided by the act approved August 15, 1876, was duly issued upon the 9th day of September last. A copy thereof accompanies this message.

The commotions which have been prevalent in Mexico for some time past, and which, unhappily, seem to be not yet wholly quieted, have led to complaints of citizens of the United States of injuries by persons in authority. It is hoped, however, that these will ultimately be adjusted to the satisfaction of both governments. The frontier of the United States in that quarter has not been exempt from acts of violence by citizens of one republic on those of the other. The frequency of these is supposed to be increased and their adjustment made more difficult by the considerable changes in the course of the lower part of the Rio Grande River, which river is a part of the boundary between the two countries. These changes have placed on either side of that river portions of land which by existing conventions belong to the jurisdiction of the government on the opposite side of the river. The subject of adjustment of this cause of difficulty is under consideration between the two republics.

The government of the United States of Colombia has paid the award in the case of the steamer Montijo, seized by authorities of that government some years since, and the amount has been transferred to the claimants.

It is with satisfaction that I am able to announce that the joint commission for the adjustment of claims between the United States and Mexico, under the convention of 1868, the duration of which has been several times extended, has brought its labors to a close. From the report of the agent of the United States, which accompanies the papers transmitted herewith, it will be seen that within the time limited by the commission one thousand and seventeen claims on the part of citizens of the United States against Mexico were referred to the commission. Of these claims, eight hundred and thirty-one were dismissed or disallowed, and in one hundred and eighty-six cases awards were made in favor of the claimants against the Mexican Republic amounting in the aggregate to $4,125,622.20. Within the same period nine hundred and ninety-eight claims on the part of citizens of the Mexican Republic against the United States were referred to the commission. Of these claims eight hundred and thirty-one were dismissed or disallowed, and in one hundred and sixty-seven cases awards were made in favor of the claimants against the United States amounting in the aggregate to $150,498.41. By the terms of the convention the amount of these awards is to be deducted from the amount awarded in favor of our citizens against Mexico, and the balance only to be paid by Mexico to the United States, leaving the United States to make provision for this proportion of the awards in favor of its own citizens. I invite your attention to the legislation which will be necessary to provide for the payment. In this connection I am pleased to be able to express the acknowledgments due to Sir Edward Thornton, the umpire of the commission, who has given to the consideration of the large number of claims submitted to him much time, unwearied patience, and that fairness and intelligence which are well known to belong to the accomplished representative of Great Britain, and which are likewise recognized by the representative in this country of the republic of Mexico.

Monthly payments of a very small part of the amount due by the government of Venezuela to citizens of the United States on account of claims of the latter against that government continue to be made with reasonable punctuality. That government has proposed to change the system which it has hitherto pursued in this respect by issuing bonds for part of the amount of the several claims. The proposition, however, could not, it is supposed, properly be accepted, at least without the consent of the holders of certificates of the indebtedness of Venezuela. These are so much dispersed that it would be difficult, if not impossible, to ascertain their disposition on the subject.

In former messages I have called the attention of Congress to the necessity of legislation with regard to fraudulent naturalization and to the subject of expatriation and the election of nationality.

The numbers of persons of foreign birth seeking a home in the United States, the ease and facility with which the honest immigrant may after the lapse of a reasonable time become possessed of all the privileges of citizenship of the United States, and the frequent occasions which induce such adopted citizens to return to the country of their birth render the subject of naturalization and the safeguards which experience has proved necessary for the protection of the honest naturalized citizen of paramount importance. The very simplicity in the requirements of law on this question affords opportunity for fraud, and the want of uniformity in the proceedings and records of the various courts and in the forms of the certificates of naturalization issued affords a constant source of difficulty.

I suggest no additional requirements to the acquisition of citizenship beyond those now existing; but I invite the earnest attention of Congress to the necessity and wisdom of some provisions regarding uniformity in the records and certificates, and providing against the frauds which frequently take place, and for the vacating of a record of naturalization obtained in fraud. These provisions are needed in aid and for the protection of the honest citizen of foreign birth, and for the want of which he is made to suffer not infrequently. The United States has insisted upon the right of expatriation and has obtained after a long struggle an admission of the principle contended for by acquiescence therein on the part of many foreign powers and by the conclusion of treaties on that subject. It is, however, but justice to the governments to which such naturalized citizens have formerly owed allegiance, as well as to the United States, that certain fixed and definite rules should be adopted governing such cases and providing how expatriation may be accomplished. While immigrants in large numbers become citizens of the United States, it is also true that persons, both native-born and naturalized, once citizens of the United States either by formal acts or as the effect of a series of facts and circumstances, abandon their citizenship and cease to be entitled to the protection of the United States, but continue on convenient occasions to assert a claim to protection in the absence of provisions on these questions.

And in this connection I again invite your attention to the necessity of legislation concerning the marriages of American citizens contracted abroad and concerning the status of American women who may marry foreigners and of children born of American parents in a foreign country.

The delicate and complicated questions continually occurring with reference to naturalization, expatriation, and the status of such persons as I have above referred to induce me to earnestly direct your attention again to these subjects.

In like manner I repeat my recommendation that some means be provided for the hearing and determination of the just and subsisting claims of aliens upon the Government of the United States within a reasonable limitation, and of such as may hereafter arise. While by existing provisions of law the Court of Claims may in certain cases be resorted to by an alien claimant, the absence of any general provisions governing all such cases and the want of a tribunal skilled in the disposition of such cases upon recognized, fixed, and settled principles, either provide no remedy in many deserving cases or compel a consideration of such claims by Congress or the Executive Departments of the Government.

It is believed that other governments are in advance of the United States upon this question, and that the practice now adopted is entirely unsatisfactory.

Congress, by an act approved the 3d day of March, 1875, authorized the inhabitants of the Territory of Colorado to form a State government with the name of the State of Colorado, and therein provided for the admission of said State, when formed, into the Union, upon an equal footing with the original States.

A constitution having been adopted and ratified by the people of that State, and the acting governor having certified to me the facts as provided by said act, together with a copy of such constitution and ordinances as provided for in the said act, and the provisions of the said act of Congress having been duly complied with, I issued a proclamation upon the 1st of August, 1876, a copy of which is hereto annexed.

The report of the Secretary of War shows that the Army has been actively employed during the year in subduing, at the request of the Indian Bureau, certain wild bands of the Sioux Indian Nation, and in preserving the peace at the South during the election. The commission constituted under the act of July 24, 1876, to consider and report on the "whole subject of the reform and re-organization of the Army," met in August last, and has collected a large mass of statistics and opinions bearing on the subject before it. These are now under consideration and their report is progressing. I am advised, though, by the president of the commission, that it will be impracticable to comply with the clause of the act requiring the report to be presented through me to Congress on the first day of this session, as there has not yet been time for that mature deliberation which the importance of the subject demands. Therefore I ask that the time of making the report be extended to the 29th day of January, 1877. In accordance with the resolution of August 15, 1876, the Army regulations prepared under the act of March 1, 1875, have not been promulgated, but are held until after the report of the above-mentioned commission shall have been received and acted on.

By the act of August 15, 1876, the cavalry force of the Army was increased by 2,500 men, with the proviso that they should be discharged on the expiration of hostilities. Under this authority, the cavalry regiments have been strengthened, and a portion of them are now in the field pursuing the remnants of the Indians with whom they have been engaged during the summer. The estimates of the War Department are made up on the basis of the number of men authorized by law, and their requirements, as shown by years of experience, and also with the purpose, on the part of the bureau officers, to provide for all contingencies that may arise during the time for which the estimates are made. Exclusive of engineer estimates (presented in accordance with acts of Congress calling for surveys and estimates for improvements at various localities) the estimates now presented are about six millions in excess of the appropriations for the years 1874-'75 and 1875-'76. This increase is asked in order to provide for the increased cavalry force (should their services be necessary) to prosecute, economically, work upon important public buildings, to provide for armament of fortifications, and manufacture of small-arms, and to replenish the working-stock in the supply departments. The appropriations for these last named have, for the past few years, been so limited that the accumulations in store will be entirely exhausted during the present year, and it will be necessary to at once begin to replenish them.

I invite your especial attention to the following recommendations of the Secretary of War:

First. That the claims under the act of July 4, 1864, for supplies taken by the Army during the war, be removed from the offices of the Quartermaster and Commissary Generals and transferred to the southern claims commission. These claims are of precisely similar nature to those now before the southern claims commission, and the War Department bureaus have not the clerical force for their examination, nor proper machinery for investigating the loyalty of the claimants.

Second. That Congress sanction the scheme of an annuity fund for the benefit of the families of deceased officers and that it also provide for the permanent organization of the Signal Service both of which were recommended in my last annual message.

Third. That the manufacturing operations of the Ordnance Department be concentrated at three arsenals and an armory, and that the remaining arsenals be sold and the proceeds applied to this object by the Ordnance Department.

The appropriations for river and harbor improvements for the current year were $5,015,000. With my approval, the Secretary of War directed that, of this amount, $2,000,000 should be expended, and no new work should be begun and none prosecuted which were not of national importance. Subsequently this amount was increased to $2,237,600, and the works are now progressing on this basis.

The improvement of the South Pass of the Mississippi River under James B. Eads and his associates is progressing favorably. At the present time there is a channel of 20.3 feet in depth between the jetties at the mouth of the pass and 18½ feet at the head of the pass. Neither channel, however, has the width required before payments can be made by the United States. A commission of engineer officers is now examining these works and their reports will be presented as soon as received.

The report of the Secretary of the Navy shows that branch of the service to be in condition as effective as it is possible to keep it with the means and authority given the Department. It is, of course, not possible to rival the costly and progressive establishments of great European powers with the old material of our Navy, to which no increase has been authorized since the war, except the eight small cruisers built to supply the place of others which have gone to decay. Yet the most has been done that was possible with the means at command, and, by substantially rebuilding some of our old ships with durable material and completely repairing and refitting our monitor fleet, the Navy has been gradually so brought up that, though it does not maintain its relative position among the progressive navies of the world, it is now in a condition more powerful and effective than it ever has been in time of peace. The complete repairs of our five heavy iron-clads are only delayed on account of the inadequacy of the appropriations made last year for the working bureaus of the Department, which were actually less in amount than those made before the war, notwithstanding the greatly enhanced price of labor and materials and the increase in the cost of the naval service growing out of the universal use and great expense of steam-machinery. The money necessary for these repairs should be provided at once, that they may be completed without further unnecessary delay and expense.

When this is done, all the strength that there is in our Navy will be developed and useful to its full capacity, and it will be powerful for purposes of defense, and also for offensive action, should the necessity for that arise within a reasonable distance from our shores. The fact that our Navy is not more modern and powerful than it is, has been made a cause of complaint against the Secretary of the Navy, by persons who at the same time criticise and complain of his endeavors to bring the Navy that we have to its best and most efficient condition; but the good sense of the country will understand that it is really due to his practical action that we have at this time any effective naval force at command.

The report of the Postmaster-General shows the excess of expenditures (excluding expenditures on account of previous years) over receipts for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1876, to be $4,151,988.66.

Estimated expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, are	$36,723,432 43
Estimated revenue for same period is	30,645,165 00
Leaving estimated excess of expenditure to be appropriated as a deficiency of	6,078,267 43

The Postmaster-General, like his predecessor, is convinced that a change in the basis of adjusting the salaries of postmasters of the fourth class is necessary for the good of the service as well as for the interests of the Government, and urgently recommends that the compensation of the class of postmasters above mentioned be based upon the business of their respective offices, as ascertained from the sworn returns to the Auditor, of stamps canceled.

A few postmasters in the Southern States have expressed great apprehension of their personal safety, on account of their connection with the postal service, and have specially requested that their reports of apprehended danger should not be made public, lest it should result in the loss of their lives. But no positive testimony of interference has been submitted, except in the case of a mail messenger at Spartanburgh, in South Carolina, who reported that he had been violently driven away while in charge of the mails, on account of his political affiliations. An assistant superintendent of the railway mail service investigated this case, and reported that the messenger had disappeared from his post, leaving his work to be performed by a substitute. The Postmaster-General thinks that this case is sufficiently suggestive to justify him in recommending that a more severe punishment should be provided for the offense of assaulting any person in charge of the mails, or of retarding or otherwise obstructing them by threats of personal injury.

"A very gratifying result is presented in the fact that the deficiency of this department during the last fiscal year was reduced to $4,081,790.18, as against $6,169,938.88 of the preceding year. The difference can be traced to the large increase in its ordinary receipts (which greatly exceeded the estimates therefor) and a slight decrease in its expenditures."

The ordinary receipts of the Post-Office Department for the past seven fiscal years have increased at an average of over 8 per cent. per annum, while the increase of expenditures for the same period has been about 5.50 per cent. per annum, and the decrease of deficiency in the revenues has been at the rate of nearly 2 per cent. per annum.

The report of the Commissioner of Agriculture accompanying this message will be found one of great interest, marking as it does the great progress of the last century in the variety of products of the soil, increased knowledge and skill in the labor of producing, saving, and manipulating the same to prepare them for the use of man; in the improvements in machinery to aid the agriculturist in his labors, and in a knowledge of those scientific subjects necessary to a thorough system of economy in agricultural production, namely, chemistry, botany, entomology, &c. A study of this report by those interested in agriculture, and deriving their support from it, will find it of value in pointing out those articles which are raised in greater quantity than the needs of the world require, and must sell therefore for less than the cost of production; and those which command a profit over cost of production, because there is not an over-production. I call special attention to the need of the Department for a new gallery for the reception of the exhibits returned from the centennial exhibition, including the exhibits donated by very many foreign nations, and to the recommendations of the Commissioner of Agriculture, generally.

The reports of the District commissioners and the board of health are just received, too late to read them and to make recommendations thereon, and are herewith submitted.

The international exhibition held in Philadelphia this year in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of American independence has proved a great success, and will, no doubt, be of enduring advantage to the country. It has shown the great progress in the arts, sciences, and mechanical skill made in a single century and demonstrated that we are but little behind older nations in any one branch, while in some we scarcely have a rival. It has served, too, not only to bring peoples and products of skill and labor from all parts of the world together, but in bringing together people from all sections of our own country, which must prove a great benefit in the information imparted and pride of country engendered.

It has been suggested by scientists interested in and connected with the Smithsonian Institution, in a communication herewith, that the Government exhibit be removed to the capital and a suitable building be erected or purchased for its accommodation as a permanent exhibit. I earnestly recommend this; and, believing that Congress would second this view, I directed that all Government exhibits at the centennial exhibition should remain where they are, except such as might be injured by remaining in a building not intended as a protection in inclement weather or such as may be wanted by the Department furnishing them, until the question of permanent exhibition is acted on. Although the moneys appropriated by Congress to enable the participation of the several Executive Departments in the international exhibition of 1876 were not sufficient to carry out the undertaking to the full extent at first contemplated, it gives me pleasure to refer to the very efficient and creditable manner in which the board appointed from the several Departments to provide an exhibition on the part of the Government have discharged their duties with the funds placed at their command. Without a precedent to guide them in the preparation of such a display, the success of their labors was amply attested by the sustained attention which the contents of the Government building attracted during the period of the exhibition from both foreign and native visitors. I am strongly impressed with the value of the collection made by the Government for the purposes of the exhibition, illustrating as it does the mineral resources of the country, the statistical and practical evidences of our growth as a nation, and the uses of the mechanical arts and the applications of applied science in the administration of the affairs of government. Many nations have voluntarily contributed their exhibits to the United States to increase the interest in any permanent exhibition Congress may provide for. For this act of generosity they should receive the thanks of the people, and I respectfully suggest that a resolution of Congress to that effect be adopted.

The attention of Congress cannot be too earnestly called to the necessity of throwing some greater safeguard over the method of choosing and declaring the election of a President. Under the present system there seems to be no provided remedy for contesting the election in any one State. The remedy is partially, no doubt, in the enlightenment of electors. The compulsory support of the free school and the disenfranchisement of all who cannot read and write the English language—after a fixed probation—would meet my hearty approval. I would not make this apply, however, to those already voters, but I would to all becoming so after the expiration of the probation fixed upon. Foreigners coming to the country to become citizens who are educated in their own language would acquire the requisite knowledge of ours during the necessary residence to obtain naturalization. If they did not take interest enough in our language to acquire sufficient knowledge of it to enable them to study the institutions and laws of the country intelligently, I would not confer upon them the right to make such laws, nor to select those who do. I append to this message for convenient reference a synopsis of administrative events and of all recommendations to Congress made by me during the last seven years. Time may show some of these recommendations not to have been wisely conceived, but I believe the larger part will do no discredit to the administration.

One of these recommendations met with the united opposition of one political party in the Senate and with a strong opposition from the other, namely, the treaty for the annexation of Santo Domingo to the United States, to which I will specially refer, maintaining, as I do, that if my views had been concurred in the country would be in a more prosperous condition to-day, both politically and financially.

Santo Doming is fertile, and upon its soil may be grown just those tropical products of which the United States use so much and which are produced or prepared for market now by slave labor almost exclusively, namely: sugar, coffee, dye-woods, mahogany, tropical fruits, tobacco, &c. About 75 per cent. of the exports of Cuba are consumed in the United States. A large percentage of the exports of Brazil also find the same market. These are paid, for almost exclusively in coin, legislation, particularly in Cuba, being unfavorable to a mutual exchange of the products of each country. Flour shipped from the Mississippi River to Havana can pass by the very entrance to the city on its way to a port in Spain; then pays a duty fixed upon articles to be re-exported; transferred to a Spanish vessel and brought back almost to the point of starting, paying a second duty, and still leave a profit over what would be received by direct shipment. All that is produced in Cuba could be produced in Santo Domingo. Being a part of the United States, commerce between the island and main-land would be free. There would be no export duties on her shipments nor import duties on those coming here. There would be no import duties upon the supplies, machinery, &c., going from the States.

The effect that would have been produced upon Cuban commerce, with these advantages to a rival, is observable at a glance. The Cuban question would have been settled long ago in favor of "Free Cuba." Hundreds of American vessels would now be advantageously used in transporting the valuable woods and other products of the soil of the island to a market and in carrying supplies and emigrants to it. The island is but sparsely settled, while it has an area sufficient for the profitable employment of several millions of people. The soil would have soon fallen into the hands of United States capitalists. The products are so valuable in commerce that emigration there would have been encouraged; the emancipated race of the South would have found there a congenial home, where their civil rights would not be disputed and where their labor would be so much sought after that the poorest among them could have found the means to go. Thus in cases of great oppression and cruelty, such as have been practiced upon them in many places within the last eleven years, whole communities would have sought refuge in Santo Domingo. I do not suppose the whole race would have gone, nor is it desirable that they should go. Their labor is desirable—indispensable almost—where they now are. But the possession of this territory would have left the negro "master of the situation" by enabling him to demand his rights at home on pain of finding them elsewhere.

I do not present these views now as a recommendation for a renewal of the subject of annexation; but I do refer to it to vindicate my previous action in regard to it.

With the present term of Congress my official life terminates. It is not probable that public affairs will ever again receive attention from me further than as a citizen of the Republic, always taking a deep interest in the honor, integrity, and prosperity of the whole land.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, December 5, 1876.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

A Proclamation.

Whereas, by the first section of an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to accept for the citizens of United States the jurisdiction of certain tribunals in the Ottoman dominions, and Egypt, established, or to be established, under the authority of the Sublime Porte, and of the government of Egypt," approved March twenty-third, eighteen hundred and seventy-four, it was enacted as follows:

That whenever the President of the United States shall receive satisfactory information that the Ottoman government, or that of Egypt, has organized other tribunals on a basis likely to secure to citizens of the United States, in their dominions, the same impartial justice which they now enjoy there under the judicial functions exercised by the minister, consuls, and other functionaries of the United States, pursuant to the act of Congress approved the 22d of June, 1860, entitled "An act to carry into effect provisions of the treaties between the United States, China, Persia, and other countries, giving certain judicial powers to ministers and consuls, or other functionaries of the United States in those countries, and for other purposes, he is hereby authorized to suspend the operations of said acts as to the dominions in which such tribunals may be organized, so far as the jurisdiction of said tribunals may embrace matters now cognizable by the minister, consuls, or other functionaries of the United States in said dominions, and to notify the government of the Sublime Porte, or that of Egypt, or either of them, that the United States during such suspension will, as aforesaid, accept for their citizens the jurisdiction of the tribunals aforesaid over citizens of the United States which has heretofore been exercised by the minister, consuls, or other functionaries of the United States.

And whereas satisfactory information has been received by me that the government of Egypt has organized other tribunals on a basis likely to secure to citizens of the United States in the dominions subject to such government the impartial justice which they now enjoy there under the judicial functions exercised by the minister, consul, or other functionaries of the United States, pursuant to the said act of Congress, approved June 22, 1860:

Now, therefore, I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States of America, by virtue of the power and authority conferred upon me by the said act, approved March 23, 1874, do hereby suspend, during the pleasure of the President, the operation of the said act approved June 22, 1860, as to the said dominions, subject to the government of Egypt in which such tribunals have been organized, so far as the jurisdiction of said tribunals may embrace matters now cognizable by the minister, consuls, or other functionaries of the United States in said dominions, except as to cases actually commenced before the date hereof.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this twenty-seventh day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and [SEAL.] seventy-six, and of the Independence of the United States of America the one hundredth.

U. S. GRANT.

By the President:
HAMILTON FISH,
Secretary of State.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

A Proclamation.

Whereas the Congress of the United States did, by an act approved on the 3d day of March, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-five, authorize the inhabitants of the Territory of Colorado to form for themselves out of said Territory a State government with the name of the State of Colorado, and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States upon certain conditions in said act specified;

And whereas it was provided by said act of Congress that the convention elected by the people of said Territory to frame a State constitution should, when assembled for that purpose and after organization, declare on behalf of the people that they adopt the constitution of the United States, and should also provide by an ordinance irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of said State, that perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and that no inhabitant of said State shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship, and that the people inhabiting said Territory do agree and declare that they forever disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated public lands lying within said Territory, and that the same shall be and remain at the sole and entire disposition of the United States, and that the lands belonging to citizens of the United States residing without the said State shall never be taxed higher than the lands belonging to residents thereof, and that no taxes shall be imposed by the State on lands or property therein belonging to or which may hereafter be purchased by the United States;

And whereas it was further provided by said act that the constitution thus formed for the people of the Territory of Colorado should by an ordinance of the convention forming the same be submitted to the people of said Territory for ratification or rejection at an election to be held in the month of July, 1876, at which election the lawful voters of said new State should vote directly for or against the proposed constitution, and the returns of said election should be made to the acting governor of the Territory, who, with the chief-justice and United States attorney of said Territory, or any two of them, should canvass the same, and if a majority of legal votes should be cast for said constitution in said proposed State, the said acting governor should certify the same to the President of the United States, together with a copy of said constitution and ordinances; whereupon it should be the duty of the President of the United States to issue his proclamation declaring the State admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States without any further action whatever on the part of Congress;

And whereas it has been certified to me by the acting governor of said Territory of Colorado that within the time prescribed by said act of Congress a constitution for said proposed State has been adopted, and the same ratified by a majority of the legal voters of said proposed new State in accordance with the conditions prescribed by said act of Congress.

And whereas a duly authenticated copy of said constitution and of the declaration and ordinance required by said act has been received by me:

Now, therefore, I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States of America, do, in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress aforesaid, declare and proclaim the fact that the fundamental conditions imposed by Congress on the State of Colorado to entitle that State to admission to the Union have been ratified and accepted, and that the admission of the said State into the Union is now complete.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and have caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington this 1st day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-[SEAL.] six, and of the Independence of the United States of America the one hundred and first.

U. S. GRANT.

By the President:
HAMILTON FISH,
Secretary State.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

A Proclamation.

Whereas, by article 5 of a convention concluded at Washington upon the 30th day of January, 1875, between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, it was provided as follows, viz:

The present convention shall take effect as soon as it shall have been approved and proclaimed by His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands and shall have been ratified and duly proclaimed on the part of the Government of the United States, but not until a law to carry it into operation shall have been passed by the Congress of the United States of America. Such assent having been given and the ratifications of the convention having been exchanged as provided in article 6, the convention shall remain in force for seven years from the date at which it may come into operation; and further, until the expiration of twelve months after either of the high contracting parties shall give notice to the other of its wish to terminate the same; each of the high contracting parties being at liberty to give such notice to the other at the end of the said term of seven years or at any time thereafter.

And whereas such convention has been approved and proclaimed by His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, and has been ratified and duly proclaimed on the part of the United States, and a law to carry the same into operation has been passed by the Congress of the United States, and the ratifications of the convention have been exchanged as provided in article 6 thereof;

And whereas the Acting Secretary of State of the United States and His Majesty's envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary at Washington have recorded in a protocol a conference held by them at Washington on the 9th day of September, 1876, in the following language:

Whereas it is provided by article 5 of the convention between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands concerning commercial reciprocity, signed at Washington on the 30th day of January, 1875, as follows:

"ARTICLE V. The present convention shall take effect as soon as it shall have been approved and proclaimed by His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, and shall have been ratified and duly proclaimed on the part of the Government of the United States, but not until the law to carry it into operation shall have been passed by the Congress of the United States of America. Such assent having been given and the ratifications of the convention having been exchanged as provided in article 6, the convention shall remain in force for seven years from the date at which it may come into operation; and further, until the expiration of twelve months after either of the high contracting parties shall give notice to the other of its wish to terminate the same; each of the high contracting parties being at liberty to give such notice to the other at the end of the said term of seven years or at any time thereafter;"

And whereas the said convention has been approved and proclaimed by His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, and has been ratified and duly proclaimed on the part of the Government of the United States;

And whereas an act was passed by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, entitled "An act to carry into effect a convention between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, signed on the 30th day of January, 1875," which was approved on the 15th day of August in the year 1876;

And whereas an act was passed by the Legislative Assembly of the Hawaiian Islands, entitled "An act to carry into effect a convention between His Majesty the King and the United States of America, signed at Washington on the 30th day of January, 1875," which was duly approved on the 18th day of July in the year 1876;

And whereas the ratifications of the said convention have been exchanged as provided in article 6:

The undersigned, William Hunter, acting Secretary of State of the United States of America, and Hon. Elisha H. Allen, chief justice of the supreme court, chancellor of the kingdom, member of the privy council of state, and His Majesty's envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the United States of America, duly authorized for this purpose by their respective Governments, have met together at Washington, and having found the said convention has been approved and proclaimed by His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands and has been ratified and duly proclaimed on the part of the Government of the United States, and that the laws required to carry the said treaty into operation have been passed by the Congress of the United States of America on the one part and by the Legislative Assembly of the Hawaiian Islands on the other, hereby declare that the convention aforesaid concluded between the United States of America and his Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands on the 30th day of January, 1875, will take effect on the date hereof.

Now, therefore, I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States of America, in pursuance of the premises, do declare that the said convention has been approved and proclaimed by His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, and been ratified and duly proclaimed on the part of the Government of the United States, and that the necessary legislation has been passed to carry the same into effect, and that the ratifications of the Convention have been exchanged as provided in article 6.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done in the city of Washington this ninth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-six, and of the Independence of the United States of America [SEAL.] the one hundred and first.

U. S. GRANT.

By the President:
W. HUNTER,
Acting Secretary of State.

The diplomatic correspondence referred to in the message being in print will be so transmitted to the Senate and House of Representatives.

RECOMMENDATIONS AND EVENTS.

FIRST ANNUAL MESSAGE, DECEMBER 6, 1869.

Gradual return to specie payments.

"I earnestly recommend to you, then, such legislation as will insure a gradual return to specie payments and put an immediate stop to fluctuations in the value of currency."

Six and 5 per cent. United States bonds due and coming due "may be replaced by bonds bearing a rate of interest not exceeding 4½ per cent.," and also suggesting the "propriety of redeeming currency at market value, at the time the law goes into effect, increasing the rate at which currency shall be bought and sold, from day to day, or week to week, at the same rate of interest as Government pays upon its bonds."

Renewal of income tax.

"I also suggest the renewal of the tax on incomes, but at a reduced rate, say of 3 per cent., and this tax to expire in three years."

Enslavement of Chinese.

Advising "such legislation as will forever preclude the enslavement of the Chinese upon our soil under the name of coolies, and also prevent American vessels from engaging in the transportation of coolies to any country tolerating the system."

Recommending that the mission to China be raised to one of the first class.

Total repeal of tenure-of-office acts.

Indian policy.

Management of a few reservations of Indians given to Society of Friends, and selection of agents thrown upon them. For superintendents and Indian agents, not on reservations, officers of the Army selected. As a substitute for old system, suggests, the placing of all Indians on large reservations, giving them absolute protection there, and inducing them, as soon as they are fitted for it, to take their lands in severalty and to set up territorial governments for their own protection.

Special attention of Congress called to recommendation of the Postmaster-General for total abolition of franking privilege; and also to that of Secretary of War for repeal of act March 3, 1869, prohibiting promotions and appointments in staff corps of the Army.

SECOND ANNUAL MESSAGE, DECEMBER 5, 1870.

San Domingo.

Treaty for annexation of, rejected, and suggesting that by joint resolution of Congress the Executive be authorized to appoint a commission to negotiate a treaty for the acquisition of the island.

Tien-Tsin massacre.

France and North Germany invited to make an authorized suspension of hostilities in the East, and to act together for the future protection in China of the lives and properties of Americans and Europeans.

Slave trade.

Ratifications of treaty with Great Britain for abolishing the mixed courts for suppression of slave trade, and of the naturalization convention between that country and the United States—exchanged.

Boundary line.

Boundary line between the United States and British Possessions discovered to be 4,700 feet south of true position of forty-ninth parallel, leaving Hudson's Bay Company at Pembina within territory of the United States. Joint commission of the two governments proposed, to fix definitely the boundary line.

Alabama claims.

Regrets that no conclusion has been reached for the adjustment of Alabama claims, and recommends that Congress authorize appointment of a commission to take proof of amounts and ownership of claims, &c.

Anticipating that an attempt may possibly be made by Canadian authorities in the coming season to repeat unneighborly acts toward American fishermen; recommends that authority be conferred upon the Executive to suspend by proclamation operation of laws authorizing transit of goods, &c., in bond across United States territory to Canada, and should an extreme measure become necessary, the suspension of the operation of any laws whereby Canadian vessels are permitted to enter the waters of the United States.

Manifestation on the part of Canada to exclude United States citizens from the navigation of the Saint Lawrence. It is hoped that Great Britain will see the justice of abandoning the narrow and inconsistent claim to which her Canadian provinces have urged her adherence.

Recommends a liberal policy toward American steamers plying between the Pacific States and China and Japan, and encouragement, even if it should be at some cost to the national Treasury, of American ship-building.

Recommends an appropriation for the construction of a building for the State Department.

Recommends the transfer from State to Interior Department of all powers and duties in relation to the Territories, and from the Interior to the War Department the Pension Bureau.

Recommends the payment of naval pensions by one of the bureaus of Navy Department.

Congress should look to a policy which would place our currency at par with gold at no distant day.

Taxes.

Tax collected from the people reduced more than $80,000,000 per annum.

Suggests that revenue-stamps be dispensed by postmasters, and a tax on liquors and tobacco, and the imposition of duty only on luxuries.

Recommends an appropriation for a new War Department building, and a reform in the entire civil service of the country.

The experiment of making the management of Indian affairs a missionary work found to work most advantageously. Submits as a question worthy of serious consideration whether the residue of our national domain should not be wholly disposed of under the provisions of the homestead and pre-emption laws.

Land-grant subsidies.

"The United States should not loan their credit in aid of any enterprise undertaken by States or corporations, nor grant lands in any instance, unless the projected work is of acknowledged national importance. I am strongly inclined to the opinion that it is inexpedient and unnecessary to bestow subsidies of either description; but should Congress determine otherwise, I earnestly recommend that the rights of settlers and of the public be more effectually secured and protected by appropriate legislation."

Untrammeled ballot.

Where every man entitled to cast a vote may do so, just once, at each election, without fear of molestation or proscription on account of his political faith, nativity, or color.

THIRD ANNUAL MESSAGE.

"I recommend Congress at an early day to make the necessary provision for the tribunal at Geneva, and for the several commissioners, on the part of the United States, called for by the treaty."

* * * * * * *

"I recommend the legislation necessary on the part of the United States to bring into operation the articles of the treaty relating to the fisheries, and to the other matters touching the relations of the United States toward the British North American possessions, to become operative so soon as the proper legislation shall be had on the part of Great Britain and its possessions."

* * * * * * *

"I have addressed a communication * * * to the governors of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, and Wisconsin, urging upon the governments of those States, respectively, the necessary action on their part to carry into effect the object of the article of the treaty which contemplates the use of the canals, on either side, connected with the navigation of the lakes and rivers forming the boundary, on terms of equality by the inhabitants of both countries."

* * * * * * *

"I renew the recommendation for an appropriation for determining the true position of the forty-ninth parallel of latitude where it forms the boundary between the United States and the British North American possessions, between the Lake of the Woods and the summit of the Rocky Mountains. The early action of Congress on this recommendation would put it in the power of the War Department to place a force in the field during the next summer."

* * * * * * *

"The resumption of diplomatic relations between France and Germany has enabled me to give directions for the withdrawal of the protection extended to Germans in France by the diplomatic and consular representatives of the United States in that country."

* * * * * * *

"The ratifications of the consular and naturalization conventions with the Austro-Hungarian Empire have been exchanged."

"The ratifications of the new treaty of commerce between the United States and Italy have been exchanged. The two powers have agreed in this treaty that private property at sea shall be exempt from capture in case of war between the two powers."

* * * * * * *

"The Forty-first Congress at its third session made an appropriation for the organization of a mixed commission for adjudicating upon the claims of citizens of the United States against Spain growing out of the insurrection in Cuba. That commission has since been organized."

* * * * * * *

"It has been made the agreeable duty of the United States to preside over a conference at Washington between the plenipotentiaries of Spain and the allied South American republics, which has resulted in an armistice, with the reasonable assurance of a permanent peace."

"The intimate friendly relations which have so long existed between the United States and Russia continue undisturbed."

* * * * * * *

With Japan we continue to maintain intimate relations.

* * * * * * *

Our minister at Peking instructed to endeavor to conclude a convention with Corea, Admiral Rodgers to accompany him. The party were attacked, and after punishing the criminals, the expedition returned, not concluding the convention. Subject left for such action as Congress may see fit to take.

"The Republic of Mexico has not yet repealed the very objectionable laws establishing what is known as the Free Zone," &c.

* * * * * * *

"I recommend some action by Congress regarding the overdue installments under the award of the Venezuelan claims commission of 1866."

* * * * * * *

"The ratification of an extradition treaty with Nicaragua has been exchanged."

Congratulation that Brazil has taken steps to abolish slavery.

Regrets that Spain has failed to carry out its promised reforms in this direction.

Attention directed to the fact that citizens of the United States are large holders of slaves in foreign lands.

Recommends that Congress provide a remedy against the holding, owning, &c., of slaves by citizens of the United States.

Disturbed condition of affairs in the island of Cuba.

Recommends that an appropriation be made to support four American youths, to serve with our ministers in Japan and China, and liberal support to American lines of steamers now plying between San Francisco and Japan and China, and the Australian line.

Extent of reduction of the national debt. Modification of tariff and revenue laws recommended: "I recommend that all taxes from internal sources be abolished, except those collected from * * * liquors, tobacco, * * * and from stamps."

Suggestions—in view of a re-adjustment of the tariff.

Attention invited to subject of moieties.

Continued fluctuations in gold: "If the question can be met as to how to give a fixed value to our currency * * * a very desirable object will be gained."

Recommendations for filling vacancies in the staff corps of the Army.

The suggestions in report of Secretary of the Navy as to the necessity for increasing and improving the matériel of the Navy, and the plan recommended for reducing the personnel of the service to a peace standard, &c., deserve the thoughtful attention of Congress.

"I also recommend that all promotions in the Navy above the rank of captain be by selection instead of by seniority."

Suggestions of the Postmaster-General for improvements in his Department recommended to special attention.

"I recommend * * * plan for uniting the telegraphic system of the United States with the postal system."

Execution of act approved April 20, 1871, known as the Ku-Klux law in South Carolina.

Suggestions in relation to polygamy in Utah.

"I recommend liberal appropriations to carry out the Indian peace policy," * * * and granting a territorial government to Indians in Indian Territory.

"I renew my recommendation that the public lands be regarded as a heritage to our children."

Attention invited to subject of compensation to heads of bureaus and officials holding positions of responsibility, &c.

The removal of disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment.

Organization of territorial government in the District of Columbia, act of February 21, 1871. Liberal appropriations recommended.

Appropriation recommended for purchase of remainder of square in Chicago on which burned public buildings stood, and for erection of new buildings.

Congressional action suggested for protection of immigrants.

Civil service reform.

FOURTH ANNUAL MESSAGE, DECEMBER 2, 1872.

Alabama claims.

The tribunal which convened at Geneva on the 14th of September last (1872,) awarded the sum of $15,500,000, in gold, as the indemnity to be paid by Great Britain for the satisfaction of all claims referred to its consideration.

Treaty of Washington, June 15, 1846—United States and Great Britain boundary line.

Treaty of Washington, United States, and Great Britain, construction of treaty of June 15, 1846, defining the boundary line between their respective territories, submitted to the arbitration and award of His Majesty the Emperor of Germany, who, on the 21st of October last (1872,) signed his award in writing to the effect that it should be drawn through the Haro Channel, which leaves us for the first time in the United States as a nation, without a question of disputed boundary between our territory and the possessions of Great Britain on this continent.

Treaty of Washington May 8, 1871, relating to fisheries, &c.

"In my last annual message, I recommended the legislation necessary on the part of the United States to bring into operation the articles of the Treaty of Washington, of May 8, 1871, relating to the fisheries, and to other matters touching the relations of the United States toward the British North American Possessions, to become operative so soon as the proper legislation should be had on the part of Great Britain and its possessions. This question has since been disposed of, the imperial parliament and the legislatures of the provincial governments have passed laws to carry the provisions of the treaty on the matters referred to, into operation. I therefore recommend your early adoption of the legislation in the same direction necessary on the part of this Government."

Boundary line between Lake of the Woods and Rocky Mountains, United States and British possessions.

Recommends that the force be increased in order to the completion of the survey and determination of the boundary line between the United States and the British Possessions, between Lake of the Woods and the Rocky Mountains.

"To this end I recommend a sufficient appropriation be made."

Depredations on Texan frontier.

"The commissioners appointed pursuant to joint resolution of Congress on the 7th of May last (1872) to inquire into the depredations upon the Texan frontier have diligently made investigations in that quarter. Their researches were necessarily incomplete, partly on account of limited appropriation made by Congress."

"I recommend that a special appropriation be made to enable the commissioners on the part of the United States to return to their labors without delay."

Cuba.

"It is with regret that I have again to announce a continuance of the disturbed condition of the Island of Cuba. * * * The parties stand apparently in the same relative attitude which they have occupied for a long time past. * * * I cannot doubt that the continued maintenance of slavery in Cuba is among the strongest inducements to the continuance of this strife. A terrible wrong is the natural cause of a terrible evil. The abolition of slavery and the introduction of other reforms in the administration or government of Cuba could not fail to advance the restoration of peace and order." * * *

"In my last annual message I referred to this subject, and I again recommend such legislation as may be proper to denounce and, if not prevent, at least to discourage American citizens from holding or dealing in slaves."

Venezuela.

"It is with regret, however, I announce that the government of Venezuela has made no further payments on account of the awards under the convention of April 25, 1866. This subject is again recommended to the attention of Congress for such action as may be deemed proper."

Japan and China.

"Our treaty relations with Japan remain unchanged. The embassy which visited this country during the year (1872) that is passing, being unprovided with powers for the signing of a convention in this country, no conclusion in that direction was reached. In this connection, I renew my recommendation of one year ago, that 'to give importance and to add to the efficiency of our diplomatic relations with Japan and China, and to further aid in retaining the good opinion of those peoples, and to secure to the United States its share of the commerce destined to flow between those nations and the balance of the commercial world, an appropriation be made to support at least four American youths in each of those countries, to serve as a part of the official family of our ministers there.' Our representatives would not even then be placed upon an equality with the representatives of Great Britain and of some other powers. As now situated our representatives in Japan and China have to depend for interpreters and translators upon natives of those countries who know our language imperfectly, or procure for the occasion the services of employés in foreign business houses or the interpreters to other foreign ministers."

"I renew the recommendation made on a previous occasion of the transfer to the Department of the Interior of all the powers and duties in relation to the Territories with which the Department of State is now charged by law or by custom."

Congressional appropriation recommended for the relief of citizens of the United States in distress abroad.

"Congress, from the beginning of the Government, has wisely made provision for the relief of distressed seamen in foreign countries. No similar provision, however, has hitherto been made for the relief of citizens in distress abroad, other than seamen. A similar authority, and an appropriation to carry it into effect, are recommended in the case of citizens of the United States destitute, or sick, under such circumstances.

War Department.

"The report of the Secretary of War, showing expenditures of the War Department for fiscal year ending June 30, 1871, and for fiscal year ending June 30, 1872, showing a reduction in favor of the last fiscal year of $427,834.62."

* * * * * * *

"The attention of Congress will be called during its present session to various enterprises for the more certain and cheaper transportation of the constantly increasing surplus of western and southern products to the Atlantic seaboard."

* * * * * * *

Navy Department.

"I recommend careful consideration by Congress of the recommendations made by the Secretary of the Navy."

* * * * * * *

Interior Department.

Territories: "I recommend a careful revision of the present laws of the Territory of Utah, and the enactment of such a law (the one proposed in Congress at its last session, or something similar to it,) as will secure peace, the equality of all citizens before the law, and the ultimate extinguishment of polygamy."

Civil service.

Hopes that "Congress may reach a satisfactory solution of this question, and secure to the public service, for all time, a practical method of obtaining faithful and efficient officers and employés."

FIFTH ANNUAL MESSAGE, DECEMBER 1, 1873.

Geneva award.

"The money awarded to the United States by the tribunal of arbitration at Geneva was paid by Her Majesty's government a few days in advance of the time when it would have become payable according to the terms of the treaty. In compliance with the provisions of the act of March 3, 1873, it was at once paid into the Treasury, and used to redeem, so far as it might, the public debt of the United States; and the amount so redeemed was invested in a 5 per cent. registered bond of the United States for $15,500,000, which is now held by the Secretary of State, subject to the future disposition of Congress."

Alabama, Florida, and Shenandoah losses.

"I renew my recommendation, made at the opening of the last session of Congress, that a commission be created for the purpose of auditing and determining the amounts of the several 'direct losses growing out of the destruction of vessels and their cargoes' by the Alabama, the Florida, or the Shenandoah, after leaving Melbourne, for which the sufferers have received no equivalent or compensation, and of ascertaining the names of the persons entitled to receive compensation for the same, making the computations upon the basis indicated by the tribunal of arbitration at Geneva; and that payment of such losses be authorized to an extent not to exceed the awards of the tribunal at Geneva."

Northwest water-boundary of the United States.

"By an act approved on the 14th day of February last, Congress made provision for completing, jointly with an officer or commissioner to be named by Her Britannic Majesty, the determination of so much of the boundary line between the territory of the United States and the possessions of Great Britain as was left uncompleted by the commissioners appointed under the act of Congress of August 11, 1856. Under the provisions of this act the northwest water-boundary of the United States has been determined and marked in accordance with the award of the Emperor of Germany. A protocol and a copy of the map upon which the line was thus marked are contained in the papers submitted herewith."

The Ottoman government and Egypt.

"The Ottoman government and that of Egypt have latterly shown a disposition to relieve foreign consuls of the judicial powers which heretofore they have exercised in the Turkish dominions, by organizing other tribunals. As Congress, however, has by law provided for the discharge of judicial functions by consuls of the United States in that quarter under the treaty of 1830, I have not felt at liberty formally to accept the proposed change without the assent of Congress, whose decision upon the subject, at as early a period as may be convenient, is earnestly requested."

Protectorate for Santo Domingo.

"I transmit herewith for the consideration and determination of Congress an application of the republic of Santo Domingo to this Government to exercise a protectorate over that republic."

Expatriation and the election of nationality.

"I invite Congress now to mark out and define when and how expatriation can be accomplished; to regulate by law the condition of American women marrying foreigners; to fix the status of children born in a foreign country of American parents residing more or less permanently abroad, and to make rules for determining such other kindred points as may seem best to Congress."

"I invite the earnest attention of Congress to the existing laws of the United States respecting expatriation and the election of nationality by individuals. Many citizens of the United States reside permanently abroad with their families. Under the provisions of the act approved February 10, 1855, the children of such persons are to be deemed and taken to be citizens of the United States, but the rights of citizenship are not to descend to persons whose fathers never resided in the United States."

Virginius seizure.

"Pending negotiations between the United States and the government of Spain on the subject of this capture, I have authorized the Secretary of the Navy to put our Navy on a war footing, to the extent, at least, of the entire annual appropriation for that branch of the service, trusting to Congress and the public opinion of the American people to justify my action."

Constitutional amendments.

"Assuming from the action of the last Congress, in appointing a 'Committee on Privileges and Elections,' to prepare and report to this Congress a constitutional amendment to provide a better method of electing the President and Vice-President of the United States, and also from the necessity of such an amendment that there will be submitted to the State Legislatures, for ratification, such an improvement in our Constitution, I suggest two others for your consideration:

"First. To authorize the Executive to approve of so much of any measure passing the two Houses of Congress as his judgment may dictate, without approving the whole, the disapproved portion, or portions, to be subjected to the same rules as now, to wit, to be referred back to the House in which the measure, or measures, originated, and if passed by a two-thirds vote of the two Houses, then to become a law without the approval of the President. I would add to this a provision that there should be no legislation by Congress during the last twenty-four hours of its sittings, except upon vetoes, in order to give the Executive an opportunity to examine and approve or disapprove bills understandingly.

"Second. To provide, by amendment, that when an extra session of Congress is convened by Executive proclamation, legislation during the continuance of such extra session shall be confined to such subjects as the Executive may bring before it, from time to time, in writing.

"The advantages to be gained by these two amendments are too obvious for me to comment upon them. One session in each year is provided for by the Constitution, in which there are no restrictions as to the subjects of legislation by Congress. If more are required, it is always in the power of Congress, during their term of office, to provide for sessions at any time. The first of these amendments would protect the public against the many abuses, and waste of public moneys, which creep into appropriation bills, and other important measures passing during the expiring hours of Congress, to which, otherwise, due consideration cannot be given."

Specie payments—Elastic currency—Panic of 1873.

"My own judgment is that, however much individuals may have suffered, one long step has been taken toward specie payments; that we can never have permanent prosperity until a specie basis is reached; and that a specie basis cannot be reached and maintained until our exports, exclusive of gold, pay for our imports, interest due abroad, and other specie obligations, or so nearly so as to leave an appreciable accumulation of the precious metals in the country from the products of our mines.

"Elasticity in our monetary system, therefore, is the object to be attained first, and next to that, as far as possible, a prevention of the use of other people's money in stock and other species of speculation. To prevent the latter, it seems to me that one great step would be taken by prohibiting the national banks from paying interest on deposits, by requiring them to hold their reserves in their own vaults, and by forcing them into resumption, though it would only be in legal-tender notes. For this purpose I would suggest the establishment of clearing-houses for your consideration.

"To secure the former many plans have been suggested, most, if not all, of which look to me more like inflation on the one hand, or compelling the Government, on the other, to pay interest, without corresponding benefits, upon the surplus funds of the country during the seasons when otherwise unemployed.

"I submit for your consideration whether this difficulty might not be overcome by authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue, at any time, to national banks of issue, any amount of their own notes below a fixed percentage of their issue, say 40 per cent., upon the banks depositing with the Treasurer of the United States an amount of Government bonds equal to the amount of notes demanded, the banks to forfeit to the Government, say 4 per cent. of the interest accruing on the bonds so pledged during the time they remain with the Treasurer, as security for the increased circulation, the bonds so pledged to be redeemable by the banks at their pleasure, either in whole or in part, by returning their own bills for cancellation to an amount equal to the face of the bonds withdrawn. I would further suggest for your consideration the propriety of authorizing national banks to diminish their standing issue at pleasure, by returning for cancellation their own bills, and withdrawing so many United States bonds as are pledged for the bills returned.

"In any modification of the present laws regulating national banks, as a further step toward preparing for resumption of specie payments, I invite your attention to a consideration of the propriety of exacting from them the retention, as a part of their reserve, either the whole or a part of the gold interest accruing upon the bonds pledged as security for their issue. I have not reflected enough on the bearing this might have in producing a scarcity of coin with which to pay duties on imports to give it my positive recommendation. But your attention is invited to the subject."

Interstate canals—with Government aid.

"There is one work, however, of a national character, in which the greater portion of the East and the West, the North and the South, are equally interested, to which I will invite your attention.

"The State of New York has a canal connecting Lake Erie with tide-water on the Hudson River. The State of Illinois has a similar work connecting Lake Michigan with navigable water on the Illinois River, thus making water-communication inland, between the East and the West and South. These great artificial water-courses are the property of the States through which they pass, and pay toll to those States. Would it not be wise statesmanship to pledge these States that if they will open these canals for the passage of large vessels the General Government will look after, and keep in navigable condition, the great public highways with which they connect, to wit, the overslaugh on the Hudson, the Saint Clair Flats, and the Illinois and Mississippi Rivers? This would be a national work; one of great value to the producers of the West and South in giving them cheap transportation for their produce to the sea-board and a market; and to the consumers in the East in giving them cheaper food, particularly of those articles of food which do not find a foreign market, and the prices of which, therefore, are not regulated by foreign demand. The advantages of such a work are too obvious for argument. I submit the subject to you, therefore, without further comment."

Exploration of Amazon and Madeira Rivers.

"In attempting to regain our lost commerce and carrying-trade, I have heretofore called attention to the states south of us offering a field where much might be accomplished. To further this object I suggest that a small appropriation be made, accompanied with authority for the Secretary of the Navy to fit out a naval vessel to ascend the Amazon River to the mouth of the Madeira; thence to explore that river and its tributaries into Bolivia, and to report to Congress at its next session, or as soon as practicable, the accessibility of the country by water, its resources, and the population so reached. Such an exploration would cost but little; it can do no harm, and may result in establishing a trade of value to both nations.

"In further connection with the Treasury Department I would recommend a revision and codification of the tariff laws, and the opening of more mints for coining money, with authority to coin for such nations as may apply.

"While inviting your general attention to all the recommendations made by the Secretary of War, there are two which I would especially invite you to consider: First, the importance of preparing for war in time of peace by providing proper armament for our sea-coast defenses. Proper armament is of vastly more importance than fortifications. The latter can be supplied very speedily for temporary purposes when needed; the former cannot. The second is the necessity of re-opening promotion in the staff corps of the Army. Particularly is this necessity felt in the Medical, Pay, and Ordnance Departments.

"I invite the favorable consideration of Congress to the suggestions and recommendations of the Postmaster-General for an extension of the free-delivery system in all cities having a population of not less than ten thousand; for the prepayment of postage on newspapers and other printed matter of the second class; for a uniform postage and limit of weight on miscellaneous matter; for adjusting the compensation of all postmasters, not appointed by the President, by the old method of commissions on the actual receipts of the office, instead of the present mode of fixing the salary in advance upon special returns; and especially do I urge favorable action by Congress on the important recommendations of the Postmaster-General for the establishment of United States postal savings depositories.

"Your attention is also again called to a consideration of the question of postal telegraphs, and the arguments adduced in support thereof, in the hope that you may take such action in connection therewith as in your judgment will most contribute to the best interests of the country."

Utah.

"To prevent anarchy there, it is absolutely necessary that Congress provide the courts with some mode of obtaining jurors, and I recommend legislation to that end; and also that the probate courts of the Territory, now assuming to issue writs of injunction and habeas corpus, and to try criminal cases and questions as to land-titles, be denied all jurisdiction not possessed ordinarily by courts of that description."

Bankruptcy and fictitious claims.

"I recommend that so much of said act as provides for involuntary bankruptcy on account of the suspension of payment be repealed.

"Your careful attention is invited to the subject of claims against the Government, and to the facilities afforded by existing laws for their prosecution. Each of the Departments of State, Treasury, and War have demands for many millions of dollars upon their files, and they are rapidly accumulating. To these may be added those now pending before Congress, the Court of Claims, and the southern claims commission, making in the aggregate an immense sum. Most of these grow out of the rebellion, and are intended to indemnify persons on both sides for their losses during the war; and not a few of them are fabricated and supported by false testimony. Projects are on foot, it is believed, to induce Congress to provide for new classes of claims, and to revive old ones through the repeal or modification of the statute of limitations, by which they are now barred. I presume these schemes, if proposed, will be received with little favor by Congress, and I recommend that persons having claims against the United States, cognizable by any tribunal or department thereof, be required to present them at an early day, and that legislation be directed as far as practicable to the defeat of unfounded and unjust demands upon the Government; and I would suggest, as a means of preventing fraud, that witnesses be called upon to appear in person to testify before those tribunals having said claims before them for adjudication. Probably the largest saving to the national Treasury can be secured by timely legislation on these subjects of any of the economic measures that will be proposed."

Support of Indians east of Rocky Mountains.

"As a preparatory step for this consummation, I am now satisfied that a territorial form of government should be given them, which will secure the treaty rights of the original settlers, and protect their homesteads from alienation for a period of twenty years."

Census.

"It is believed, however, that a regular census every five years would be of substantial benefit to the country, inasmuch as our growth hitherto has been so rapid that the results of the decennial census are necessarily unreliable as a basis of estimates for the latter years of a decennial period."

Colorado—and irrigation from eastern slope of Rocky Mountains to Missouri River.

"I would recommend for your favorable consideration the passage of an enabling act for the admittance of Colorado as a State in the Union. It possesses all the elements of a prosperous State, agricultural and mineral, and, I believe, has a population now to justify such admission. In connection with this, I would also recommend the encouragement of a canal for purposes of irrigation from the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains to the Missouri River. As a rule, I am opposed to further donations of public lands for internal improvements, owned and controlled by private corporations, but in this instance I would make an exception."

Civil-service reform.

"In three successive messages to Congress I have called attention to the subject of 'civil-service reform.'

"Action has been taken so far as to authorize the appointment of a board to devise rules governing methods of making appointments and promotions, but there never has been any action making these rules, or any rules, binding, or even entitled to observance where persons desire the appointment of a friend, or the removal of an official who may be disagreeable to them.

"To have any rules effective they must have the acquiescence of Congress as well as of the Executive. I commend, therefore, the subject to your attention, and suggest that a special committee of Congress might confer with the civil-service board during the present session for the purpose of devising such rules as can be maintained, and which will secure the services of honest and capable officials, and which will also protect them in a degree of independence while in office.

"Proper rules will protect Congress, as well as the Executive, from much needless persecution, and will prove of great value to the public at large."

"I renew my previous recommendation to Congress for general amnesty. The number engaged in the late rebellion yet laboring under disabilities is very small, but enough to keep up a constant irritation. No possibly danger can accrue to the Government by restoring them to eligibility to hold office.

"I suggest for your consideration the enactment of a law to better secure the civil rights which freedom should secure, but has not effectually secured, to the enfranchised slave."

SIXTH ANNUAL MESSAGE, DECEMBER 7, 1874.

Resumption of specie payments.

"In view of the pledges of the American Congress when our present legal-tender system was adopted, and debt contracted, there should be no delay—certainly no unnecessary delay—in fixing, by legislation, a method by which we will return to specie. To the accomplishment of this end I invite your special attention. I believe, firmly, that there can be no prosperous and permanent revival of business and industries until a policy is adopted—with legislation to carry it out—looking to a return to a specie basis. It is easy to conceive that the debtor and speculative classes may think it of value to them to make so-called money abundant until they can throw a portion of their burdens upon others. But even these, I believe, would be disappointed in the result if a course should be pursued which will keep in doubt the value of the legal-tender medium of exchange. A revival of productive industry is needed by all classes; by none more than the holders of property, of whatever sort, with debts to liquidate from realization upon its sale. But admitting that these two classes of citizens are to be benefited by expansion, would it be honest to give it? Would not the general loss be too great to justify such relief? Would it not be just as honest and prudent to authorize each debtor to issue his own legal-tenders to the extent of his liabilities? Than to do this would it not be safer—for fear of over-issues by unscrupulous creditors—to say that all debt obligations are obliterated in the United States, and now we commence anew, each possessing all he has at the time free from incumbrance? These propositions are too absurd to be entertained for a moment by thinking or honest people. Yet every delay in preparation for final resumption partakes of this dishonesty, and is only less in degree as the hope is held out that a convenient season will at last arrive for the good work of redeeming our pledges to commence. It will never come, in my opinion, except by positive action by Congress, or by national disasters which will destroy, for a time at least, the credit of the individual and the state at large. A sound currency might be reached by total bankruptcy and discredit of the integrity of the nation and of individuals. I believe it is in the power of Congress at this session to devise such legislation as will renew confidence, revive all the industries, start us on a career of prosperity to last for many years, and to save the credit of the nation and of the people. Steps toward the return to a specie basis are the great requisites to this devoutly to be sought for end. There are others which I may touch upon hereafter."

"It is the duty of Congress to devise the method of correcting the evils which are acknowledged to exist, and not mine. But I will venture to suggest two or three things which seem to me as absolutely necessary to a return to specie payments, the first great requisite in a return to prosperity. The legal-tender clause to the law authorizing the issue of currency by the National Government should be repealed, to take effect as to all contracts entered into after a day fixed in the repealing act; not to apply, however, to payments of salaries by Government, or for other expenditures now provided by law to be paid in currency in the interval pending between repeal and final resumption. Provision should be made by which the Secretary of the Treasury can obtain gold as it may become necessary from time to time from the date when specie redemption commences. To this might and should be added a revenue sufficiently in excess of expenses to insure an accumulation of gold in the Treasury to sustain permanent redemption.

"I commend this subject to your careful consideration, believing that a favorable solution is attainable, and if reached by this Congress that the present and future generations will ever gratefully remember it as their deliverer from a thraldom of evil and disgrace."

"With resumption, free banking may be authorized with safety, giving the same full protection to bill-holders which they have under existing laws. Indeed, I would regard free banking as essential. It would give proper elasticity to the currency. As more currency should be required for the transaction of legitimate business, new banks would be started, and, in turn, banks would wind up their business when it was found that there was a superabundance of currency. The experience and judgment of the people can best decide just how much currency is required for the transaction of the business of the country. It is unsafe to leave the settlement of this question to Congress, the Secretary of the Treasury, or the Executive. Congress should make the regulation under which banks may exist, but should not make banking a monopoly by limiting the amount of redeemable paper currency that shall be authorized. Such importance do I attach to this subject and so earnestly do I commend it to your attention that I give it prominence by introducing it at the beginning of this message."

Chinese immigration.

"In connection with this subject I call the attention of Congress to a generally-conceded fact: that the great proportion of the Chinese immigrants who come to our shores do not come voluntarily to make their homes with us and their labor productive of general prosperity, but come under contracts with head-men who own them almost absolutely. In a worse form does this apply to Chinese women. Hardly a perceptible percentage of them perform any honorable labor, but they are brought for shameful purposes, to the disgrace of the communities where settled and to the great demoralization of youth of those localities. If this evil practice can be legislated against, it will be my pleasure as well as duty to enforce any regulation to secure so desirable an end."

Japanese indemnity fund.

"I submit the propriety of applying the income of a part if not of the whole of this fund to the education in the Japanese language of a number of young men to be under obligations to serve the Government for a specified time as interpreters at the legation and the consulates in Japan. A limited number of Japanese youths might at the same time be educated in our own vernacular, and mutual benefits would result to both governments. The importance of having our own citizens, competent and familiar with the language of Japan, to act as interpreters and in other capacities connected with the legation and the consulates in that country, cannot readily be overestimated."

Claims of aliens against the United States.

"In this connection, I renew my recommendation, made at the opening of the last session of Congress, that a special court be created to hear and determine all claims of aliens against the United States arising from acts committed against their persons or property during the insurrection. It appears equitable that opportunity should be offered to citizens of other states to present their claims, as well as to those British subjects whose claims were not admissible under the late commission, to the early decision of some competent tribunal. To this end, I recommend the necessary legislation to organize a court to dispose of all claims of aliens of the nature referred to, in an equitable and satisfactory manner, and to relieve Congress and the Departments from the consideration of these questions."

Boundary between the United States and British Possessions.

"A copy of the report of the commissioner appointed under the act of March 19, 1872, for surveying and marking the boundary between the United States and the British Possessions, from the Lake of the Woods to the summit of the Rocky Mountains, is herewith transmitted. I am happy to announce that the field-work of the commission has been completed, and the entire line, from the northwest corner of the Lake of the Woods to the summit of the Rocky Mountains, has been run and marked upon the surface of the earth. It is believed that the amount remaining unexpended of the appropriation made at the last session of Congress will be sufficient to complete the office-work. I recommend that the authority of Congress be given to the use of the unexpended balance of the appropriation in the completion of the work of the commission in making its report and preparing the necessary maps."

Expatriation and the election of nationality.

"I have again to call the attention of Congress to the unsatisfactory condition of the existing laws with reference to expatriation and the election of nationality. Formerly, amid conflicting opinions and decisions, it was difficult to exactly determine how far the doctrine of perpetual allegiance was applicable to citizens of the United States. Congress by the act of the 27th July, 1868, asserted the abstract right of expatriation as a fundamental principle of this Government. Notwithstanding such assertion and the necessity of frequent application of the principle, no legislation has been had defining what acts or formalities shall work expatriation or when a citizen shall be deemed to have renounced or to have lost his citizenship. The importance of such definition is obvious."

Fraudulent naturalization.

"Without placing any additional obstacles in the way of the obtainment of citizenship by the worthy and well-intentioned foreigner who comes in good faith to cast his lot with ours, I earnestly recommend further legislation to punish fraudulent naturalization and to secure the ready cancellation of the record of every naturalization made in fraud."

Means of increasing the revenue.

"The Secretary of the Treasury in his report favors legislation looking to an early return to specie payments, thus supporting views previously expressed in this message. He also recommends economy in appropriations; calls attention to the loss of revenue from repealing the tax on tea and coffee, without benefit to the consumer; recommends an increase of ten cents a gallon on whisky, and, further, that no modification be made in the banking and currency bill passed at the last session of Congress, unless modification should become necessary by reason of the adoption of measures for returning to specie payments. In these recommendations I cordially join."

"I would suggest to Congress the propriety of re-adjusting the tariff so as to increase the revenue and, at the same time, decrease the number of articles upon which duties are levied. Those articles which enter into our manufactures, and are not produced at home, it seems to me should be entered free. Those articles of manufacture which we produce a constituent part of, but do not produce the whole, that part which we do not produce should enter free also. I will instance fine wool, dyes, &c. These articles must be imported to form a part of the manufacture of the higher grades of woolen goods. Chemicals, used as dyes, compounded in medicines, and used in various ways in manufactures, come under this class. The introduction, free of duty, of such wools as we do not produce would stimulate the manufacture of goods requiring the use of those we do produce, and, therefore, would be a benefit to home production. There are many articles entering into "home manufactures" which we do not produce ourselves, the tariff upon which increases the cost of producing the manufactured article. All corrections in this regard are in the direction of bringing labor and capital in harmony with each other, and of supplying one of the elements of prosperity so much needed."

Treaties ratified.

"Since my last annual message the exchange has been made of the ratification of treaties of extradition with Belgium, Ecuador, Peru, and Salvador; also of a treaty of commerce and navigation with Peru, and one of commerce and consular privileges with Salvador; all of which have been duly proclaimed, as has also a declaration with Russia with reference to trade-marks."

Wants and necessities of the Army.

"All the recommendations of the Secretary of War I regard as judicious, and I especially commend to your attention the following: The consolidation of Government arsenals; the restoration of mileage to officers traveling under orders; the exemption of money received from the sale of subsistence stores from being covered into the Treasury; the use of appropriations for the purchase of subsistence stores without waiting for the beginning of the fiscal year for which the appropriation is made; for additional appropriations for the collection of torpedo material; for increased appropriations for the manufacture of arms; for relieving the various States from indebtedness for arms charged to them during the rebellion; for dropping officers from the rolls of the Army without trial for the offense of drawing pay more than once for the same period; for the discouragement of the plan to pay soldiers by checks; and for the establishment of a professorship of rhetoric and English literature at West Point. The reasons for these recommendations are obvious, and are set forth sufficiently in the reports attached. I also recommend that the status of the staff corps of the Army be fixed, where this has not already been done, so that promotions may be made and vacancies filled as they occur in each grade when reduced below the number to be fixed by law. The necessity for such legislation is specially felt now in the Pay Department. The number of officers in that department is below the number adequate to the performance of the duties required of them by law."

Certain operations of the Navy.

"Much has been accomplished during the year in aid of science and to increase the sum of general knowledge and further the interests of commerce and civilization. Extensive and much-needed soundings have been made for hydrographic purposes and to fix the proper routes of ocean telegraphs. Further surveys of the great isthmus have been undertaken and completed, and two vessels of the Navy are now employed, in conjunction with those of England, France, Germany, and Russia, in observations connected with the transit of Venus, so useful and interesting to the scientific world."

Education of the people essential to general prosperity.

"Education of the people entitled to exercise the right of franchise I regard essential to general prosperity everywhere, and especially so in republics, where birth, education, or previous condition does not enter into account in giving suffrage. Next to the public school, the post-office is the great agent of education over our vast territory."

Unsettled condition of affairs in some of the Southern States.

"I regret to say that, with preparations for the late election, decided indications appeared in some localities in the Southern States of a determination, by acts of violence and intimidation, to deprive citizens of the freedom of the ballot, because of their political opinions. Bands of men, masked and armed, made their appearance; White Leagues and other societies were formed; large quantities of arms and ammunition were imported and distributed to these organizations; military drills, with menacing demonstrations, were held; and, with all these, murders enough were committed to spread terror among those whose political action was to be suppressed, if possible, by these intolerant and criminal proceedings. In some places colored laborers were compelled to vote according to the wishes of their employers, under threats of discharge if they acted otherwise; and there are too many instances in which, when these threats were disregarded, they were remorselessly executed by those who made them. I understand that the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution was made to prevent this and a like state of things, and the act of May 31, 1870, with amendments, was passed to enforce its provisions, the object of both being to guarantee to all citizens the right to vote and to protect them in the free enjoyment of that right. Enjoined by the Constitution "to take care that the laws be faithfully executed," and convinced by undoubted evidence that violations of said act had been committed, and that a wide-spread and flagrant disregard of it was contemplated, the proper officers were instructed to prosecute the offenders, and troops were stationed at convenient points to aid these officers, if necessary, in the performance of their official duties. Complaints are made of this interference by Federal authority; but if said amendment and act do not provide for such interference under the circumstances as above stated, then they are without meaning, force, or effect, and the whole scheme of colored enfranchisement is worse than mockery, and little better than a crime. Possibly Congress may find it due to truth and justice to ascertain, by means of a committee, whether the alleged wrongs to colored citizens for political purposes are real, or the reports thereof were manufactured for the occasion.

"The whole subject of Executive interference with the affairs of a State is repugnant to public opinion, to the feeling of those who, from their official capacity, must be used in schh interposition, and to him or those who must direct. Unless most clearly on the side of law, such interference becomes a crime; with the law to support it, it is condemned without a hearing. I desire, therefore, that all necessity for Executive direction in local affairs may become unnecessary and obsolete. I invite the attention, not of Congress, but of the people of the United States, to the causes and effects of these unhappy questions. Is there not a disposition on one side to magnify wrongs and outrages, and on the other side to belittle them or justify them? If public opinion could be directed to a correct survey of what is, and to rebuking wrong, and aiding the proper authorities in punishing it, a better state of feeling would be inculcated, and the sooner we would have that peace which would leave the States free indeed to regulate their own domestic affairs. I believe on the part of our citizens of the Southern States—the better part of them—there is a disposition to be law-abiding, and to do no violence either to individuals or to the laws existing. But do they do right in ignoring the existence of violence and bloodshed in resistance to constituted authority? I sympathize with their prostrate condition, and would do all in my power to relieve them; acknowledging that in some instances they have had most trying governments to live under, and very oppressive ones in the way of taxation for nominal improvements, not giving benefits equal to the hardships imposed; but can they proclaim themselves entirely irresponsible for this condition? They cannot. Violence has been rampant in some localities, and has either been justified or denied by those who could have prevented it. The theory is even raised that there is to be no further interference on the part of the General Government to protect citizens within a State where the State authorities fail to give protection. This is a great mistake. While I remain Executive all the laws of Congress, and the provisions of the Constitution, including the recent amendments added thereto, will be enforced with rigor, but with regret that they should have added one jot or tittle to Executive duties or powers. Let there be fairness in the discussion of southern questions, the advocates of both, or all political parties, giving honest, truthful reports of occurrences, condemning the wrong and upholding the right, and soon all will be well. Under existing conditions the negro votes the republican ticket because he knows his friends are of that party. Many a good citizen votes the opposite, not because he agrees with the great principles of state which separate parties, but because, generally, he is opposed to negro rule. This is a most delusive cry. Treat the negro as a citizen and a voter—as he is and must remain—and soon parties will be divided, not on the color line, but on principle. Then we shall have no complaint of sectional interference."

Increase of judicial districts.

"I respectfully suggest to Congress the propriety of increasing the number of judicial districts in the United States to eleven, the present number being nine, and the creation of two additional judgeships. The territory to be traversed by the circuit judges is so great, and the business of the courts so steadily increasing, that it is growing more and more impossible for them to keep up with the business requiring their attention. Whether this would involve the necessity of adding two more justices of the Supreme Court to the present number I submit to the judgment of Congress."

Management of Indian affairs.

"I commend the recommendation of the Secretary for the extension of the homestead laws to the Indians, and for some sort of territorial government for the Indian Territory. A great majority of the Indians occupying this Territory are believed yet to be incapable of maintaining their rights against the more civilized and enlightened white man. Any territorial form of government given them, therefore, should protect them in their homes and property for a period of at least twenty years, and before its final adoption should be ratified by a majority of those affected."

Pensions to survivors of war of 1812 residing in southern States.

"The act of Congress providing the oath which pensioners must subscribe to before drawing their pensions cuts off from this bounty a few survivors of the war of 1812 residing in the Southern States. I recommend the restoration of this bounty to all such. The number of persons whose names would thus be restored to the list of pensioners is not large. They are all old persons who could have taken no part in the rebellion, and the services for which they were awarded pensions were in defense of the whole country."

Civil service.

"The rules adopted to improve the civil service of the Government have been adhered to as closely as has been practicable with the opposition with which they meet. The effect, I believe, has been beneficial on the whole, and has tended to the elevation of the service. But it is impracticable to maintain them without direct and positive support of Congress. Generally the support which this reform receives is from those who give it their support only to find fault when the rules are apparently departed from. Removals from office without preferring charges against parties removed are frequently cited as departures from the rules adopted, and the retention of those against whom charges are made by irresponsible persons and without good grounds is also often condemned as a violation of them. Under these circumstances, therefore, I announce that, if Congress adjourns without positive legislation on the subject of 'civil-service reform,' I will regard such action as a disapproval of the system, and will abandon it, except so far as to require examinations for certain appointees, to determine their fitness. Competitive examinations will be abandoned."

District of Columbia.

"In my opinion the District of Columbia should be regarded as the grounds of the national capital, in which the entire people are interested. * * * I think the proportion of the expenses of the government and improvements to be borne by the General Government, the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and the county should be carefully and equitably defined."

SEVENTH ANNUAL MESSAGE, DECEMBER 7, 1875.

Compulsory education by constitutional amendment.

"As the primary step, therefore, to our advancement in all that has marked our progress in the past century, I suggest for your earnest consideration, and most earnestly recommend it, that a constitutional amendment be submitted to the Legislatures of the several States for ratification, making it the duty of each of the several States to establish and forever maintain free public schools adequate to the education of all the children in the rudimentary branches within their respective limits, irrespective of sex, color, birthplace, or religions; forbidding the teaching in said schools of religious, atheistic, or pagan tenets; and prohibiting the granting of any school funds, or school taxes, or any part thereof, either by legislative, municipal, or other authority, for the benefit or in aid, directly or indirectly, of any religious sect or denomination, or in aid or for the benefit of any other object of any nature or kind whatever."

Taxation of church property.

"I would suggest the taxation of all property equally, whether church or corporation, exempting only the last resting-place of the dead, and, possibly, with proper restrictions, church edifices."

Virginius indemnity.

"In March last an arrangement was made through Mr. Cushing, our minister in Madrid, with the Spanish government, for the payment by the latter to the United States of the sum of $80,000 in coin, for the purpose of the relief of the families or persons of the ship's company and certain passengers of the Virginius. This sum was to have been paid in three installments at two months each. It is due to the Spanish government that I should state that the payments were fully and spontaneously anticipated by that government, and that the whole amount was paid within but a few days more than two months from the date of the agreement, a copy of which is herewith transmitted. In pursuance of the terms of the adjustment, I have directed the distribution of the amount among the parties entitled thereto, including the ship's company and such of the passengers as were American citizens. Payments are made accordingly, on the application by the parties entitled thereto."

Cuba.

Recognition of its independence deemed impracticable and accordance of belligerent rights regarded indefensible as a measure of right. Mediation and intervention of other nations apparently the only alternative to be invoked for the termination of strife.

Depredations by armed bands from Mexico on the people of Texas.

"The military force of this Government disposable for service in that quarter is quite inadequate to effectually guard the line even at those points where the incursions are usually made. An experiment of an armed vessel on the Rio Grande for that purpose is on trial, and it is hoped that, if not thwarted by the shallowness of the river and other natural obstacles, it may materially contribute to the protection of the herdsmen of Texas."

Claims of aliens against the United States.

"I recommend that some suitable provision be made, by the creation of a special court or by conferring the necessary jurisdiction upon some appropriate tribunal, for the consideration and determination of the claims of aliens against the Government of the United States which have arisen within some reasonable limitation of time, or which may hereafter arise, excluding all claims barred by treaty provisions or otherwise. It has been found impossible to give proper consideration to these claims by the Executive Departments of the Government. Such a tribunal would afford an opportunity to aliens other than British subjects to present their claims on account of acts committed against their persons or property during the rebellion, as also to those subjects of Great Britain whose claims, having arisen subsequent to the 9th day of April, 1865, could not be presented to the late commission organized pursuant to the provisions of the treaty of Washington."

Occupation of New State Department.

"In the month of July last the building erected for the Department of State was taken possession of and occupied by that Department. I am happy to announce that the archives and valuable papers of the Government in the custody of that Department are now safely deposited and properly cared for."

Treasury—partial repeal of legal-tender act, &c.

A repeal of so much of the legal-tender act as makes these notes receivable for debts contracted after a day to be fixed in the act itself, say not later than the 1st of January, 1877.

Second, that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to redeem say not to exceed $2,000,000 monthly of legal-tender notes, by issuing in their stead a long bond, bearing interest at the rate of $3\frac{65}{100}$ per cent. per annum, of denominations ranging from $50 up to $1,000 each. This would in time reduce the legal-tender notes to a volume that could be kept afloat without demanding a redemption in large sums suddenly.

"Third, that an additional power be given to the Secretary of the Treasury to accumulate gold for final redemption, either by increasing revenue, curtailing expenses, or both—it is preferable to do both; and I recommend that reduction of expenditures be made wherever it can be done without impairing Government obligations, or crippling the due execution thereof. One measure for increasing the revenue—and the only one I think of—is the restoration of the duty on tea and coffee. These duties would add, probably, $18,000,000 to the present amount received from imports, and would in no way increase the prices paid for those articles by the consumers."

Annuities for families of deceased Army officers.

"The enactment of a system of annuities for the families of deceased officers by voluntary deductions from the monthly pay of officers. This, again, is not attended with burden upon the Treasury, and would for the future relieve much distress which every old Army officer has witnessed in the past—of officers dying suddenly or being killed, leaving families without even the means of reaching their friends if fortunate enough to have friends to aid them."

Signal-service corps.

Permanent organization of Signal-Service Corps recommended.

Centennial celebration.

"The powers of Europe, almost without exception, many of the South American states, and even the more distant eastern powers, have manifested their friendly sentiments toward the United States, and the interest of the world in our progress, by taking steps to join with us in celebrating the centennial of the nation, and I strongly recommend that a more national importance be given to this exhibition by such legislation and by such appropriation as will insure its success. Its value in bringing to our shores innumerable useful works of art and skill, the commingling of the citizens of foreign countries and our own, and the interchange of ideas and manufactures, will far exceed any pecuniary outlay we may make."

Geological explorations in Colorado, Utah, and New Mexico Territories.

"The geological explorations have been prosecuted with energy during the year, covering an area of about forty thousand square miles in the Territories of Colorado, Utah, and New Mexico, developing the agricultural and mineral resources, and furnishing interesting scientific and topographical details of that region."

Utah—Polygamy.

"In nearly every annual message that I have had the honor of transmitting to Congress, I have called attention to the anomalous, not to say scandalous, condition of affairs existing in the Territory of Utah, and have asked for definite legislation to correct it. That polygamy should exist in a free, enlightened, and Christian country, without the power to punish so flagrant a crime against decency and morality, seems preposterous. True, there is no law to sustain this unnatural vice, but what is needed is a law to punish it as a crime, and at the same time to fix the status of the innocent children, the offspring of the system, and of the possibly innocent plural wives. But, as an institution, polygamy should be banished from the land."

Importation of Chinese women.

"While this is being done, I invite the attention of Congress to another, though perhaps no less an evil, the importation of Chinese women, but few of whom are brought to our shores to pursue honorable or useful occupations."

Necessity for amendment of public land and mining laws.

"Observations while visiting the Territories of Wyoming, Utah, and Colorado, during the past autumn, convinced me that existing laws regulating the disposition of public lands, timber, &c., and probably the mining laws themselves, are very defective, and should be carefully amended and at an early day. In territory where cultivation of the soil can only be followed by irrigation, and where irrigation is not practicable the lands can only be used as pasturage, and this only where stock can reach water, (to quench its thirst,) cannot be governed by the laws as to entries as lands every acre of which is an independent estate by itself.

"Land must be held in larger quantities to justify the expense of conducting water upon it to make it fruitful or to justify utilizing it as pasturage. The timber in most of the Territories is principally confined to the mountain regions, which are held for entry in small quantities only and as mineral lands. The timber is the property of the United States for the disposal of which there is now no adequate law. The settler must become a consumer of this timber whether he lives upon the plain or engages in working the mines. Hence every man becomes either a trespasser himself or knowingly a patron of trespassers.

"My opportunities for observation were not sufficient to justify me in recommending specific legislation on these subjects, but I do recommend that a joint committee of the two Houses of Congress—sufficiently large to be divided into subcommittees—be organized to visit all the mining States and Territories during the coming summer, and that the committee shall report to Congress at the next session such laws or amendments to laws as it may deem necessary to secure the best interests of the Government and the people of these Territories, who are doing so much for their development."

Summary of questions deemed of vital importance.

"As this will be the last annual message which I shall have the honor of transmitting to Congress before my successor is chosen, I will repeat or recapitulate the questions which I deem of vital importance, which may be legislated upon and settled at this session:

"First. That the States shall be required to afford the opportunity of a good common-school education to every child within their limits

"Second. No sectarian tenets shall ever be taught in any school supported in whole or in part by the State, nation, or by the proceeds of any tax levied upon any community. Make education compulsory, so as to deprive all persons who cannot read and write from becoming voters after the year 1890, disfranchising none, however, on grounds of illiteracy who may be voters at the time this amendment takes effect.

"Third. Declare church and State forever separate and distinct, but each free within its proper spheres, and that all church property shall bear its own proportion of taxation.

"Fourth. Drive out licensed immorality, such as polygamy and the importation of women for illegitimate purposes. To recur again to the centennial year, it would seem as though now, as we are about to begin the second century of our national existence, would be a most fitting time for these reforms.

"Fifth. Enact such laws as will insure a speedy return to a sound currency, such as will command the respect of the world."

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the message lie on the table and be printed; and I also offer the customary motion, for reference under the laws to the Committee on Printing, for the printing of a number of extra copies.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Your first motion is to print the accompanying documents.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The law authorizes the number.

Mr. CONKLING. Of course I mean the message and all that accompanies it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reference of the motion to print extra copies will be made to the Committee on Printing, when appointed, and the usual number authorized by law will be printed.

FINANCE REPORT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. DAWES, it was Ordered, That James Schoutter have leave to withdraw from the files a paper being a commission of Abram How; also certain letters on file with the William T. Eustis case, to which they do not belong.

FEDERAL TROOPS IN VIRGINIA.

Mr. WITHERS. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the Senate, if not incompatible with public interest under what authority and for what purpose troops of the United States occupied the city of Petersburgh, in the State of Virginia, on the 7th of November, 1876, the day of the general election.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That will lead to debate. Let it lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over under the rule.

Mr. WITHERS. I ask that it be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the resolution will be printed.

VOTERS IN CERTAIN STATES—ELIGIBILITY OF ELECTORS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolutions yesterday submitted by Mr. EDMUNDS and modified by him this morning.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I shall not take up much of the time of the Senate in submitting some views and observations on these resolutions. I have nothing to say in any spirit of faction. It is not a time for faction. I voted against considering the resolutions to-day because I thought more time ought to be given to their study by those who are to be called to vote upon them. The majority of the Senate thought otherwise, and I submitted, and I shall say, therefore, what occurs to me on reading them for the first time this morning, and without that study which I should like to give them. I shall not be drawn into anticipating any question that may arise hereafter. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." I shall hold myself perfectly free whenever questions shall arise calling upon us for their determination, in the progress of events, then to give my best judgment upon those questions. But now we are called upon to vote on these resolutions, and we have to decide as we are informed to-day. That makes it necessary that we should see what the resolutions are. The first thing that strikes one is that every inquiry proposed here is an inquiry in relation to a matter of fact. The Senator from Vermont said, if I understood him correctly, that these resolutions commit no Senator to any particular doctrine or dogma. It will be found upon examining them, and it certainly was the purport of the remarks he made, that if they be adopted the Senate is committed to a particular doctrine and dogma.

The preamble to the first resolution goes upon the assumption that, although there may be not one word in the constitution of a State, not one word in the statute law of a State denying suffrage to any class of male citizens, although that State may have been in the control of the party to which the Senator belongs ever since the close of the war, yet that it may be deprived of a portion of its representation in Congress, and consequently of a portion of its vote in the electoral college, if by unlawful means, means denounced by the State government, means punished by the State government, any number of men have been deprived of their right to vote. That is said to be based upon the fourteenth amendment to the constitution. I suppose there is no amendment to the constitution that cannot be practically executed; and I want the attention of my friend from Vermont to see how he would practically execute this new idea that we are to inquire whether the Ku-Klux, or some White League, or some other organization has intimidated voters in the six States he has mentioned in order that we may ascertain what shall be the representation of those States in the House of Representatives and what shall be their vote in the electoral college. What is this fourteenth amendment? What does it say? It provides that—

When the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens—shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

We have an act of Congress, passed on the 2d of February, 1872, fixing the representation of the six States that are named in this resolution; providing that Georgia shall have nine Representatives, Alabama eight Representatives, South Carolina five, Louisiana six, and so on. The Senator from Vermont proposes that the Committee on Privileges and Elections shall find out whether, in the year 1875, there were citizens of those States denied the right of suffrage. Denied by the constitutions of the States? No; the Senator knows there is no such denial there. Denied by the statutes of the States? No; the Senator knows there is no such denial there. Denied by the judgments of the courts of those States? No; the Senator knows there is no such denial. Denied how, then? Denied by violence and intimidation of lawless individuals; for that is all that is complained of in the memorials and petitions and newspaper articles to which the Senator referred and upon which he bases his resolutions.

Suppose this committee should go into an investigation in six States; six States which used to be called sovereign States; six States that in common with other States the Supreme Court of the United States has fifty times in solemn decisions called sovereign States; suppose the Senate, by its Committee on Privileges and Elections, inquires how many persons in those six States have been unlawfully denied the right of suffrage by intimidation or other foul means; and suppose the committee make a report on that subject, and a committee of one single branch of Congress makes a report that 10,000 men in the State of South Carolina, in the year 1875, were deprived by intimidation of the right to vote; are you going to change the representation of South Carolina upon that report? Are you going to amend this act of Congress which says that South Carolina shall have five representatives? Suppose the same committee report that in 1876 anybody was intimidated there; that anybody was denied the right of suffrage; what are you going to do? Are you going to assume further that, because there was violence in 1875 or 1876, there will be violence in 1877 and in 1878, when the Forty-fifth Congress will have its existence? And are you then, upon the assumption of continued violence, of continued disregard of law, to proceed to reduce the representation of that State in the Congress and reduce its influence in the electoral college at the next presidential election? Does not any one see how utterly impossible it is to proceed upon any such basis? It is the same way with each of the States. Let the committee make their report; and how are we to get a census, pray, upon which Congress can act of all persons who were intimidated in Georgia, or Alabama, or Louisiana, or Arkansas, or Texas? How are you to get a census of the men, so that you can make the calculation required by the fourteenth amendment and find "the proportion which the number of such male citizens" who are thus denied the right of suffrage "shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age?" How are you to do it? Does not every one see that it is an impossibility? Does not every one see at once that such an idea as that never entered into the minds of the people when they adopted the fourteenth amendment? It could not have entered into the minds of the people. It is utterly impossible that any such idea could have had place in their minds. As the Senator from Delaware has very properly stated, the fourteenth amendment is a direction to the States as States. No one can be denied the right of suffrage within the meaning of this provision of the Constitution unless he is denied it by the constitution or by the law of a State, if the Constitution permits it to be denied by the law.

The fourteenth amendment held out to the Southern States this alternative, and gave it to them freely: "Admit the negroes to vote and have an increased representation, or deny them the right to vote and have a reduced representation." The alternative was offered to them. They had a right to choose between the two. It is very true they cannot prevent a man's voting by reason of race, color, or previous condition of servitude under the fifteenth amendment. Under the fourteenth they might have done so, for the fourteenth confers the right of suffrage on nobody, and the fifteenth only prevents a man's exclusion on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; but it was still perfectly within their competency to make a property qualification or an educational qualification that would exclude nine-tenths of the colored people in the South. By the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments the people of the United States said to them: "You may have your choice; you may by requiring an educational qualification or a property qualification exclude the bulk of these colored people from the ballot-box; but if you do it, you reduce your representation in the Congress, and your power in the electoral college shall be diminished in the same proportion that those excluded persons bear to the whole number of white inhabitants in the State. On the other hand, you may give the suffrage to all these people without any such restrictive qualifications that would deny it to any; and if you do give it to them all, then, instead of the old representation under the old Constitution of two-fifths of the colored population, you shall have representation for the whole of them. The choice was fairly offered to the people of those States. In perfect good faith they accepted the alternative of giving the suffrage to everybody, colored as well as white. They put it in their constitutions. They denied to their Legislatures the power to deprive the colored people of suffrage. They took that horn of the dilemma. And now after having thus chosen as you authorized them to choose, it is said that we can get up an inquiry here, outside of the Constitution in fact, to ascertain whether, by fraud, by violence, by intimidation, or the like, some people have been denied the right of suffrage, and, if so, then the representation of those States shall be diminished and their weight in the electoral college shall also be diminished.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask the Senator to point out to the Senate whereabouts it is in these resolutions that there is any such declaration or assumption as he speaks of. He says that the resolutions assume and foreclose the question that Congress has power to deal with, by diminishing representation, any illegal or fraudulent or violent deprivation of suffrage, whether the government of the State has had anything to do with it or not. Now, I wish him to point out whereabouts it is in the resolutions that anything of that kind is either said or implied.

Mr. THURMAN. Why, Mr. President, it is implied by the fact that there is not one word in the preamble nor one word in the instructions that requires the committee to investigate any constitution of those States, any law of those States, any judicial decision of those States, or any action of any governmental person in those States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator allow me to suggest to him that he had better read the language again. The first branch of the preamble recites the words of the Constitution. I believe that the Senator has not denied that. The second branch of the preamble states again the very words of the Constitution, by the statement that it is alleged that in these States the very descriptions of citizens named have been denied or abridged of their rights, using the very language of the Constitution, no more and no less. Therefore, the first resolution goes on to provide that we shall inquire into the condition of the thing, and then we shall be able to ascertain whether there has been a violation of the Constitution or not.

Mr. THURMAN. What are the things which the committee are to inquire into?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Exactly the things that the Constitution requires.

Mr. THURMAN. Let me speak. What are the things they are to inquire into? Whether the constitution of South Carolina denies the right of suffrage to any man there? Whether the constitution of Georgia does it, or that of Alabama or Louisiana?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is one of the things.

Mr. THURMAN. No, sir; nothing of the kind. The Senator knows and every Senator knows that there is not one word of denial in either of those constitutions.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know anything of the kind.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator ought to know it, if he does not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That may be. I doubt if the Senator from Ohio knows it.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator ought to take judicial notice of that fact. But there is no inquiry to be made by the committee as to that. Then as to the statutes; is there any inquiry to be made whether the statutes of the States deny the right of suffrage to any of these people? Not one word of that. What was the foundation given by the Senator in his speech for this resolution? That half the newspapers in the land said that men had been denied the right of suffrage down there; that there had been reports of committees to this body that men had been denied the right of suffrage down there; that there had been petitions and memorials. Now, I put it to the Senator, has he ever seen in a newspaper, if that is sufficient authority, any assertion that a constitution of any of those States, or a statute of any of those States, denied the right of suffrage to any of the class of people to whom he refers?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator want an answer now? If he does he can have it.

Mr. THURMAN. I should like to have an answer. The Senator can give it to me categorically.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes. I give it categorically; yes.

Mr. THURMAN. That the Senator has seen that the constitution of one of those States denied it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not spoken of their constitutions. I have said that I have seen it, as the Senator put it to me, that the laws and governmental provisions of several of those States do operate to deny suffrage.

Mr. THURMAN. I should like to see such a statute. No one has ever shown such a statute. No one ever can show such a statute. I defy the Senator to point to a single statute of any one of those States that does not bear alike upon the white man and the colored man with perfect equality and with perfect justice. There cannot be one shown. No, sir; that is not it at all. What are the memorials that the Senator speaks of? Memorials against any statute law of those States? No, sir; he cannot find one. Memorials against their constitutions? He cannot find one. What are the reports of the committees to which he refers? Reports that there are constitutions which deny the right of suffrage? No, sir. Reports that there are laws which deny the right of suffrage? No, sir; not at all. Does he talk about the laws of those States? Who has had possession of South Carolina ever since the close of the war but the republican party? Who has had possession of Louisiana ever since the close of the war but the republican party? Who has had possession of Alabama until two years ago, for the greater part of the time, at least, but the republican party? No, sir; that will not do at all. It is simply to go into this "intimidation" business. It is simply to furnish a pretense for returning boards vetoing the voice of the people and electing other men than those whom the people have chosen—a thing that can always be alleged, however false, and with such judges as have acted upon the so-called proofs, a thing that will always have precisely the same effect and the same result. Let us see what this committee are to inquire into:

1. Whether, in any of the elections named in said amendment in said States, in the years 1875 or 1876, the right of any portion of such inhabitants and citizens to vote as aforesaid has been in anywise denied or abridged.
2. To what extent such denial or abridgment has been carried.
3. By what means such denial or abridgment has been accomplished.

Not whether there is a statute or a constitution that denied it, but what are the means by which the denial has been accomplished.

4. By whom has such denial or abridgment been effected.

Not whether by the people in the framing of their constitution; not whether by the legislature in the enactment of their laws; not whether by the judiciary in their interpretation of the constitution and the laws; but by whom, in its most general sense, has this denial been effected.

5. With what motives and for what purposes has such denial or abridgment been carried on.

What has that to do with the question of reducing their representation? If their motives had been as pure as those of angels, and they had framed a constitution containing educational clauses or property qualifications that would necessarily exclude a large portion of these people, the effect would necessarily be to reduce their representation in the House and to give them a reduced weight in the electoral college; but what would we have to do with their motives? Again:

6. By what authority or pretended authority has such denial or abridgment been exercised.

It is not sufficient to ask for authority, but by what "pretended authority" has this denial taken place. O, Mr. President, there is no concealing the fact that this is not an inquiry warranted by the Constitution for the purpose of basing upon it any action to reduce the representation of those States, or for the purpose of affecting their weight in the electoral college. The Constitution deals with certainties and not with uncertainties. When it says that the representation shall be in proportion to the number of male inhabitants it means that; and when it says that persons excluded from the right of suffrage shall not be counted in fixing the representation it means persons denied by the State the right of suffrage; and that can be well ascertained. It means nothing less than that, and nothing more than that. It does not propose to us an inquiry which shall be shifting with every year, as was well said by the Senator from Delaware. The State to-day, owing to a fact which is past, not an existing fact, owing to the denial of suffrage in 1875, a year ago and more, is to be shorn, forsooth, of a portion of its representation. I should like to know how you would execute such a provision. Suppose you say the State of Georgia shall not have nine Representatives but only seven Representatives in Congress, because it is alleged that men have been denied the right of suffrage there; but Georgia has, pursuant to your laws, elected nine Representatives. Which two of those nine are to vacate their seats in the House of Representatives? Who is to select the two and turn them out? Georgia has voted for presidential electors. Her electors of President and Vice-President will cast her vote to-morrow. She has voted in pursuance of your Constitution and in pursuance of your laws. How are you to razee her votes and cut them down accordingly, by making a calculation of the proportion which the number of the people who are kukluxed or intimidated down there bears to the whole population of that State? And that is to be done by the second Wednesday of February!

That leads me to another feature. Six States are involved in this business. Why did not the Senator from Vermont extend it everywhere? Did the Senator never hear of the operatives in great manufactories being marched up to the polls while their employers stood at the window and saw every man of them deposit the ticket which his employer dictated to him he should deposit? Has the Senator never heard of such intimidation as that? Does the Senator propose to go into that matter?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have heard of but one instance, and that was where a Democrat in Connecticut issued a notice to all his employés that he would turn them off if they did not vote his way.

Mr. THURMAN. Then the Senator is the most ignorant man who lives in New England, without exception. [Laughter.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. That may be. I agree with the Senator. [Laughter.]

Mr. THURMAN. I do not except those who have not the educational qualification, the Senator is the most ignorant man who lives in those six States. Let him go around on election day, when there is high excitement, in New England, in a manufacturing district, and he will not need to be reminded here of intimidation. But the Senator does not propose to inquire into that. No, sir; these Southern States are to be in the Union like the State of Georgia according to that famous resolution which was once passed, to vote if they will not change the result, but not to vote if their vote will change the result. The same game that was played then is to be played again, or its play is to be attempted.

Sir, you cannot tell, even by this resolution of the Senator, what States are to be embraced in this inquiry. We know that six are, but how many more, pray? Let me call the attention of the Senate to that.

And whereas it is alleged that in several of the States, and particularly in the States of South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Louisiana, and Mississippi, the right of male inhabitants of said States, respectively, being twenty-one years of age and citizens of the United States, to vote, * * * has been denied or greatly abridged; Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections, when appointed, * * * inquire and report as soon as may be—

1. Whether in any of the elections named in said amendment in said States in the years 1875 or 1876——

What does that "said" refer to? To the six named States? If it does it falls short of the very reason which is given in the preamble, for the preamble only notices those States as particularly guilty. It says that in several of the States, and particularly in these six States—that is intensified—the thing has run more flagrant than elsewhere, but it exists elsewhere; it exists outside of these States. Now where is this committee to make its investigation? Is it limited to these six States or is it to go all over the United States to find whether in any State in this Union there has been a denial of the right of suffrage? Nobody can tell; under this resolution it is impossible to tell.

But now, what kind of a task is this that is to be imposed on this committee limited to the six States? What kind of a task is this that is to be imposed on this committee composed of nine Senators? Nine Senators are to investigate, find out, and take a census of the number of persons who are denied the right of suffrage in six States of the Union, six States, too, of such magnitude, both in territory and population, as Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana. How can they do it? How can they make any satisfactory report, this single committee of nine persons, attending to their duties here in the Senate all the time, or the greater part of the time, and sitting here in Washington? It is practically impossible for them to do it; every man must see that it is impossible. We are to have this report by the second Wednesday of February, we are told, when the electoral votes are to be counted. How is this committee, unless the Almighty shall endow it with the power of being ubiquitous, of being everywhere at the same time, to discharge this duty? It cannot do it at all.

But you can have depositions or you can have affidavits; and it does not better it much to strike out "affidavits" and insert "depositions." Who is to be served with notice to cross-examine, I should like to know? A deposition is an examination of a witness and reducing his testimony to writing, where both parties have opportunity to participate in the examination. It is not an ex parte thing at all. It is not ex parte even in the Federal courts, where a deposition de bene esse may be taken, because the other party has a right to cross-examine after having notice of the time and place when the deposition is to be taken. A deposition is the regular taking of testimony with parties to the examination who can examine and cross-examine. Who are to be the parties to be served with notice here of the taking of these depositions?

Why, Mr. President, it does seem to me that it can hardly be necessary to pursue this further. This whole thing goes upon a hypothesis which the Constitution does not warrant. I am speaking about the first resolution. As to the last resolution, I do not know that as it has been amended I should object to it. I should like to study it a little more before I commit myself to vote for it. But I do not know that I should object to it, for if there is one man in all this broad land who wants the very truth to be ascertained—if there is one man in all this broad land who wants it to be shown, if it can be shown, that these returning boards that overthrow majorities shown by the official returns of eight and ten thousand in a State were warranted in what they did, for the credit of the American people and the American nation I want it to be shown, and if it cannot be shown I want the villainy to be exposed. I want the facts to be known. So far as we have any right to examine them, so far as the Constitution authorizes us to examine, so far as it may authorize us to examine—and I am willing to hear argument on that—I want the truth, and the naked truth, hurt whom it may, benefit whom it may. I want it, as I said, for the institutions of my country. I want it for the peace of my country. I want it for the credit of the American name. I want it for the credit of republican institutions. But I do not want or care one straw about electioneering documents that are ex parte out and out, only designed to inflame the public mind and divert it from a consideration of the constitutional law and the real truth of the case.

I cannot vote for the first resolution, but I can vote, perhaps—at least I am inclined so to think, though I want a little more time to study it—for the last. The first one goes upon a false assumption, and I cannot vote for it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President. I hope I shall not be obliged to speak again on this subject; but while it is fresh in my mind I wish to say a word or two.

My honorable friend from Ohio began by laying down a very good rule, and that was that he did not wish to foreclose this question in any of its aspects until we should know the facts, and then he proceeded, as some wise men have sometimes done before him, to take a straight departure from his own rule, and to decide, without waiting for a report of the committee, what the Constitution of the United States exactly means, what is exactly the power, or rather the want of power, of Congress under the fourteenth amendment, and so to dismiss the whole subject. It is a peculiar circumstance, that has sometimes been noticed before, that my honorable friend from Ohio and a good many of those who agree with him in their general politics have never yet found an occasion when any one of the three amendments to the Constitution last adopted was thought to be capable of being effectuated by any possible action of Congress. Neither the liberty of the thirteenth, nor the equal rights and fair play of the fourteenth, nor the security against distinctions of class and color of the fifteenth have sufficient value to them to enable them on any occasion, either in debate or by vote, to suppose that Congress has any power whatever to carry them into effect. I, of course, do not question the sincerity of the honorable gentlemen; but I am surprised at their attitude because, as they are not the most ignorant persons in New England, whatever else may be said of the rest of the country, I should have supposed that, when the Constitution itself in its general clause and each one of these amendments in their particular provisions say, in what appear to be plain terms, that Congress shall be invested with full power by appropriate legislation, to see that they are made effectual, they would not be unable to perceive, under any possible state of circumstances, either by vote or in debate, even by inquiry, that it is competent for either House of Congress to inquire into the state of this Union, and to let the Senate know its condition in order that we may then consider in calmness under the law whether we have any power or not.

The honorable Senator from Ohio said that the first resolution and what I stated before undertook to put a construction upon this clause in the Constitution. I asked him to point out whereabouts it was in the resolution, and he went into a generality and did not point it out. It cannot be pointed out. The resolution states what the Constitution is. It states that it is alleged that that provision of the Constitution has been violated, and directs the committee to inquire whether that violation has occurred or not, in the very language of the Constitution, and then it proceeds under subdivisions, referring in each one to the first clause, which recites the language of the Constitution, to classify all reasonably conceivable methods by which such a denial may have occurred. It would be just as sound for the Senator to say that, if we had the constitutional power to inquire who was elected President on the 7th of November, a resolution of that kind immediately committed the Senate to the result that Mr. Hayes or Mr. Tilden, according to our political views and opinions, I suppose, had been elected. Nobody would maintain that. If the Senator will give me leave to say so, it is absurd in my opinion. The resolution directs this committee to make an inquiry. The language of the resolution, I admit, is broad enough, and I intended it should be, to cover every attitude in which the case may be presented when the report comes in, in order that we may know whether the state of facts reported is one within the reach of constitutional redress by legislation or not. But the Senator objects to such an inquiry as that; he always has objected to it; he always will. It seems impossible to refer to any one of these amendments without immediately exciting the mind of my honorable friend and some of his associates with the supposition that there is at once great danger to the country, and great danger of a violation of the Constitution, when we are taking the only earthly means in the world to find out whether it has been violated or not.

The Senator says that this resolution must be directed to the denial of suffrage in fact instead of by constitutions and laws, because the mover of the resolution knows that no one of the constitutions, statutes, or judicial decisions of any one of these States in any manner interferes with suffrage. I stated that I did not know it, and I repeat that statement. On the contrary, I believe that the laws of more than one of these States do deny or abridge the right of suffrage of some of its male citizens above the age of twenty-one years. The Senator seems to have fallen into the error that this resolution is directed to race or color or previous condition of servitude. Not at all alone. It would embrace that, to be sure; but this article of the Constitution does not refer to a denial by one means or for one reason; it refers to every means, in language that has no limitation, by which in any State of this Union the free right of the people that he professes to desire to see maintained in their liberties and in their right of suffrage has been interfered with; and when we ascertain that it has been interfered with, that will be time enough to inquire whether the particular kind of interference, whether by statute or constitution or courts or otherwise, is one that this Constitution authorizes us by legislation in some measure to redress by an abridgment of representation.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator tell us what State and what law he refers to?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, Mr. President, I will not. Inasmuch as I am set down as the most ignorant man in New England, which I admit, the Senator ought not to ask me any such question. [Laughter.] As I suppose my honorable friend is perhaps not the most ignorant man in Ohio, it is just possible that if he would devote a part of his valuable time to studying the constitutions and the laws of the several States of this Union—if he should think that would not be unconstitutional; I do not know how he would feel about that—the most learned man in Ohio would find out, as the saying is, something to his advantage in that respect.

Mr. President, my honorable friend said that it is well known—I think he said that—that in New England it is frequent, even general, that artisans and operatives in manufacturing and industrial establishments are, against their will, by some species of coercion, marched to the polls in the interest of their employers and compelled to vote for a particular candidate.

Mr. THURMAN. I did not say "general."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Well I will say "particular" then; I do not wish myself to overstate what in any other place than this I should say was something in the nature of a libel upon the working classes of the six New England States. I wish to tell my honorable friend from Ohio, although I am the most ignorant man in New England, that the artizans and operatives of that hilly and somewhat inhospitable climate are men of intelligence, as a whole, men of education, men of property, men of independence, men of self-respect, and it is only now and then a very hardy man indeed, and he so far as I have ever heard, a democrat, who even ventures to suggest to his employés, much less to force them, how they shall exercise the supreme right of an American citizen in the elective franchise. They are the men who earn money by honest labor and know how to preserve it and expend it in the education of their children, in the payment of their taxes, income and all. They are the men who build churches and school-houses, and sometimes carry, as they have in days gone by, their industry, their education, their institutions to the western country, even to Ohio. But, Mr. President, I need not waste your time to-day in vindicating the character of the laboring classes of that part of the Union from which I happen to come. They do not need it.

My honorable friend has said that this is an impossible inquiry, that it cannot be effectuated, that we must have the report before the second Wednesday in February. He is entirely mistaken about that. I hope he does not imagine that this first resolution, which refers to the clause of the Constitution to which I have alluded, is designed, or that I conceive it possible under it, that it can have any effect upon the present representation of any of these States in Congress, or upon the present electoral vote of any such States. The resolution does not bear any such construction. It is a resolution of inquiry in order to get at facts connected with the state of the Union in one of its most vital respects, in order that if there be an evil which we may constitutionally redress by legislation in fixing the next representation in the House of Representatives, it may be done, and that is all. And yet the Senator sees in it some fearful assault upon the liberty of the country. He seems to be afraid from what he has said, that it will turn out that there has been, to use his own expression, kukluxing and intimidation in order to control votes in the States referred to, and in others. I am very much afraid that it will turn out to be true also, Mr. President. My fears go hand-in-hand with his in that respect. If it does turn out so, whether we shall have the power by legislation under this article to correct it or to protect the people of the whole Union against a representation which is thus made false and untrue, I do not profess to say at this time. I reserve my opinion upon that subject until I shall hear the report of that committee and be prepared to consider it. But I am surprised that any Senator should refuse to hear the truth of this thing and the naked truth, as the Senator says about the other branch of the resolution, because he is afraid that it will turn out that we cannot do anything about it if it is true. The truth merely inquired for and obtained will not hurt any honest man or any honest and just party. It may, it is true, affect the intelligent public opinion of the people of these United States as to the general situation of this Union; and whatever the truth is it ought to affect their intelligent opinion. Ought it not? If the truth turns out to be that there is peace, justice, equal rights, and no denial of this essential and most sacred right of citizenship in any of these States, then the people of the whole Union will rejoice and be exceeding glad. If it turns out to be exactly the reverse, it will be time for the people of this Union to consider whether the institutions under which they live ought not to be brought in some constitutional way into an exercise of protection to the people of this country against wrongs of that kind. And yet the Senator objects to it all; he says "no, shut out the light; do not let us look into this matter; whether the Constitution means one thing or another, never have an inquiry; keep away from the truth as far as possible." Well, it is a question of choice. The Senator is entitled to his way, and I am entitled to mine. I prefer to get at the truth. When we do get at it, I hope we shall all be ready to act in a spirit of justice and of constitutional law. I have no doubt we shall.

As to the last resolution, Mr. President, my honorable friend thinks he is in favor of that, although he is not quite sure. I am glad he is in favor of the last resolution. I do not know that we have any constitutional power to do anything about it; I do not say that we have; nor does the resolution; but it is based, exactly like the first resolution, on the ground that here is a matter arising under the Constitution of the United States, or said to be arising in both these respects, that deeply affects the institutions and the peace and the good order of our country; and yet as to one branch of it he is indisposed to know the truth, and as to the other he is graciously willing. Well, sir, I must express my obligation for that. I hope we shall pass both resolutions.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I will occupy the attention of the Senate but a few moments. The preamble to these resolutions recites one provision of the fourteenth amendment. After thus reciting it it proceeds as follows:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections, when appointed, be, and it hereby is, instructed to inquire and report as soon as may be—

1. Whether in any of the elections named in said amendment in said States in the years 1875 or 1876, the right of any portion of such inhabitants and citizens to vote as aforesaid has been in any wise denied or abridged.
2. To what extent such denial or abridgment has been carried.
3. By what means such denial or abridgment has been accomplished.
4. By whom has such denial or abridgment been effected.

If you cut off the preamble entirely, is there any doubt about the power of the Senate to adopt the rest of the resolution; and if there is not, what difference does the preamble make? It does not control the body of the resolution, and could not unless there was some doubtful phrase in that which might be interpreted by reference to the preamble. But if there is any doubtful phrase in the body of the resolution, you can cut off the preamble without affecting the duties to be performed by the committee under the body of the resolution. The preamble is there, doubtless, for information, and in the nature somewhat of directing the examination; but if you cut it off you do not, in any respect, affect the body of the resolution.

Mr. President, I suppose that we have, on a great many grounds, the right to pass this resolution. If the right of suffrage has been denied, we have a right to inquire into the cause of that denial, and to inquire into the remedy for it; or if any State is enjoying a representation in the other House, or is enjoying a representation in the electoral college on account of the existence in that State of a class which is denied political rights, we have a right to inquire into that fact. Whether we can inquire into it so as to affect the pending election, or one two years, four years, or eight years hence, is another question. We have an unquestionable right to inquire into it. We have a right to make any inquiry.

I suppose, Mr. President, that precedent has weight with this body. What has been done in other times and in other deliberative bodies might be received, perhaps, as giving a construction to the Constitution, and as forming a precedent upon which we may act. I turn to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and I find that yesterday the House of Representatives, a co-ordinate body of this Congress, passed the following resolution——

Mr. THURMAN. Do you propose to read it?

Mr. MORTON. I propose to read the resolution, with which we have nothing to do here now or hereafter, and can have nothing to do. It is as much a matter of history as it will be twenty years hence, and I propose to read it.

Resolved, That three special committees, one of fifteen members to proceed to Louisiana, one of six members to proceed to Florida, and one of nine members to proceed to South Carolina, shall be appointed by the Speaker of the House to investigate recent elections therein and the action of the returning or canvassing boards in the said States in reference thereto, and to report all the facts essential to an honest return of the votes received by the electors of the said States for President and Vice-President of the United States, and to a fair understanding thereof by the people, and whether the electoral votes of the said States should be counted, &c.

If it is legitimate for a democratic House to inquire into these things, it ought to be for a republican Senate to do so. That resolution was carried in the House by a two-thirds vote and, I have heard it stated by better parliamentarians than I am, by trampling on the rules of that body; but with that we have nothing to do. I am simply showing the understanding of two-thirds of that body of what its powers are in reference to an inquiry. As I said before, precedent carries with it some authority; and I merely refer to them as showing that what has been done in the other body, and so recently that the ink is hardly dry from recording it, might be done here without that gross violation of the Constitution of which we have heard so much this morning.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I do not rise to further discuss the subject just now, if, indeed, I had anything to say in addition to what I have already said; but I wish at once to say, and I attempted to get the floor as soon as the Senator from Vermont concluded, to say, that there was not one word uttered by me which justified the inference he seemed to draw from my remarks, that I was disposed to shut out the light, or that I had any fear that an investigation would disclose any serious intimidation or kukluxing. There was nothing in my remarks that, properly construed, would bear any such interpretation.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, for many years I have believed that the peace of the country, the permanence of our institutions, and the "domestic tranquillity" which the Constitution of the United States was intended to create and protect, have all been placed in great jeopardy by laws passed by the Congress of the United States; and since I have been a member of the Senate, I have felt it was my duty, however unavailingly, to oppose all that class of measures which assumed the authority in Congress to surpass what I believed to be the limits of their just powers and undertake the control of those questions which, under our federal form of government never were relinquished, and of necessity belonged to the several States, and to them alone. I believe to-day that efforts to restrain congressional power and to recognize and uphold in the several States their powers and just responsibilities are needed as much as ever, and indeed more than ever. I say to you, most frankly, sir, that I have entered upon this session of Congress more seriously impressed with the overhanging presence of dangers to our form of government than I have ever experienced before; and I have come here convinced more than ever that it is my duty, successfully or not, to oppose at every stage, at every step of its progress, this march toward consolidated power which the party to which you belong have entered upon in this country. There is this constant and persistent effort to invade and overthrow those necessary State powers without which our Government cannot exist, nor can free republican institutions be preserved.

It is not with me a question of party advantage or party power. So thoroughly am I convinced of the necessity of adhering to a strict construction of the Federal Constitution, that I should oppose the party with which I act just as readily as I should another where I thought it transgressed that theory of government which I believe to be essential to the safety and permanence of this Union and of the republican institutions existing under it. I have nothing now to say to the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] when he quotes, as I think against both the letter and spirit of the rules of this body the proceedings in the House of Representatives. If it were in order for me to discuss the resolution and proceedings of that House, which in disregard of parliamentary rule have been read and referred to by the Senator, I would not ask whether the hand that drew the resolution was that of a republican or of a democrat; I would put each to the same test and mete to both the same measure of constitutional criticism.

Mr. President, I did desire more time for deliberation on this important subject, but it has been denied, and it seems to be the will of those who control the action of the Senate that these resolutions shall be hastily pressed to a sudden vote. Here is my objection to them, that they assert a power in the Senate of the United States and the Congress to interfere in matters not confided to them, but the control of which is essential to the existence and the self-government of the States.

The honorable Senator from Vermont, who has these resolutions in charge, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] and from whose hand they come, tells us that because he recites the language of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, therefore the objects of his resolution must be in accordance with it. Why, sir, truly he has used the language, but he has used that language to pervert the meaning, he has used the language constructively in such manner as to destroy the object and intent for which the amendment was adopted. The very inquiries, six in number, which the resolutions contain, and the quarters to which they are directed, all show that he proposes to inquire into the infractions of the fourteenth amendment in quarters and of parties never contemplated by the amendment. Look, sir, for one moment at the language of the fourteenth article of amendment, which declares that:

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.

A simple declaration. Then follows:

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Then comes the second section:

Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed.

Then pass to the clause limiting the representation of the States in the House of Representatives of the United States in case there is denied by the State to any of the male inhabitants, being twenty-one years of age and citizens of the United States, the right to vote at any election for electors of President and Vice-President or Representatives in Congress or the executive and judicial officers of the State.

Mr. President, in 1875 at the October term the Supreme Court of the United States considered this very amendment in its general scope as well as in its application to the case then before the court. I read from page 554 of the second volume of Otto's Supreme Court Reports, the case of The United States vs. Cruikshank et al., this declaration:

The fourteenth amendment prohibits a State from depriving any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; but this adds nothing to the rights of one citizen as against another. It simply furnishes an additional guarantee against any encroachment by the States upon the fundamental rights which belong to every citizen as a member of society.

The fourteenth amendment—

Say they again—

prohibits a State from denying to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws; but this provision does not, any more than the one which precedes it and which we have just considered, add anything to the rights which one citizen has under the Constitution against another. The equality of the rights of citizens is a principle of republicanism. Every republican government is in duty bound to protect all its citizens in the enjoyment of this principle, if within its power. That duty was originally assumed by the States; and it still remains there. The only obligation resting upon the United States is to see that the States do not deny the right. This the amendment guarantees, but no more. The power of the National Government is limited to the enforcement of this guarantee.

Passing on further, they declare:

In Minor vs. Happersett, (21 Wallace, 178,) we decided that the Constitution of the United States has not conferred the right of suffrage upon any one, and that the United States have no voters of their own creation in the States. In United States vs. Reese et al., supra, page 214, we held that the fifteenth amendment has invested the citizens of the United States with a new constitutional right; which is, exemption from discrimination in the exercise of the elective franchise on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Mr. President, I have merely fortified myself by this declaration of the intent, the purview, and the scope of this article of the Constitution which has been referred to, and is supposed to justify the present resolution. The basis of authority is to be found in the preamble. The Senator from Indiana says you may strike out the preamble and the power will still exist. There is no doubt that the preamble does not give the power, but in this case it affects to recite it; it is paraded as the authority, and the sole authority for this exercise of power.

Now, sir, construing the fourteenth amendment as this tribunal of last resort in this country, this voice of authority declares to us that it should be construed, what is it? It is intended to prevent encroachments by the States upon members of their society, and the only obligation that rests upon us is to see that the States do not deny the right in question. How can a State act? By what voice can a State speak? Only by its authorized agents, only by the voice of its legislature, expressed by the acts of its executive officers in carrying out the legislative will. That written charter of government of every State which our form of government prescribes, and those laws passed in pursuance of it, and of the Constitution of the United States all written and in plain English. Therefore it is to the legislative acts of the State, as a political community, that you must look; and the alleged fact of denial or abridgment is to be tested by inspection of the statute books of the States and not by the acts of individual citizens or classes of men. And yet what does this resolution inquire of? Tested by the authority I have cited, assuming that the sole object of the amendment is to check the States and not the unauthorized action of individual citizens of the States, to prevent the encroachment of State authority upon citizens within their limits.

But examine the inquiries proposed and see how absurd and impossible it will be to apply them to the action of States.

1. Whether in any of the elections named in said amendment in said States in the years 1875 or 1876, the right of any portion of such inhabitants and citizens to vote as aforesaid has been in any wise denied or abridged, and that said committee be authorized to extend this inquiry to the elections of 1874.
2. To what extent such denial or abridgment has been carried.
3. By what means such denial or abridgment has been accomplished.
4. By whom has such denial or abridgment been effected.
5. With what motives and for what purposes has such denial or abridgment been carried on.
6. By what authority or pretended authority has such denial or abridgment been exercised.

Does not every man see that these are inquiries as to the acts of individuals, the motives of men, not the action of a State? It is not proposed that the action of a State shall be brought under criticism by the resolution. It is intended to bring the individual or bodies of men, the human motive, into review; you shall ask with what motive he did an act. You cannot question as to the motive of an amendment to a State constitution or a statute of a State. That is presumed to mean that which it expresses, and there is no latent ambiguity to be hunted out as to what was the intent and meaning of the Legislature in passing the law. The act speaks for itself.

And let me here ask, is the rectification of irregular or unwarranted State action to be redressed by the legislative power of Congress, or will it not properly fall under the corrective power of the judicial branch in their power and duty to annul all such action by their judgments?

It is plain that this resolution, upon its face, means not that the question shall be raised and decided as to the action of the State, but shall inquire of the individual and unauthorized action of citizens. The honorable Senator from Vermont, whose brain has conceived, whose hand has written, and whose will here forces upon the Senate this present resolution, intelligent, able, and pains-taking as we know him to be, has been unable to answer the simple question put by my friend from Ohio, whether he knew of any law or constitution, or part of a law or constitution of any of these six named States, which did abridge or deny the free right to vote of any man of any race or class in any of these named States, and he sheltered himself behind some humorous response to the Senator from Ohio, saying that he would not answer him or give him the information. Well, sir, the matter is rather grave for jocularity. The question was respectful and pertinent, and I regret exceedingly that the honorable Senator did not answer it in that straightforwardness and good faith in which it was asked. Yet, Mr. President, I cannot forbear here to state that I can scarcely think that honorable Senator believes, or that any man in this country believes, that there has been in any of these named States a discrimination against voters by reason of race or color, or that any statute or constitutional provision of any one of these six States gives a shadow of right to believe that such a thing has been attempted. Therefore, believing that this amendment to the Constitution of the United States has been falsely quoted—I mean by "falsely quoted," quoted for a purpose totally different from its first object and intent. I do not propose by my vote to aid it; but on the contrary, to oppose it, because I think it is a clear misuse and misappropriation of power to direct against the public power of a State and the acts of citizens or classes of citizens of a State, those powers which were intended only to be prohibitory of State action in the line which is alleged and complained of.

Mr. President, I have no profession here to make of my love of equity or of my revolting sense against injustice, my desire for peace and right to the uttermost in this land; but I do know that these blessings only can be secured by standing by the Constitution as it is written, and by the law as it truly is. Claims of irregular power will find no champion or advocate in me, but ever and always a constant, even though unsuccessful, opponent.

Mr. President, I stated before how perfectly endless is the task upon which the Senate by this resolution proposes to enter. If every allegation of abridgment or denial of the right of suffrage in a State, by individuals singly or in combination, is to be followed by congressional inquisition, the task of labor will never end, nor will the expense ever cease. One of these very States here named—Mississippi—was the subject last summer of a most searching and vigorous inquisition. There stands upon the files of the Senate, published at great cost, a document of twenty-two hundred printed pages of testimony and reports relating to Mississippi alone, which I am sure no Senator could yet have read, unless it be one or two of those who shared in the great labors of that committee and may have some knowledge of the contents. It was not printed until long after the adjournment of Congress; and yet it is proposed now to duplicate that labor. Sir, the pecuniary expense of this proceeding is its most trivial feature. That is a matter perhaps not worthy of so much consideration, although there is a duty in economy. It is not that, Mr. President. It is the assumption of powers that do not belong to this body; it is the perpetuation of a system of inquisition and interference that has never produced other fruits than those of discord and unhappiness; it is the deliberate continuance of a system that has plainly met with the reprobation of the people of the United States, without respect to political party, and I can see that the substance of this inquiry is nothing less than the grasp at a jurisdiction over the domestic and internal affairs of the States boundless in its extent and unending in its application. We are, according to the meaning of these resolutions, to sit upon contested elections in all the States wherever an allegation shall be made that by classes or by individuals the right to vote has been abridged or denied. Look upon it and see how perfectly impracticable it is. See how perfectly without warrant is the attempted exercise of jurisdiction. I say nothing of motive; I cannot know men's motives and am not given to impugning them. I only feel that there is coming close upon this Senate and upon the people of the United States a time when law and their love of law is to be severely tested; and I propose to stand upon the law and let the consequences take care of themselves. Therefore it is now that I resist this attempt to open up again and continue a system called "reconstruction of States" that has been found worse than worthless, whose fruits have been nothing but anarchy, disgrace, and loss; a system which begins by disregarding the limits within which a just exercise of power under the Constitution would confine us, and branches off into a jurisdiction which, as I said before, will be boundless in its extent, interminable as to its time of execution, and fatal in its consequences.

As to the last resolution providing for an inquiry touching the question of the eligibility of electors of President and Vice-President and the power to judge of the regularity of their appointment and the power of Congress over counting the electoral vote, I can only say that perhaps the memory of Senators, but certainly the records of the Senate, will bear me witness how earnestly and indefatigably I strove to have that question considered at the last session of Congress. The honorable Senator who now occupies the chair [Mr. ANTHONY] remembers the debates, for I recall his taking part in them and the interest he exhibited in them. I felt then and feel now that those were the hours and those were the days in which these questions should have been considered and settled before the result upon party welfare could be predicted from the action of the law. Then was the time I did seek to withdraw the question from the heat of partisan discussion, to protect it from the feelings that are engendered even by debate alone, and to consign the question to a carefully chosen committee of able and intelligent and patriotic men of the two Houses, differing in their party politics, that they might possibly, with care, with thought, prepare some method which, not being touched by the fires of opposition or discussion on either side, could be returned to us as something upon which they quietly and in seclusion had agreed. I believed then that this question should have no taint of party. I believed then that calmness, sedateness, and serenity of mind were essential to a settlement of the question that should remain as law and be obeyed as law. Unfortunately my wishes did not prevail. Unfortunately those who controlled the action of this body did not see the matter as I saw it then or feel toward it as I did. We are here now at the end of an exciting canvass to pass a law the effect of which necessarily will betray in advance that as we vote upon the law so may we in effect decide the result of the election.

Mr. President, I regard that as unfortunate, and yet our duty remains to do the best that we can under the circumstances; and, not as party men, but as Americans, not as republicans or democrats, but as men loving their whole country, that we should dismiss from our minds the question of party advantage and believe that we can have no road so firm to walk upon as in our written Constitution with its limitations upon our power, not undertaking irregular power for the purpose of any imagined party advantage. Sir, it is in that spirit that I trust this Congress will be guided; it is with that spirit I know I speak to-day, and hope to be actuated throughout, and therefore it is that I have uttered these words of caution and, as I believe, of warning, and somewhat of protest, against the assumption of power to undertake the examination of questions not confided to us by the charter of our Government.

As to the last resolution, I am disposed to vote for it if it can be severed so that a separate vote can be taken; but even as to that I should desire time for examination. It has been materially changed since it was brought before the Senate this morning; so much so as to raise exceedingly interesting and important questions not touched by it before; for instance, this most important question of inquiry "whether Congress has any constitutional power, and, if so, what, and the extent thereof, in respect of the appointment of or action of electors of President and Vice-President of the United States." That has been amended by the interpolation of the words "or either House of Congress," raising a question which, of course, we see is fraught with the very deepest importance and is of the greatest gravity at this present time. That is the question of all questions that the American people to-day are asking; it is not simply the co-ordinate power of Congress, it is the separate power and responsibility of one House of Congress to control the count of the electoral votes that to-day is the mighty question before which the American people are standing, and which must be answered at the present session of Congress. Yet that has been put into this resolution only to-day. All this opens up new fields of inquiry. I do not mean to say the mere inquiry would bind any one, I do not mean to say that it ought not to be made; but I do say that questions of this kind should be passed upon most deliberately, and not pressed through, as is now sought to be done, in what may be called the very first working day of the meeting of the Senate; scarcely that, because the custom of the Senate has been heretofore that when the message of the President of the United States has been received, and it has been read, the Senate adjourns for the purpose of considering this new and weighty communication. That has not been done in the present case. The message and its consideration have been laid aside informally, as some casual and ordinary message during the session. That is not usual, Mr. President. In matters of this kind it behooves us all to act with great deliberation; and there is no disposition for delay. If it shall be the will of the Senate to come at once to a vote upon this question, I shall not stand longer in the way.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of merely asking that these resolutions, comprising as they do so many subjects, may be voted upon separately. The first three resolutions I shall vote against, because I accept the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in construing the fourteenth amendment, and I believe that that amendment refers solely to a denial or abridgment of the right of a citizen of the United States to vote by a State, and not by any turbulent faction in a State or parties for whom the State government is not responsible. I shall certainly, therefore, vote against the first branch of this proposition. In regard to the investigation of the recent elections in some of the States, I am for immediate and prompt action, and as soon as the vote is taken on the first three resolutions I propose to offer a substitute for the last resolution inviting thorough scrutiny and investigation into certain transactions in those States.

Mr. MERRIMON. Without detaining the Senate in debating it, I move to add the following:

Provided, nevertheless, That such examination shall be confined to the inquiry whether the right of any such persons as are described in said section of said article has been in any manner or measure denied or abridged by the constitution and laws, or any of them, of said States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and taken.

Mr. MERRIMON. Before the vote is announced I desire to state that my intention is that the amendment should come in at the end of the first resolution.

Mr. KERNAN, (who had not voted on the call of the roll.) With that explanation I desire to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. COCKRELL, (who had not voted during the call of the roll.) With that explanation I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 39; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kernan, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Merrimon, Norwood, Price, Randolph, Ransom, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Blaine, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Chaffee, Christiancy, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Dawes, Dorsey, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock Howe, Ingalls, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill, Morton, Oglesby, Paddock Patterson, Sargent, Spencer, Teller, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—39.

ABSENT—Messrs. Barnum, Booth, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Ferry, Gordon, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Key, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sharon, and Sherman—12.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BOGY. I move to amend the resolution by striking out the preamble, all down to the word "resolved."

Mr. McDONALD. Would it be in order for me to move to strike out the first clause of the preamble?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) Such a motion would be in order.

Mr. McDONALD. I desire, then, to offer that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana moves to strike out the first clause of the preamble. It will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the words proposed to be stricken out, as follows:

Whereas it is provided by the second section of the fourteenth article of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States that "Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens over twenty-one years of age in such State;"

And."

Mr. McDONALD. I desire to make one remark. I have listened to the mover of these resolutions, and he said that it was not the intention of the resolutions to express any opinion as to the force and effect of the fourteenth amendment as to what class of cases the denial of the right to vote shall apply to. If the purpose of these resolutions is simply to ascertain what facts have transpired in the States named in the resolutions with reference to the election, outside of any legal status or question, I would be very willing to vote for them. If this portion of the preamble is stricken out, it seems to me that then the implication which has been claimed, and which it seems to me is very clear upon it, would not appear. I desire the yeas and nays upon my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How much of the preamble does the Senator move to strike out?

Mr. McDONALD. All that which refers to the fourteenth amendment, the first clause.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have seen a good deal in this body, but I did suppose our friends on the other side would be willing to let the Constitution stay in the preamble. I hope we shall stick to it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 21, nays 40; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Goldthwaite, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Key, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Merrimon, Norwood, Price, Randolph, Ransom, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, and Withers—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Blaine, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Chaffee, Christiancy, Clayton, Conkling, Cragin, Dawes, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill, Morton, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Spencer, Teller, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—40.

ABSENT—Messrs, Barnum, Booth, Cockrell, Conover, Eaton, Gordon, Kelly, Kernan, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sharon, Sherman, and Whyte—14.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A division having been ordered the question recurs upon the first resolution, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The preamble will be reserved till after the resolutions have been voted on.

The question was taken by yeas and nays on the first resolution in the following words:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections, when appointed, be, and it hereby is, instructed to inquire and report as soon as may be—

1. Whether, in any of the elections named in said amendment in said States in the years 1873 or 1876, the right of any portion of such inhabitants and citizens to vote as aforesaid has been in any wise denied or abridged; and that said committee be authorized to extend this inquiry to the elections of 1874.
2. To what extent such denial or abridgment has been carried.
3. By what means such denial or abridgment has been accomplished.
4. By whom has such denial or abridgment been effected.
5. With what motives and for what purposes has such denial or abridgment been carried on.
6. By what authority or pretended authority has such denial or abridgment been exercised.

The result was announced—yeas 41, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Blaine, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Chaffee, Christiancy, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Dawes, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill, Morton, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Sargent, Spencer, Teller, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—41.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kernan, Key, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Merrimon, Norwood, Price, Randolph, Ransom, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Barnum, Booth, Gordon, Kelly, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sharon, and Sherman—9.

So the first resolution was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the second resolution, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. WHYTE. The second resolution I presume is the one at the bottom of the first page:

Resolved further, That the said committee have power to employ such number of stenographers as shall be needful, and to send for persons and papers, and have leave to sit during the sessions of the Senate, and to appoint subcommittees with full power to make the inquiries aforesaid and report the same to the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is right.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Have these resolutions been separated, each one?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I presume the Senators do not wish the yeas and nays on that resolution.

Mr. WHYTE. No; but to the next one I want to ask the attention of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the Chair will put the question on the second resolution without having the yeas and nays taken.

The second resolution was agreed to.

The question recurred upon the third resolution, as follows:

Resolved further, That said committee, in order to the more speedy performance of its duties, have power to provide for the taking of depositions, on the subjects aforesaid, before any officer authorized by the laws of the United States to take depositions, and to receive and consider the same.

Mr. WHYTE. This third resolution I do think opens the door to a great deal of misconduct on the part of bad people in the South, in any of these States where the committee is directed to make inquiry. We all recollect the testimony of Theodore Jacques, in the Louisiana case a few years ago, who openly avowed that he had manufactured, I think thirteen hundred and odd affidavits to order. The resolution which has just been adopted gives ample power to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, by itself or by its sub-committee, to take full testimony and to cross-examine witnesses who may be testifying on these subjects; but to open the door to depositions taken without notice, without cross-examination, before a United States commissioner, and sent here, will really not inform the Senate as to the actual truth of the transactions to which the deponents testify. Investigation into Louisiana affairs, as reported to the Senate, established the fact that too many affidavits were made, the affiants really not knowing what they swore to. I hope, therefore, that this resolution will not pass.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am sorry the Senator objects to this resolution. I think myself that the committee will have power to receive depositions without it, but it does not require them to receive depositions. It says they shall have the power to provide for the taking of depositions. I think this authority may be safely left to the committee to get evidence in such manner as courts of justice receive it, at any rate.

Mr. THURMAN. Heretofore where the amount of duty devolved upon a committee has been such as to make it impossible for the whole committee to act together in the discharge of that duty, it has been customary to have subcommittees especially for the purpose of taking testimony; but if I understand the scope of this resolution it is to authorize this committee to say that A B or C D or E F may proceed to take depositions. There is no provision that anybody shall be notified. The whole proceeding will be essentially ex parte; and the matter is not helped one particle by calling them depositions instead of affidavits. What then will be the result? We are told that in Louisiana the mills for the manufacture of depositions on both sides have been running with great industry now for more than a month, and I see it stated that gentlemen are coming on here to Washington on one side and the other, to use the language I saw in a newspaper, each of them with two bushels of affidavits to be laid before Congress, ex parte of course. Here is a proposition, as I understand it, to clothe the committee with power to name some person to take depositions. How can that person take depositions, for instance, under the sanctions necessary to the ascertainment of the truth? Suppose, for instance, that a witness shall refuse to answer, how is he to be punished for contempt; how is he to be compelled to answer? Besides, what is more than that, does not every one see that these will all be ex parte depositions, or affidavits rather, got up, so to speak, in the dark, upon which no court in the world would determine a case of five shillings? That will certainly be the result of this thing, and nothing else. Your Committee on Privileges and Elections, containing some of the leading members of the Senate, whose duties require them to be here, will stay here, while a set of affidavit-takers, and I fear affidavit-makers, will perambulate these States to accumulate this kind of stuff which will be called testimony. My own impression about it is that, instead of throwing light upon the subject, it will only darken instead of enlightening; that they will only get up a mass of stuff that will be called testimony, but that would not be received in the lowest court in the United States, or in any civilized country. If you had the presence of one of the members of the committee, then his high character would be some security that the investigation would be honest, that the words of the witness would be taken down correctly; that the truth would be got out of him so far as it was possible for examination to get it; that if he was swearing falsely his falsehood would be exposed as far as cross-examination would expose it. You would have some security for that in the character of the member of your committee, a Senator of the United States; but to say that Tom, Dick, and Harry may go about on a mission to hunt up sensational stories and reduce them into the form of depositions or affidavits and pile them in here as a basis for congressional action, seems to me to be one of the most unwise things that could possibly be conceived.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do Senators wish the yeas and nays on this little matter of taking testimony?

Mr. THURMAN. I did not demand the yeas and nays. I do not know who did.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The yeas and nays were demanded on the whole proposition; but the resolutions were divided. That is how it happens.

Mr. THURMAN. It is wholly indifferent to me whether the yeas and nays are taken or not. I know very well if they are taken the resolution will be adopted. I see that the whole thing was foreordained, perhaps from the foundation of the world.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, Mr. President, the Senator is right; it was foreordained before the foundation of the world, as truth, and justice, and the means of getting at it, in spite of all opposition, factious or otherwise, will always live.

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, because the Senator from Vermont has a firm conviction that orthodoxy is his doxy and heterodoxy is everybody else's doxy.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is. I am right about that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The call for the yeas and nays will be regarded as withdrawn by general consent.

The third resolution was agreed to.

The question recurred on the fourth and last resolution, as follows:

Resolved further, That the said committee be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire into the eligibility to office under the Constitution of the United States of any persons alleged to have been ineligible on the 7th day of November last, or to be ineligible as electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, to whom certificates of election have been or shall be issued by the executive authority of any State as such electors; and whether the appointment of electors or those claiming to be such in any of the States has been made, declared, or returned, either by force, fraud, or other means, otherwise than in conformity with the Constitution and laws of the United States and the laws of the respective States; and whether any appointment or action of any such elector has been in any wise unconstitutionally or unlawfully interfered with; and to inquire and report whether Congress, or either House thereof, has any constitutional power, and, if so, what, and the extent thereof, in respect of the appointment of or action of electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, or over returns, or certificates of votes of such electors; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, and to employ a stenographer, and have leave to sit during the session of the Senate.

Mr. WHYTE. The first resolution and its tender, the two other resolutions, having been adopted, relating to the enforcement of the fourteenth amendment, and this last resolution having reference to the presidential election, I offer this as a substitute for the last resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee of nine members of the Senate be appointed to investigate the recent elections in the States of South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana, and the action of the returning boards in the said States in reference thereto, and to report all the facts essential to an honest return of the votes received by the electors for the said States for President and Vice-President of the United States; and whether the said States are entitled to be considered in the count of the electoral votes of the States; and, for the speedy execution of this purpose, the said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to take testimony, and at their discretion to detail subcommittees with like authority to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths and take testimony; and said committee and subcommittees are empowered to employ stenographers, clerks, and messengers, and shall be attended by a deputy sergeant-at-arms. That the said committee be, and hereby is, instructed to inquire into the eligibility to office under the Constitution of the United States of any persons alleged to have been ineligible on the 7th day of November last, or to be ineligible as electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, to whom certificates of election have been or shall be issued by the executive authority of any State as such electors; and whether the appointment of electors, or those claiming to be such in any of the States, has been made either by force, fraud, or other means other than in conformity to the Constitution and laws of the United States and the laws of the respective States; and whether any such appointment or action of any such elector has been in any wise unconstitutionally or unlawfully interfered with; and that said committee shall have leave to report by bill or otherwise at any time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the substance of what the honorable Senator from Maryland has proposed, although apparently not in accordance with the views he expressed last year, is the substance of the last resolution which I have had the honor to offer. The only difference in substance, as my resolution covers all three of these States in every possible aspect of the case—fraud, force, violence, or any other means in respect of the appointment of electors or their behavior—is that if the amendment be adopted it constitutes a special committee, of which, by the usage of the Senate, my honorable friend would be the proper chairman, (and we certainly could not confide the duty to any more valuable member,) instead of confiding it to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I should hope, therefore, that my resolution would not be interfered with, as it covers the whole subject, and we should leave the proper committee, instead of this special committee, to perform the duty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland as a substitute for the last resolution.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to understand this before I vote. Does the Senator from Maryland move to strike out any part of the resolution?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He moves this amendment as a substitute for the last resolution.

Mr. CONKLING. So I heard; but as the Secretary read, I thought that succeeding the new matter introduced by the amendment there followed what seemed to be literally the present resolution. I should like to know how that is? The Senator from Maryland can inform me no doubt. Does he strike out any portion of the last resolution, or does he merely in offering his substitute introduce certain matter of his own and also include the whole of the present resolution?

Mr. WHYTE. I amend a part of the present resolution and add to it also.

Mr. CONKLING. So that the motion is both to strike out and to add, and it proposes a separate committee?

Mr. WHYTE. Yes, sir; for the reason, the Senator from New York will allow me to say, that the duties imposed upon the Committee on Privileges and Elections by the first resolution will certainly occupy all their time for the next two months.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the last resolution. Is the call for the yeas and nays insisted upon on the last resolution?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays are ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 49, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Blaine, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Chaffee, Christiancy, Clayton, Cockrell, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Dawes, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Kernan, Logan, McDonald, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill, Morton, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Randolph, Ransom, Sargent, Spencer, Teller, Wadleigh, Wallace, West, Windom, and Wright—49.

NAYS—Messrs. Eaton, Goldthwaite, Johnston, Key, McCreery, Maxey, Merrimon, Norwood, Stevenson, Whyte, and Withers—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Barnum, Bayard, Bogy, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Gordon, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Price, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sharon, Sherman, and Thurman—15.

So the resolution was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the preamble.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I presume we do not need the yeas and nays on that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the call for the yeas and nays insisted upon on the preamble? The Chair hears no objection to the call being withdrawn. The question is on the preamble.

The preamble was agreed to.

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to give notice that to-morrow, if I can get the floor, I shall move to take up Senate resolution No. 10, being a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States respecting the method of counting and ascertaining the result and deciding upon the electoral votes of the States for President and Vice-President of the United States, that was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary on the 12th of May last, and I give notice of an amendment which I shall propose to offer, which I ask may be printed, which makes it, if adopted in season, applicable to the present election.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order to print will be made, if there be no objection.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTORS.

Mr. MERRIMON. I ask unanimous consent, without previous notice, to introduce a bill and to accompany its introduction with a word of explanation. I believe that the election of electors of President and Vice-President is a State election, and experience has proven that the several States ought to provide some means for contesting such elections. The time which intervenes between the election of electors and the day when the electoral colleges meet is so short that no regular contest can be made. The purpose of my bill is to so alter the law that the election shall take place on the first Tuesday of October and the electoral college meet on the first Wednesday in January, so as to give reasonable time to make contest if one shall be deemed proper in any State.

I move that the bill be printed and laid on the table for the present.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 1049) to alter the time prescribed for holding the elections for electors for President and Vice-President and casting the vote in the electoral college for President and Vice-President; which was read twice by its title and ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and twenty-two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 5, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Journal as read will be regarded as approved by the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour will now begin at half past twelve o'clock.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution to which I am sure there will be no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize gentlemen to offer resolutions which are not objected to.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. PLAISTED. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his question of privilege.

Mr. PLAISTED. On the passage of the resolution introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] yesterday, I am reported in the RECORD as not voting. I voted in the negative, and my recollection of the matter is very distinct. The Journal may be, and I presume is, correct, as I heard my name read among those voting in the negative. I desire that the error be corrected.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to call attention to an error in the Journal as read touching the matter of an appeal from the decision of the Chair yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. PLAISTED] is not recorded as voting. The roll was carefully called and carefully read over, and the clerks inform the Chair that the Journal is correct in that respect.

Mr. BANKS. I move that the Journal be corrected so that the vote of the gentleman from Maine may be recorded.

Mr. HOLMAN. There can be no correction of the Journal at this period which will change the result of the vote as announced, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. BANKS. Certainly there can be. The Journal cannot be recognized by the House without a vote of approval, if there is an error in it; I do not say there is; but, if that be conceded, then we have the right to correct the Journal in that regard; there can be no doubt about that.

Mr. HOLMAN. As to yea and nay votes the Journal is made up at the time, and is read in presence of the House for the purpose of correcting errors. For that reason, if the change of a vote changes the result I think that over an objection a change in the Journal has never been allowed in the House.

Mr. BANKS. It makes no difference whether the result is changed or not, if a member voted upon that question. The only authority for raising the question is the Journal as it is read this day; and if there be an error in it, it is the right of the House to correct it; and if the correction changes the result, then the question will again be submitted to the House; the Speaker can give his vote and decide it. I shall move to amend the Journal, if the fact be as stated by the honorable gentleman from Maine.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a question of order: that a motion to amend the record is not now in order, the Journal having been approved.

Mr. BANKS. The Journal has not been approved.

Mr. SPRINGER. I beg the gentleman's pardon; the Journal was approved, and the Speaker announced the commencement of the morning hour. Thereupon the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON] rose to introduce a resolution and the gentleman from Maine rose to a question of privilege. He stated that question, but he did not make a motion to amend the Journal. I further desire to state that a motion to amend the record——

Mr. PLAISTED. I rose to my feet the moment the journal clerk got through reading.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would take no advantage of the gentleman from Maine in that regard, even if he had not risen at that moment.

Mr. PLAISTED. I wish to state that my recollection in this matter is very distinct, on account of a remark made to me by one of the members on the outer row of seats when I voted. He said to me that perhaps the clerks did not get the vote or did not hear me. In consequence of that remark, I listened very attentively, and my name was read among those who voted in the negative.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, it is very clear that if the record presents the course of procedure in the House on yesterday, no motion to correct it, no motion to amend the record can be entertained. The motion is in effect a motion to amend the record. I ask to have read in connection with what I wish to say a single passage——

Mr. PLAISTED. I do not intend to yield the floor. I claim my right to have the motion passed upon. I ask that the record contained in the Journal of the House be corrected.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will recognize that this is a question of fact, the clerks asserting that he did not vote; and, the usual forms having been proceeded with and the record showing that he did not vote, the gentleman of course is not in a position to press and insist upon a motion.

Mr. PLAISTED. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that I was standing in the outer row, near the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] or the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. LYNDE;] and one of those gentlemen, when I voted, made the remark to me that perhaps the clerks did not hear me, although I spoke very loudly. I will ask those gentlemen to state their recollection on this point.

Mr. BLAIR. I heard the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PLAISTED] distinctly vote in the negative upon this question. He stood in the rear of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. LYNDE.] I was in my seat. When the Clerk called the name of the gentleman from Maine he did not respond promptly; just as the Clerk called the name of the next gentleman on the roll, the gentleman from Maine made his response. He made it very loudly and distinctly; but, thinking that the attention of the clerks might have been called to the next name, I said to him, "Perhaps, Mr. Plaisted, you were not heard." I remember very distinctly that he voted; and he voted in a loud and clear voice. Moreover, let me say that the gentleman did vote before the next response was given.

The SPEAKER. There is an admission on all sides that there is no mistake in the record. The gentleman from Maine himself intimates that he may not have been heard; and now the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] makes a motion which he will be kind enough to indicate.

Mr. PLAISTED. I wish to state, and have it understood distinctly, that in consequence of the remark made to me by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] I came down here to my seat and listened with close attention to the reading of the names; and my name was read among those voting in the negative.

Mr. BANKS. I move that the Journal be corrected by the addition of the name of the honorable gentleman from Maine who voted upon the question as he has stated. Mr. Speaker, I desire to speak of one fact which I think is of importance to the Chair in deciding this question. I do not think that there is a precedent in the practice of this House (there may have been one but I do not think there is) in which when a member of the House has risen in his place and stated that he did an act in the presence of the House which has been overlooked by the Speaker or neglected by the Clerk from not hearing it, the member's word has not been taken as sufficient verification of the fact. I doubt whether in the history of this House there is any instance where in a case of this kind the fact stated by the member has been disputed by the Chair or by the House.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman from Massachusetts will allow me in a single word to refer the Speaker to page 126 of Barclay's Digest, which reads as follows:

When a member's vote is incorrectly recorded, it is his right, on the next day, while the Journal is before the House for its approval, to have the Journal corrected accordingly.—Journal, 2, 30, page 211. But it is not in order to change a correct record of a vote given under a misapprehension.—Journal, 1, 31, page 1266.

It will be observed by the Speaker, therefore, that this is not a claim to correct a vote given under misapprehension, but a claim to correct a record that the truth may appear. Therefore, under what I have read, and the rule as laid down in Barclay's Digest, each member has the absolute right to have the record show verity—that the vote as cast shall be shown in the Journal.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is manifest that according to the uniform practice of the House a motion cannot be favorably entertained changing the record of a vote when it would change the result; for the reason that it is within the power of each individual member to ascertain whether his vote is properly recorded or not. There is no power connected with this House so absolute as that which each individual member possesses to see that his own individual vote is properly recorded. If he fails to resort to these safeguards, to see that his vote is properly recorded, he cannot afterward come in and ask the record be changed, when that change of record will change the result of the action of the House except by unanimous consent.

Mr. KASSON. Allow me to say——

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman will excuse me until I have stated my point. This change in the Journal cannot now be made, over an objection, at this time, because the gentleman from Maine proposes to correct a record over which he had absolute control at the time.

Mr. FOSTER. How?

Mr. HOLMAN. He had absolute control at the time to see that his vote was correctly recorded. It is a power with which he was invested for two purposes: first, for his own protection; and secondly, for the public interest, that the action on a measure which transpired yesterday, and which went partially into effect, shall not be changed on a subsequent day in the correction of the Journal. I not only assume that ground, but say further that under the rules of the House any gentleman desiring to correct the record should do so instantly upon the record itself being read.

Mr. PLAISTED. I did so.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman did not do so immediately. The roll-call was read over, and the vote announced, and the name not being recorded it was within his power to have the matter settled at once. There has been intervening business since the announcement of the vote. And, sir, the gentleman from Massachusetts will not say that the gentleman from Maine resorted to every proper means within his power to see that his name was properly recorded yesterday.

Mr. FOSTER. What more could he have done?

Mr. HOLMAN. He could have ascertained, if he had doubts about the fact of his vote being heard or recorded, and it seems the gentleman from Maine did have some doubts whether his name was heard, whether it was in fact recorded. He had the right to rise in his seat, as a question of the highest privilege, to ascertain whether his name was recorded. But the gentleman did not do so yesterday when this vote was taken.

There is no matter so completely, as I must repeat again, within the control of the House, and of each individual member of the House, as the making up properly of the record of the votes. For that reason it has been uniformly held that the result of a vote must be taken as final when the subject comes up for consideration on a subsequent day and the error in the Journal is not admitted.

Mr. KASSON. Let me ask the gentleman from Indiana a question.

Mr. HOLMAN. It must be taken as final when the question is raised on a subsequent day, long after the vote has been announced, on motion to correct the roll-call unless the fact of the error is admitted. Here the clerks insist that the Journal is correct.

Mr. KASSON. I think the gentleman forgets that the rule he speaks of has been applied in cases where the member asks the privilege of recording a vote which he did not cast, or of correcting his own vote given under misapprehension. The rule he refers to has been applied in those cases, but it has never within my knowledge been applied where it concerns a change of the Journal. Where, as I have read from Barclay's Digest, it is the member's absolute right——

Mr. HOLMAN. The reason is the same in both instances. First, to secure the individual right of members; and secondly, to prevent public injury by a change of the record in the Journal, after the vote had been announced, and the order of the House has been partially executed. Absolute power is placed in the hands of each member at the time, to see that his vote is properly recorded.

I wish to ask the gentleman from Iowa, whether, in his experience in this House, I am not correct in saying the House has never allowed a change to be made in the record of its votes on a subsequent day, when the result of a vote would be affected by that change.

Mr. KASSON. I can only say I have never known it extend much beyond the two instances I have named, where permission was asked to record a vote which was not given; and, secondly, where the member asked to correct his own vote given under misapprehension. It is the distinct case of a correction of the record to make the record tell the truth, and in that respect the gentleman should see that it puts us all at the mercy of an inaccurate clerk, unless we have that right. Even a law may be adopted without power to correct it if the clerk shall wish so to record votes as to pass the law. There cannot be safety unless the record is made to show the verity.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have never known such an instance myself of the Journal being changed unless the error was admitted. If the fact of the error is admitted by the clerks and the members of the House of course the correction can be made, and it is often done. On the contrary, in my experience there have been instances, and I think the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] can call to mind instances of the same kind, where such motions have not been entertained on the ground I have mentioned, that the record being completely under the control of each member it must be conclusive and final.

Mr. BANKS. I ask a moment to respond to the gentleman from Indiana.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. BANKS. The gentleman has made an appeal to me, and I want to respond.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will take it back.

Mr. BANKS. It cannot be taken back. I will say, in answer to the gentleman's suggestion, that I have never known a proposition to amend the Journal in a material point of fact where it has been refused; but I have known repeatedly that where members of the House have risen to make a statement on their word of honor as members of the House that there was a mistake in the Journal, it has been corrected.

Mr. HOLMAN. When it changed the result?

Mr. BANKS. Yes; when it changed the result.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will be glad if the gentleman will point to a precedent.

Mr. BANKS. I will point to a principle which is better than an instance. I beg the attention of the gentleman from Indiana. What is the advantage of the right to correct the Journal if the correction does not change any result? What is the advantage of a right of the House to correct the Journal where it produces no material change in point of fact? How does the gentleman from Indiana say I can move to correct the Journal where it is immaterial and no change is made, but where it changes the result I have not the right? I am sure the House will not support that position.

Let me say another thing. This does not change any result. No, sir; no result is changed by this motion which I submit. The result of the vote was that there was one more in the negative than the record exhibits. Therefore, there was a mistake in the record. There is no mistake in the result unless the Chair or the House shall say that the gentleman from Maine, a member of the House, has stated what is false with regard to his vote.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BANKS. I beg the gentleman's pardon for one moment longer. He has said a member is bound to watch and take all the precautions, and avail himself of all the safe-guards in regard to securing the accuracy of the record. That is not correct. That is not a correct statement of the right or duty of a member of the House. The clerks of the House, the sworn officers of the House, are required to keep a correct record of the proceedings; and if every member of the House is obliged to give his time to the performance of their duty and to see they do perform it, he cannot attend to the business of the House. You know, Mr. Speaker, that no member has the right to go to the Clerk's desk to ascertain if his vote is correctly recorded or not. The gentleman from Maine has done all a member can do in regard to that matter. The gentleman from Maine stands up here and says to the House that his attention was called to the record of his vote. He watched the reading of the record. He heard his name read in the negative. Yes, sir, he watched the reading of the record and heard his name in the negative. What more can you ask? When the Journal is read next day his name does not appear on the record in the negative. What more can you want to justify the proposition to amend the Journal?

Now let me say one other thing, and I will leave this question. I ask pardon of the House for troubling it so long, and I will say but one word more, and will then leave the question. Sir, the proposition to which this vote refers is one of a solemn character. It is to send a commission from the House to investigate proceedings in a southern State with regard to the election of officers of the United States. It calls for the appointment of officers, deputy sergeants-at-arms, stenographers, clerks, messengers. It calls for the organization of an almost completely independent commission. It requires money to be paid from the Treasury of the United States. There is no authority for that act, except what is placed upon the Journal. At this hour there is no other authority for it.

Nobody can go back to the vote of yesterday; no man can recall the events of yesterday, because of those events there is no record except that which lies upon your desk. Upon that record there is a mistake; of that there can be no doubt. I do not censure the clerks of the House at all; I am willing to concede that it has been a matter of inadvertence. Possibly in the confusion of the House, or perhaps, because of the withdrawing the attention of the clerks by some member for a moment, the mistake may have been made.

Mr. CONGER. I asked that the vote might be read again.

Mr. BANKS. Certainly. Half a dozen gentlemen, one after another, rose at the close and declared that their votes had been recorded, and their names read, on both sides of the question. My friend from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] asked that the list might be read again, and as the record shows, the majority of the House refused to have it read again.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] will excuse me.

Mr. BANKS. I will. I thank the gentleman for the opportunity of saying so much; the privilege of speaking is a privilege which I appreciate very highly indeed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I was in hopes that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] would answer the question which I propounded to him. It was a direct inquiry whether, in his experience as a member of the House, he had ever known a motion like this to be entertained favorably, where it would change the result of a given vote, and the fact of the error was not admitted by the clerks and the House. And the gentleman avails himself, as he always does, of his admirable eloquence to obscure the fact. The gentleman does not point to an instance where, after the usual safeguards have been resorted to which every member has under his control, and a mistake has been made in the record—the gentleman cannot point to an instance where a member was permitted to correct that record and change the result unless the fact was conceded by those having charge of the Journal. I think I am entirely safe in saying that no such precedent can be found. The safeguards are innumerable; they were mostly resorted to on yesterday by gentlemen anxious to avoid a mistake.

Mr. CONGER. Allow me a question.

Mr. HOLMAN. In a moment. The roll was called very carefully. The record of the vote is required to be read and is to be approved at the moment, eo instanti. There is to be no delay about it; we do not wait until the next day, because the result of that vote may be carried into effect before the next day shall come. That part of the record must be made up at the time.

If any gentleman entertains some apprehension, as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PLAISTED] seems to have done, and as some other gentleman did, it is his right against every other member and all other members of the House to rise in his seat and have the fact ascertained for himself individually, in the presence of the whole House, whether his name was properly recorded or not. What is that for? It is because the record of that vote must be made out at the moment. It is upon this solid foundation that the rule rests, that there shall be no change the succeeding day in the vote unless by unanimous consent, if it shall affect the record and if it shall change the result. And that is for a manifest public reason, for a reason higher than the interest of any individual member; it is because the vote may have been partly executed, and grave evil might result from a change in the vote the next day.

Mr. SEELYE. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HOLMAN. For a question.

Mr. COX. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SEELYE. I am surprised at this discussion.

Mr. COX. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX. If the Speaker desires to hear the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SEELYE] I will defer my point of order.

Mr. SEELYE. I have but a word to say, if the gentleman will allow me. I am surprised at this discussion. As the Journal of yesterday is read this morning, a member of this House rises immediately upon its conclusion, as I can testify, and demands the attention of the Speaker, but fails to secure it, and asks for a correction of his record. I have never known such a request fail of being granted for a moment. There is a rule of the House requiring that it should be done. If there were no rule of the House applicable to the question, there is a common sentiment of honor and justice requiring it to be done.

Now, I confess to a kind of indignation that anything further than the simple word of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PLAISTED] is required as evidence of the fact—evidence of the fact that he voted, and evidence of the fact that he distinctly heard his name read in the negative. I voted in the affirmative on this question. I desired that this committee should be appointed. But I will not, by any action of mine, allow that even righteous ends shall be gained by unrighteous means. It is the clear right of a member of this House to have the Journal corrected as he claims that it should be. And I am surprised that any member of this House should rise in his seat and object to it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will now hear the point of order of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will allow me just one word and then I shall conclude.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SEELYE] argues this as if it were an original question which had never been before this House heretofore. I am arguing it from the stand-point of public law—for no one questions the perfect integrity of the gentleman from Maine—the law of this House founded on public reasons. If the gentleman had cited a precedent——

Mr. SEELYE. As the gentleman refers to "public law," I hope he will allow me to call his attention to page 1002 of Cushing's Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies, in which it is said—

It is quite common to correct mistakes in a count, and, if made necessary by such correction, to alter the determination of the House.

Mr. KASSON. And I beg to offer the gentleman the precedent which he has desired. It is a precedent in this House, and, if he wishes, it can be read.

Mr. HOLMAN. The proposition read by the gentleman from Massachusetts is not necessarily applicable to the question now before the House, but if the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] has a precedent of actual adjudication in this House, of course I should be glad to hear it.

Mr. HOSKINS. I have a precedent on this very question. It is contained in the record of this House, which I hold in my hand.

Mr. KASSON. I have such a precedent in the House Journal of the second session of the Thirtieth Congress, page 211, proceedings of Monday, January 8, 1849, where a bill was announced on Saturday by the Speaker to have been passed. On Monday corrections were made which changed the result and defeated the bill. In connection with this case——

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman read the record?

Mr. KASSON. I will send it to the Clerk, only desiring first to call the attention of the House to the points involved, that members may see the pertinency of the precedent. Here was the precise point raised by the gentleman from Maine, in addition to other points:

Mr. Farrelly rose and called for a further correction of the Journal, stating that he voted in the negative on Saturday last, and his vote appeared not to have been recorded. The Speaker decided that it was the right of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to have his vote recorded, if he voted on Saturday last; and the correction was accordingly made.

The vote was then finally announced—yeas 98, nays 90—

Thus defeating a bill which on the previous Saturday was declared to have been passed by a vote of 91 yeas to 89 nays. In order that all gentlemen may understand the points of this case, I ask the Clerk to read the whole record.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am still upon perfectly safe ground in my position. I said that there was no precedent of public law in this House for the case now before us where there was a controversy as to the fact.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman allow this record to be read?

Mr. HOLMAN. By unanimous consent that might be done. I understand that the record is plain enough.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman allow the whole record to be read? I think the Speaker would desire it himself.

Mr. HOLMAN. Almost anything may be done in this House by unanimous consent, if not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. KASSON. That was not a case of unanimous consent.

Mr. HOLMAN. If there is any fact showing that the motion was objected to, I should like to hear that read.

Mr. KASSON. I ask the Clerk to read the record as I have marked it in the Journal. I think the Speaker himself will be glad to hear it read, because the point is very fully and distinctly made.

The Clerk read as follows:

MONDAY, January 8, 1849.

As soon as the Journal of Saturday had been read.

The Speaker said: The House will remember that the vote on the passage of the bill for the relief of the representatives of Antonio Pacheco was originally made up by the Clerk—ayes 90, noes 89; and this record having been handed to the Speaker and by him announced to the House, the Speaker proceeded to make some remarks upon the bill preparatory to giving the vote contemplated in such cases by the rules of the House. While in the act of explanation the Speaker was interrupted by the Clerk, who stated that on a more careful count the vote was found to be—ayes 91, noes 89. The intervention of the Speaker was therefore no longer allowable; and the bill was declared to have passed the House.

The Chair takes the earliest opportunity to state to the House this morning that, upon a re-examination of the yeas and nays, the Clerk has ascertained that an error existed in the announcement of the vote on Saturday. The vote actually stood—ayes 89, noes 89. The correction will now accordingly be made on the Journal; and a case is immediately presented, agreeably to the twelfth rule of the House, for the interposition of the Speaker's vote.

At this stage of the proceedings the Speaker was interrupted by Mr. Farrelly, who rose and called for a further correction of the Journal, stating that he voted in the negative on Saturday last, and his vote appeared not to have been recorded.

The Speaker decided that it was the right of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to have his vote recorded if he voted on Saturday last; and the correction was accordingly made.

The vote was then finally announced—yeas 89, nays 90.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, this case has no possible parallel to the one pending before the House, and no fair gentleman will say so. There the Speaker called attention himself to a mistake in the record. The Clerk also called attention to the mistake. It was a conceded mistake, conceded by all the members of the House, and by unanimous consent the correction was made.

Mr. HOSKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to the fact that that is precisely this case?

Mr. HOLMAN. When the gentleman says that this is parallel to that case——

Mr. HOSKINS. Precisely.

Mr. HOLMAN. Any one saying that that is a parallel case does injustice to language.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman does not desire to have the House misunderstand the fact. Independent of the proceeding of the Speaker, independent of the declarations of the Clerk, there was a second change in the result, all the efforts being to the verity of the Journal. Mr. Farrelly, like the gentleman from Maine, got up on Monday following the Saturday and said he was incorrectly recorded. The Speaker decided as the personal right of the member that his vote should be recorded, and no member more than the gentleman from Indiana, who, if he had been misrepresented on the record, I apprehend, would see the propriety and importance of verity being shown by the Journal. Whatever consequences follow, the Journal should show verity. Every member has the right to verity; no more the Speaker than the member, and that is the whole question.

In this case shall the Journal show verity? Has any individual member the right to make the Journal show verity?

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the case is different in every respect, and in nothing more than this: There the Speaker, who had the control of the record of the House himself, corrected the record and the Clerk gave the necessary information upon which that correction was made. Here the Speaker is told by the clerks keeping this public record, sworn officers of the House, that the record is correct. There is the difference. I am not questioning or doubting the absolute truthfulness of the gentleman from Maine, but the question of fact has been raised by the record.

Mr. HOSKINS. Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that gentlemen on the other side of the House should stand up in this branch of the American Congress and deny to any citizen who will assert in his place as a Representative that he voted upon this resolution, and his vote is not recorded, the right to be properly recorded in the Journal. In a legislative experience of some length I have never yet seen an exhibition of this character. It is not only a violation of the individual right as a Representative, but a violation of all the rules of parliamentary practice that can be found recorded within the lids of any book.

Now, the gentleman from Indiana says the case just stated is not a parallel one. It is precisely the same case. Here is a gentleman declaring, when the Journal is read the next morning after the transaction, that he voted in the negative, and that his vote is not recorded. Speaker Winthrop, in the Thirtieth Congress, directed without debate, as he was perfectly correct and right in doing, that the member had the right to have his vote recorded.

Let me refer to that case in the second session of the Thirtieth Congress, Speaker Winthrop being in the chair: "At this stage of the proceedings," which was the succeeding morning, "the Speaker of the House was interrupted by Mr. Farrelly, who rose to call attention to a further correction of the Journal." A correction of the Journal had already been made on that very morning. "He said that he had voted in the negative on Saturday last, and his vote appeared not to have been recorded." It is precisely this case. Here is a gentleman claiming that the first discovery he made of the omission to record his vote given yesterday was on the reading of the Journal to-day, that while he had voted he had not been recorded in the Journal, and asking the correction to be made. It is precisely the case of Mr. Farrelly in the Thirtieth Congress.

In that case of Mr. Farrelly it is stated, "his vote appeared not to have been recorded." The Speaker decided "that it was the right of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to have his vote recorded after the vote of Saturday last, and the correction was accordingly made." And I venture to say again, you cannot find anywhere a precedent where a man rose in his place and said he had voted, the right was denied to him to have the correction made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say to the House that his judgment is very clear on this point.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to have a paragraph read.

The SPEAKER. Perhaps after you hear what the Chair has to say you will find it unnecessary.

The Chair desires to say, that his judgment is very clear on this point. The object of a journal is to have a correct record of the proceedings of the House. In cases of disputed fact it is not within his power or province to decide, and therefore he holds the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, to correct the Journal, is in order, and so rules.

In this connection, the Chair will have read the report of the proceedings of this morning, which will show that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PLAISTED] was late in rising to correct the Journal, as it had been already approved and the House had passed to other matters. Retracing the steps already taken, the Chair will allow the gentleman from Maine to make the correction of his vote in the Journal.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 5, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. Townsend.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Journal as read will be regarded as approved by the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour will now begin at half past twelve o'clock.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution to which I am sure there will be no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize gentlemen to offer resolutions which are not objected to.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. PLAISTED. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his question of privilege.

Mr. PLAISTED. On the passage of the resolution introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] yesterday, I am reported in the RECORD as not voting. I voted in the negative, and my recollection of the matter is very distinct.

The SPEAKER. The House will remember that the Chair then immediately stated that he would take no advantage of the delay in the recognition of the gentleman from Maine. The Chair therefore rules that the gentleman's vote must be recorded.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to read a passage in support of the decision of the Chair which will satisfy every member of the House of its correctness.

Mr. BUCKNER. I demand the regular order. We have had enough of this.

The SPEAKER. It is not usual to hear anything further as to a point which has been disposed of.

Mr. BANKS. I only desire to read a sentence or two.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear it.

Mr. BANKS. On page 124 of the Manual this will be found:

All proceedings of the House subsequent to the erroneous announcement of a vote, which would have been irregular if such vote had been correctly announced, are to be treated as a nullity, and are not to be entered on the Journal.

Mr. FULLER. I rise to a question of privilege. I desire to correct the Journal. In the vote on the resolution introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] I am recorded as being absent. I voted in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. The committee appointed to wait upon the President and inform him that the House is organized and is ready to receive any communication he may desire to make have discharged that duty and report that the President states that he will send a message in writing forthwith to the House.

The annual message of the President of the United States, with accompanying documents, was then delivered to the House by C. C. SNIFFEN, his Private Secretary.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. KASSON. I have been endeavoring to get the attention of the Chair to a question of privilege connected with the correction of the Journal.

Mr. HOLMAN. My colleague, Mr. FULLER, had risen to make a correction of the Journal and I insist that he shall not be interrupted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. FULLER. I desire to state that when the roll was called I was in my seat and voted ay. The gentleman from Georgia and the gentleman from Texas, who were near me, said to me that perhaps the clerks had not heard my response. I came to the Clerk's desk and asked if my name was recorded in the affirmative, as I had voted. I was told that it was, and I went back satisfied.

The SPEAKER. The same ruling will apply to the record of the vote of the gentleman from Indiana as the Chair has decided applies to the vote of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will my colleague mention the names of the gentlemen from Georgia and Texas to whom he refers?

Mr. FULLER. I had reference to Mr. THROCKMORTON, of Texas, and Mr. HILL, of Georgia.

Mr. HILL. I desire to say that the statement of the gentleman from Indiana is exactly correct. I was standing near the Clerk's desk. The gentleman came up and said, "Is my vote recorded?" He asked the clerk, and I heard the clerk tell him it was recorded in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to make a statement to the House. The vote on the resolution offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] as announced was—ayes 156, noes 78. There seems to have been one omission on each side. The votes omitted, if correctly recorded, would have made the vote 157 to 79. The Speaker was ready on yesterday to have voted as was his constitutional right if his vote would have produced a result either way. And if the Journal had shown the vote to be 157 to 79, he would have voted in the affirmative; still making the two-thirds. The Chair now asks that by unanimous consent, as a solution of the difficulty, the vote may be again taken upon the proposition of the gentleman from New York to suspend the rules and pass the resolution.

Several MEMBERS. No objection.

Mr. HOAR. The entire vote to be taken again?

The SPEAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONGER rose.

Mr. BANKS. I must object.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair asks of the House the privilege of recording his vote.

Mr. BANKS. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. CONGER. I was about to say that the proposition seems to me a fair one that we may arrive at the views of the House. Only I would suggest that the gentleman from New York should move to reconsider the vote taken yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The vote to suspend the rules is not susceptible of a motion to reconsider.

Mr. CONGER. Then I understand the proposition of the Chair is that we take a new vote. I have no objection to that.

Mr. BANKS. I wish to say that I made the objection under a misapprehension. I recognize the right of the Chair to vote.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the Chair casting his vote?

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. There is no objection to another roll-call.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must insist upon his right to vote in the case that his vote would produce a result. He thinks the gentleman from Massachusetts will admit that the Chair has that right.

Mr. BANKS. I do. I desire to say a word upon that point; and as I brought this question to the attention of the House I claim the right to be heard for a moment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is willing to hear the gentleman at length.

Mr. BANKS. The correction of the Journal having been made, the Chair has the same right to vote at this moment as he had if the actual vote had been correctly stated in the session of yesterday. His right is resumed upon the correction of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The Chair then exercises that right, and asks that his vote may be recorded in the affirmative.

Mr. CONGER. Will the Speaker allow me to be heard first? The Chair had made a proposition to have a new vote, to which we upon this side, through my voice, acceded.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that nothing the Chair could suggest would take away from him his constitutional right to vote. That is a privilege which the people have the right to require him to exercise for them.

Mr. CONGER. Then I desire to say that there is not another republican on this side of the House who agrees with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] and with the Chair; not one.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is very sorry to disagree with the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. I think the Chair is not sorry to disagree in this case.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for the regular order.

Mr. KASSON. I now rise to a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON] to offer a resolution. The Chair desires to say to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] that he does not think that anything that has occurred here to-day on the part of the Speaker warrants the reflection that gentleman has just made upon either the decision or the motives of the Chair.

Mr. CONGER. The Speaker will allow me to reply to that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON] to offer a resolution.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent for the adoption of the resolution which I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a question of privilege, if it be one.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not now in order; the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON] has been recognized.

Mr. CONGER. Then the Chair will have the last word.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman immediately after the resolution of the gentleman from Indiana has been disposed of.

THE LATE HON. M. C. KERR.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the special order for Saturday, December 16, at one o'clock, shall be the presentation of suitable resolutions on the death of Hon. M. C. Kerr, Speaker of this House during its last session, and the expression by the members of the esteem in which he was held for his unblemished character, for his eminent services as a Representative, and for his ability and impartiality as a presiding officer.

The resolution was unanimously adopted.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will now recognize the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] upon his question of privilege.

Mr. CONGER. The remarks made by the Chair just now in refer ence to what I had said, I think must have arisen from a misunderstanding or from a motive upon which I may properly comment. The Chair proposed publicly as a solution of the difficulty that a new vote be taken. I arose in my place, after consultation with those immediately around me, and on behalf of this side of the House expressed in words our assent to that proposition.

Immediately upon that assent being given to the Chair's own proposition, the Chair took another course, declined to entertain the proposition which he had himself made and to which we had assented, and carried the resolution in favor of his partisan side by a new ruling. Therefore I made the remark I did, and I think I was justified in it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that, as a matter of fact, all his decisions to-day have been upon the side of the minority. Therefore he was a little surprised when he found a gentleman of that minority reflecting upon his course, and he considered it very unjust. The Chair knows that he did make the proposition to which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] refers, and he states in all frankness that subsequently to making that proposition he was reminded that he had the constitutional right to vote, which he might exercise. And having that right he subsequently did exercise it.

Mr. CONGER. That is the very thing of which I complain.

Mr. CAULFIELD. No doubt of it.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. KASSON. I rise to a correction of the Journal in another particular, touching a motion that I made, on yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is now too late to correct the Journal.

Mr. KASSON. I assure the Chair that I have been endeavoring to obtain the floor for this purpose ever since the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PLAISTED] brought forward his correction of the Journal. At the time his correction was before the House I was examining the Journal, thinking it might be wrong in another respect. I found that it was wrong in this particular, that it represented my appeal to have been taken from the decision of the Chair that we had not the right to have the Journal read; whereas the appeal was taken from the decision of the Chair that there was no morning hour on yesterday in which to call the States and Territories for bills and joint resolutions, and that therefore a motion to suspend the rules was in order. It is that correction of the Journal that I desire to have made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will remember that he appealed from the decision of the Chair, but did not state what that decision was, and the Chair requested him to reduce his appeal to writing.

Mr. KASSON. And I reduced my appeal to writing, and stated that it was "an appeal from the decision just rendered," as is correctly reported in the RECORD. The Journal has put in the other point of order before recording my appeal.

Mr. LUTTRELL. If I remember correctly, the Chair waited some time for the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] to write out his appeal.

Mr. KASSON. It was after the decision of the appeal that I raised the other point.

The SPEAKER. The Journal will be corrected. The Chair means to give the utmost latitude in that particular.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the annual message of the President of the United States; which was read.

[The message will be found in the proceedings of the Senate.]

Mr. WOOD, of New York, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the annual message of the President and accompanying documents be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and printed.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I desire also to offer a resolution with reference to the printing of pamphlet copies of the message and accompanying documents for the use of members. I presume that this resolution will not require to go to the Committee on Printing under the rules, as it does not provide for any extra copies.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the usual number of the message of the President and the reports of the several Secretaries of the Executive Departments of the Government be printed forthwith in pamphlet form for the use of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

ELECTIONS IN SOUTHERN STATES.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of the following committee to investigate the recent election in the State of Louisiana: Mr. WILLIAM R. MORRISON of Illinois, Mr. GEORGE A. JENKS of Pennsylvania, Mr. JOHN A. MCMAHON of Ohio, Mr. WILLIAM P. LYNDE of Wisconsin, Mr. J. C. S. BLACKBURN of Kentucky, Mr. E. R. MEADE of New York, Mr. JOHN F. HOUSE of Tennessee, Mr. JAMES PHELPS of Connecticut, Mr. J. D. NEW of Indiana, Mr. MILES ROSS of New Jersey, Mr. GEORGE W. MCCRARY of Iowa, Mr. LORENZO DANFORD of Ohio, Mr. STEPHEN A. HURLBUT of Illinois, Mr. WILLIAM W. CRAPO of Massachusetts, and Mr. C. H. JOYCE of Vermont.

The SPEAKER also announced the appointment of the following committee to investigate the recent election in the State of Florida: Mr. CHARLES P. THOMPSON of Massachusetts, Mr. REZIN A. DE BOLT of Missouri, Mr. ANSEL T. WALLING of Ohio, Mr. JAMES H. HOPKINS of Pennsylvania, Mr. JAMES A. GARFIELD of Ohio, and Mr. MARK H. DUNNELL of Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. The Chair re-appoints the committee on the election in South Carolina as indicated yesterday.

PROPERTY IN CHARGE OF INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the provisions of the act of July 15, 1870, a full and complete inventory of all the property belonging to the United States under the charge of that Department; which was referred to the Committee of Accounts, and ordered to be printed.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitted in compliance with section 9 of the act of June 25, 1868, to provide for appeals from the Court of Claims and other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PROPERTY IN CHARGE OF HOUSE DOORKEEPER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a statement from the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives of property in his charge on the 4th of December, 1876; which was referred to the Committee of Accounts, and ordered to be printed.

COMMISSIONERS OF SOUTHERN CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the commissioners of claims appointed under the act of March 3, 1871, transmitting their sixth annual report; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SMITH, of Georgia, for fifteen days, on account of important business;

To Mr. HENDEE, for two weeks, on account of sickness in his family; and

To Mr. WIGGINTON indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. HANCOCK, by unanimous consent, obtained leave for the withdrawal from the files of the House of papers in relation to the claim of Mrs. Florence Selley.

Mr. CONGER. In regard to the withdrawal of papers relating to a claim, it should only be allowed when no adverse report has been made.

The SPEAKER. That will be understood.

Mr. CONGER. It should be the rule in all cases.

The SPEAKER. Papers of this kind are never given up, if there has been an adverse report.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is the permanent rule of the House.

HOUR OF DAILY MEETING.

Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That until otherwise ordered, the hour of daily meeting of the House be twelve o'clock m.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House adjourn; but pending that motion I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. WELLS,] who desires unanimous consent for the adoption of a resolution.

COMMITTEE CLERKS.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Accounts be, and they are hereby, instructed to designate the committees of this House which are entitled to clerks under the act of August 15, 1876, and report to this House.

COMMON-SCHOOL EDUCATION.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution; and as I have to go to South Carolina upon committee duty, I hope the resolution will be acted on now without objection.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas the fourteenth article of amendments to the Constitution declares that no State shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law;

And whereas this provision was designed to secure to all persons the equal benefit of all laws: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Education and Labor be, and are, instructed to ascertain whether in any one or more States an equal opportunity for common-school education, including school privileges for equal time, is secured to colored and white children; and if not, that said committee report such bill as may be proper to enforce the Constitution in this respect.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is but an inquiry, I believe?

Mr. LAWRENCE. That is all.

Objection was made.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the resolution is not before the House.

DODD, BROWN & CO.

Mr. STONE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4113) for the relief of Dodd, Brown & Co., of Saint Louis, Missouri, assignees of E. H. Durfee & Co., Durfee & Peck, John Shirley, and William Shirley; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ELECTIONS IN SOUTHERN STATES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints on the Louisiana committee instead of Mr. MCCRARY, of Iowa, who declines to serve, Mr. WASHINGTON TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. He also appoints on the South Carolina committee Mr. ALEXANDER G. COCHRANE, of Pennsylvania, in place of Mr. W. S. STENGER, of Pennsylvania, who declines to serve on account of illness in his family.

A. F. ROCKWELL.

Mr. BANNING, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4114) for the relief of A. F. Rockwell, late aid-de-camp to General Buell; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I insist on my motion.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I ask the gentleman to yield to me that I may offer a resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. I decline to yield.

The question being taken on Mr. HOLMAN'S motion, it was agreed to; and accordingly (at two o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BUCKNER: The petition of Margaret E. Johnson, of Washington City, District of Columbia, for the incorporation of and an appropriation for the Women's National College and Business Institute in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

By Mr. HUNTON: The petition of George Foster, late a private in Company C, Tenth Regiment of Cavalry, United States Army, for a pension, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

By Mr. JENKS: The petition of T. H. Carpenter, late captain in the Seventeenth United States Infantry, for restoration to the regular Army, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MORRISON: Protest of citizens of the second congressional district of the State of South Carolina, against C. W. Buttz being seated as a member of the House from said district, together with certified copies of the action of the supreme court of said State in the matter of The State ex rel. R. M. Sims et al. vs. H. E. Hayne et al., board of State canvassers, to the Committee of Elections.

By Mr. PIERCE: The petition of pilots at Boston, Massachusetts, for the repeal of the law requiring pilot-boats to wear mast-head lights, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. WARREN: The petition of Mrs. Marsilvia F. Woodard, of Cambridgeport, Massachusetts, mother of George R. Woodard, deceased, late of Company B, Eighth United States Infantry, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 6, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ELI SAULSBURY, from the State of Delaware, and JOHN SHERMAN, from the State of Ohio, appeared in their seats to day.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Treasurer of the United States, transmitting, in compliance with the requirements of section 311 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, "fair and accurate copies" of the accounts rendered to and settled with the First Comptroller for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and also a copy of his annual report to the Secretary of the Treasury; which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DAWES. I present the petition of Seth Driggs, who has a claim upon the Venezuelan government, in which he complains of some action of the House of Representatives. I do not know what the merits of his complaint are, but his petition is a proper one in form. It is accompanied by a bundle of original documents. I have not been able to examine them to know whether they are relative to the matter or not. I ask that the petition be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations when appointed, and that the papers lie on the table also until the committees are appointed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be pursued, if there be no objection; and the Chair hears none.

Mr. PRICE presented the petition of H. H. Lemon, of Harper's Ferry, West Virginia, late a member of the Capitol police, praying compensation for damages sustained by falling through a trap-door at the Capitol while in the discharge of his duties; which was ordered to lie on the table, to be referred to the Committee on Claims when appointed.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented the petition of Mrs. Marsilvia F. Woodard, of Cambridgeport, Massachusetts, praying to be allowed a pension; which was ordered to lie on the table, to be referred to the Committee on Pensions when appointed.

Mr. THURMAN presented the petition of E. W. Metcalf, agent for the owners of the ship Delphine, destroyed by the confederate ship Shenandoah December 29, 1864, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 2685) for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award; which was ordered to lie on the table, to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary when appointed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WINDOM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1050) to extend the provisions of an act entitled "An act making an additional grant of lands to the State of Minnesota, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of railroads in said State," approved July 4, 1876; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table and be printed, to be referred to the Committee on Public Lands when appointed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1051) for the relief of Henson Wiseman; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table and be printed, to be referred to the Committee on Claims when appointed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1052) for the relief of A. W. Greely; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table and be printed, to be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs when appointed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask an order to take from the files the papers in reference to the claim of William H. Stephens. There has been an adverse report. A copy can be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that order will be made.

COMMITTEES OF THE SENATE.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the Senate now proceed to the selection of the standing and other committees for the present session of Congress.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. By a rule of the Senate, the thirty-fifth rule, I believe, it is required that the committees shall be selected by ballot. I move that that rule be suspended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the suspension of the rule which requires the choice to be made by ballot?

The Chair hears no objection and the rule will be suspended.

Mr. WRIGHT. I send to the Clerk's desk lists of the committees in the form of resolutions, and I ask their adoption.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the following be the standing committees of the Senate during the present session:

On Privileges and Elections—Messrs. Morton, (chairman,) Logan, Mitchell, Wadleigh, Cameron of Wisconsin, McMillan, Saulsbury, Merrimon, and Cooper.

On Foreign Relations—Messrs. Cameron of Pennsylvania, (chairman,) Morton, Hamlin, Howe, Frelinghuysen, Conkling, McCreery, Bogy, and Eaton.

On Finance—Messrs. Sherman, (chairman,) Morrill, Frelinghuysen, Logan, Boutwell, Jones of Nevada, Bayard, Kernan, and Cooper.

On Appropriations—Messrs. Windom, (chairman,) West, Sargent, Allison, Dorsey, Blaine, Davis, Withers, and Wallace.

On Commerce—Messrs. Conkling, (chairman,) Spencer, Cameron of Wisconsin, Burnside, McMillan, Dawes, Ransom, Dennis, and McDonald.

On Manufactures—Messrs. Robertson, (chairman,) Booth, Bruce, Wallace, and Barnum.

On Agriculture—Messrs. Frelinghuysen, (chairman,) Robertson, Harvey, Davis, and Gordon.

On Military Affairs—Messrs. Logan, (chairman,) Cameron of Pennsylvania, Spencer, Clayton, Wadleigh, Burnside, Gordon, Randolph, and Cockrell.

On Naval Affairs—Messrs. Cragin, (chairman,) Anthony, Sargent, Conover, Blaine, Norwood, and Whyte.

On the Judiciary—Messrs. Edmunds, (chairman,) Conkling, Frelinghuysen, Wright, Howe, Thurman, and Stevenson.

On Post-Offices and Post-Roads—Messrs. Hamlin, (chairman,) Ferry, Dorsey, Jones of Nevada, Dawes, Paddock, Saulsbury, Maxey, and Key.

On Public Lands—Messrs. Oglesby, (chairman,) Windom, Harvey, Hamilton, Paddock, Booth, Kelly, McDonald, and Jones of Florida.

On Private Land-Claims—Messrs. Thurman, (chairman,) Bayard, Bogy, Edmunds, and Christiancy.

On Indian Affairs—Messrs. Allison, (chairman,) Oglesby, Ingalls, Clayton, Dawes, Bogy, and McCreery.

On Pensions—Messrs. Ingalls, (chairman,) Allison, Hamilton, Bruce, Teller, McDonald, and Withers.

On Revolutionary Claims—Messrs. Stevenson, (chairman,) Johnson, Goldthwaite, Wright, and Patterson.

On Claims—Messrs. Wright, (chairman,) Mitchell, Wadleigh, McMillan, Cameron of Wisconsin, Teller, Cockrell, Jones of Florida, and Price.

On the District of Columbia—Messrs. Spencer, (chairman,) Hitchcock, Dorsey, Ingalls, Robertson, Merrimon, and Barnum.

On Patents—Messrs. Wadleigh, (chairman,) Booth, Johnston, Chaffee, and Kernan.

On Territories—Messrs. Hitchcock, (chairman,) Patterson, Christiancy, Sharon, Chaffee, Cooper, and Maxey.

On Railroads—Messrs. West, (chairman,) Hitchcock, Cragin, Howe, Hamilton, Mitchell, Dawes, Ransom, Kelly, Eaton, and Price.

On Mines and Mining—Messrs. Sargent, (chairman,) Alcorn, Harvey, Sharon, Chaffee, Goldthwaite, and Randolph.

On the Revision of the Laws of the United States—Messrs. Boutwell, (chairman,) Alcorn, Christiancy, Wallace, and Price.

On Education and Labor—Messrs. Patterson, (chairman,) Morton, Morrill, Burnside, Bruce, Sharon, Gordon, Maxey, and Key.

On Civil Service and Retrenchment—Messrs. Clayton, (chairman,) Wright, Oglesby, Alcorn, Patterson, McCreery, and Randolph.

To Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate—Messrs. Jones of Nevada, (chairman,) Dawes, and Dennis.

On Rules—Messrs. Ferry, (chairman,) Hamlin, and Merrimon.

On Engrossed Bills—Messrs. Bayard, (chairman,) Withers, and Anthony.

Resolved, That the following select committees be appointed for the present session of the Senate:

On the Levees of the Mississippi River—Messrs. Alcorn, (chairman,) Clayton, Harvey, Cooper, and Cockrell.

To Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service—Messrs. Harvey, (chairman,) Conkling, Allison, Merrimon, and Eaton.

On Transportation-Routes to the Seaboard—Messrs. Mitchell, (chairman,) Sherman, Windom, Conover, Burnside, Norwood, Davis, and Johnston.

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds shall have power to act concurrently with the same committee of the House of Representatives, and shall be as follows: Messrs. Morrill, (chairman,) Cameron of Pennsylvania, Paddock, Cooper, and Whyte.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library shall have power, in conjunction with three members appointed by the House of Representatives, to superintend and direct the expenditure of all moneys appropriated for the Library, and to perform such other duties as are or may be directed by law, and shall be as follows: Messrs. Howe, (chairman,) Edmunds, and Ransom

Resolved, That the Committee on Priuting shall have power, in conjunction with the committee on the part of the House of Representatives, to discharge all the duties now or hereafter devolved upon them by law, and shall be as follows: Messrs. Anthony, (chairman,) Sherman, and Saulsbury.

Resolved, That the Committee on Enrolled Bills shall have power to act concurrently with a similar committee of the House of Representatives in the examination of enrolled bills, and shall carefully compare the enrollment with the engrossed bills as passed in the two Houses, and correcting any errors that may be discovered in the enrolled bills, make their report to the respective Houses, and shall be as follows: Messrs. Conover, (chairman,) Robertson, and Kelly.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to ask whether the latter resolutions in regard to the Committee on Printing, &c., are in the usual form, or are they changed?

Mr. WRIGHT. They are in the usual form.

The resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. Before this matter passes, I believe that the order has been thus far that all business presented shall be referred to the committees when appointed. If there has been any omission, it may be well to include that in a motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All bills and memorials heretofore presented will be referred to the appropriate committees.

Mr. MORTON. Resolutions passed the Senate yesterday imposing upon the Committee on Privileges and Elections very important and arduous duties, requiring a great deal of labor. I move that three additional members be appointed upon that committee to serve in the discharge of the duties imposed by the resolutions adopted yesterday.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the additional members of the committee; and Messrs. HOWE, BOUTWELL, and KERNAN were appointed.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION TESTIMONY.

On motion of Mr. MORTON, it was Ordered, That the testimony taken by the special committee appointed to examine into the question of Chinese immigration be printed with the usual number of copies.

FEDERAL TROOPS IN VIRGINIA.

Mr. WITHERS. I move that the resolution offered by me yesterday, in relation to the occupation of Petersburgh by troops of the United States, be taken up for action.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the Senate, if not incompatible with public interest, under what authority and for what purpose troops of the United States occupied the city of Petersburgh, in the State of Virginia, on the 7th of November, 1876, the day of the general election.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WITHERS. I hope the Senator from Illinois will withdraw the motion for reference. This is a resolution of inquiry, which it seems to be fashionable now to prosecute, and this is a very important inquiry to us. It is simply asking for information upon a subject which is of special interest, not only to our own people, but to all the people of this nation, it seems to me. If any possible good were to result or any possible agency were to be exercised by the committee in shaping the resolution differently, I should have no objection to a reference, but this is a simple resolution of inquiry to which the President alone can respond.

Mr. LOGAN. I presume the committee could get the information, however, and report it to the Senate as readily as it could be obtained in any other way.

Mr. WITHERS. If it were customary to refer all such resolutions, or if the rule were observed to refer resolutions of similar purport, I should have no objection to this resolution taking the same course.

Mr. LOGAN At the last session a resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, calling on the Secretary of War for information of a similar character. It was referred to the committee and the report was made.

Mr. WITHERS. Of course I am aware that I am at the mercy of the majority in the matter, but I should like to press the inquiry.

Mr. LOGAN. There is no disposition to delay it at all, but I think it proper for the resolution to go to a committee.

Mr. WITHERS. It is not usual for such resolutions to be referred to a committee.

Mr. THURMAN. I should like the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to state some reason for asking the reference of this resolution to his committee.

Mr. LOGAN. I will state the reason if the Senator desires. A resolution calling for information, in my judgment, should have a reason to be based on. I have not heard any reason for this inquiry.

Mr. WITHERS. The reason is stated in the resolution.

Mr. LOGAN. The reason is, then, that troops were stationed in a certain place.

Mr. INGALLS. There is no evidence of it.

Mr. LOGAN. There is no evidence that they were there. There is no evidence that they were there for any improper purpose. There is no evidence that they did anything. I will ask the Senator if the theory is now to be established that troops of the United States are to have nowhere in this Government where they are to rest or encamp or to be stationed? Are they to be sent across the seas to be kept out of States, or are they to be kept in the Territories? Unless the troops were there for an improper purpose, there is no reason whatever for the inquiry, because the President of the United States as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy has a right to send troops for a lawful purpose anywhere in the United States; and certainly where they are not doing an unlawful act they have a right to encamp. They may have been in motion; they may have been moving to some place and merely encamped there. I do not know. Hence, unless there is some charge against the President or somebody for improperly putting troops there, I think it is proper the resolution should go to a committee.

Mr. WITHERS. Mr. President, if the troops were merely in transitu, it would be a very simple matter for the President of the United States so to state. It will be for the Senate, on the response to the interrogatory, to say whether any criticism can be based upon the action. It is to secure that information that the resolution is offered. When it is responded to by the President, it will be then time for the Senate to decide whether the purposes were lawful or unlawful. In the absence of such information we cannot decide; and it is for the purpose of eliciting just that information that the resolution was submitted; and with all due deference I cannot see any possible objection to the President being permitted under this resolution to state the reasons which prompted him in sending troops to Petersburgh.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I dissent from the judgment of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs that the President has a right to send troops anywhere that he sees proper in his discretion in the United States.

Mr. LOGAN. For a lawful purpose?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, for a lawful purpose.

Mr. LOGAN. That is what I said.

Mr. THURMAN. And the very object of this resolution is to inquire whether these troops were sent to Petersburgh for a lawful purpose, as I understand.

Mr. WITHERS. Yes, sir; that is the purpose.

Mr. THURMAN. That is the very object of the resolution, and respect to the President requires that he should be inquired of why they were sent there. The two thousand and second section of the Revised Statutes reads as follows:

> No military or naval officer, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control, any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States, or to keep the peace at the polls.

Now, when troops have been stationed at a place of election, the burden rests on those who stationed them there to show that there was a case provided for in this section that authorized their being stationed there, to wit, that their presence there was necessary either to repel the armed enemies of the United States or to keep the peace at the polls. These are the only two exceptions to the general prohibition contained in this section. Whether or not this provision as to keeping the peace at the polls is not subordinate to the provision in the Constitution that prohibits the use of the Army in a State unless the Executive is called upon to furnish military aid to suppress domestic violence or insurrection or to repel an invasion, is a question that I do not propose to say anything about now. It will be time enough to consider that hereafter. I will let the statute stand as it is and let it be considered as constitutional as it is. Certainly it is right to inquire, that we may know whether there was danger or a necessity to repel the armed enemies of the United States at Petersburgh last month; whether there was a necessity for Federal troops there to keep the peace. Certainly we have a right to know that, and it is not in the slightest degree disrespectful to the President of the United States to ask him his reasons for ordering those troops there. I admit that prima facie it is to be presumed that he had reason for what he did. The respect due to his office requires us to presume that; but that does not stop our mouths. It is perfectly proper for us to ask him what were those reasons which we may presume that he had, but which we do not know.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I am very much surprised at the position of the Senator from Ohio on reading this statute and the resolution. The resolution inquires of the President why troops were at Petersburgh, in Virginia——

Mr. THURMAN. On the day of the general election.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir; on the day of the general election, perhaps there the day before, or a week before, and perhaps afterward. I know nothing about that.

Mr. MORTON. Does it say they were at the polls?

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir. That is the point I was coming to. This statute is in reference to troops being stationed at the voting-place, where the votes were being cast; and there is nothing in this resolution which charges that. By reading the statute any one will see in a moment that it has no reference to troops being stationed at a town, or a city, or any place, except the voting-place.

No military or naval officer, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States or keep the peace at the polls.

They are not to be stationed at the voting-place, that is, the polls, except to keep the peace. The resolution makes no such allegation. Now, sir, I would ask if the troops of the United States cannot be stationed anywhere in this country? There is hardly a city in the United States but what it is competent to station troops at, to encamp them at, to build barracks to keep them at. The fact that they were at a city or some spot in the United States, without alleging that they were at the polls to interfere in elections, is no violation of this statute whatever; it does not come within the purview and meaning of it in any sense; and therefore the resolution, as it seems to me, ought to go to a committee, that they may examine and see, if the gentleman bases it upon this provision of the statute, whether or not the law was violated.

I should like to have the Senator from Virginia at least state to the Senate whether these troops interfered with the voters, whether they molested any one in any way whatever at the polls, or were at the polls on the day of the election. I should like him to at least state some fact that would bring it within the meaning of this statute, if he desires this inquiry. If what was done was not violative of this statute, then I do say the President has the lawful right and authority to send troops anywhere in the United States, where he does it for a lawful purpose. That is what I said before, and I say so now. To assert that troops may not be placed anywhere in this country, is to deny the right of bivouac or encampment to the troops of the United States on American soil. Hence I say when a resolution of inquiry of this kind is offered, addressed to the President, or any other official of the Government, it should on its face state a case that would show at least an infringement of some law. If the act alleged is not an infringement of a law, then the officer had a right to do it, and we have no right to inquire the reason why.

I will put a case to the Senator. Suppose we were engaged to-day—I hope such a thing will never occur—in trouble, in war, would the Senate of the United States have a right to inquire of the President every day why he made a certain movement of the Army, would the Senate of the United States disclose every day the secrets of the movements of the Army and the secrets of the camp to an enemy? They would have the very same right to do it as they have to inquire why troops are encamped at any place in the United States. This is a right belonging to the commander-in-chief of an army and navy, where the law of the country is not violated, to encamp the troops anywhere, to move them anywhere on the soil of their country for a lawful purpose. This being the case, I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WITHERS. Mr. President, in submitting the resolution, I was exceedingly careful to draw it up in terms most respectful to the President of the United States. I did not intimate or charge in the resolution that the troops were there for an unlawful purpose, and I further guarded it with the usual provision, "if not incompatible with public interest." Now, it seems to me that, thus carefully worded and carefully guarded, no detriment to the public interests could possibly arise from having a response to the interrogatory. If the purposes were so clearly and unmistakably within the province of the law and within the legitimate and constitutional authority of the President, there surely could be no difficulty in his responding to the resolution, stating these facts. In the absence of such response, I prefer not arguing upon a hypothetical and supposititious case which subsequent developments might prove to be untrue. All I want is the information upon the subject on which we can predicate future action, if in our opinion such future action be desirable.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. WITHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. Petersburgh being in his own State perhaps he has as definite a knowledge of this transaction as anybody. Will he state to the Senate any act committed by those troops of an unlawful character?

Mr. WITHERS. I have not charged in the resolution that the troops were guilty of any act of an unlawful character, nor am I cognizant of any act committed by any of the troops that was of an unlawful character.

Mr. LOGAN. Does the Senator know whether these troops were troops in motion, stopping there for an encampment, or whether they remained there for some length of time?

Mr. WITHERS. My information is to the effect that they were ordered there upon the application of the United States marshal for the eastern district of Virginia, to be and remain there during the election, that they were sent there before the election, and that they remained there during the election. I do not know whether they are there now or not, but I presume that they are not. It is for the purpose of obtaining information as to the causes which prompted and the reasons which influenced the President to order troops to Virginia that I have offered this resolution. It seems to me that it is a perfectly legitimate and proper inquiry, and I see no reason for taking a course with this resolution differing from what is usual with similar resolutions of inquiry. Yesterday, we had a resolution much more wide-spread in its operation, much broader in its scope, affecting much more vital interests if possible than this does, which was not referred, but which was pushed through this House under the operation of a declaration that they would sit it out and not adjourn until a vote was taken upon it; and why, to-day, should we subject this resolution, one of simple inquiry, to the tender mercies of a committee, where it may remain, where it may be reported upon? but the Senator will pardon me for stating that I have heard of such things as committees receiving resolutions and quietly shelving them for the rest of the session. I want this information. I think this is the surest and shortest means of reaching it. Of course I know it is within the power of the majority to withhold this information or prevent the President from giving it if they think proper to do so, but I wish to discharge my representative duty in a matter in which my people and I myself feel a very deep and vital interest.

Mr. LOGAN. I would say to the Senator and the Senate that the motion I made was not with a view of preventing any information coming out or being disclosed to the Senate. I had no such idea, but acted on the ground that unless the resolution itself presupposed an unlawful act, the inquiry would not be made. Wherever an executive officer is performing his duty strictly, there is no necessity for an inquiry. When you inquire why a transaction took place, it necessarily carries upon its face the imputation that a wrong was perpetrated or enacted. Therefore I asked that this resolution should be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs so that it should be sent to the President with a request that he send through the committee to the Senate full information, and then the committee examining the law would make a report to the Senate. That was the only object I had, and it is the only object I have now. Where partisan feeling sometimes runs very high, I think this is a very proper mode of doing business in the Senate.

The resolution the Senator referred to which was before the Senate yesterday was entirely of a different character. That was a resolution authorizing the Committee on Privileges and Elections to make an investigation into and ascertain certain facts. It took the regular course, the course that all resolutions of that character take in the Senate. This is only following precedents we have had before in the reference of resolutions of this kind. Therefore I made the motion, and I ask that the resolution be committed.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, it seems to me that the Senator from Illinois suggests a very novel mode of proceeding. He proposes that instead of the Senate requesting the President of the United States to furnish information, the Committee on Military Affairs shall request the President to furnish it. I think it much more respectful to the President and much more worthy of the occasion that the Senate itself should ask for this information instead of its being a mere request of a committee which the President may comply with or may not.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator misunderstood me. I spoke of a request of the Senate of the United States through the committee.

Mr. THURMAN. It is not, I beg the Senator's pardon, a request from the Senate at all. If the resolution is referred to the committee and the committee request the information of the President, that is the request of the committee alone, and the President may or may not reply to that as he shall see fit. If he do reply to it, it is simply an act of courtesy on his part; he is under no obligation to reply to it. There is no statute or provision of the Constitution that subjects the President to the interrogatories of a committee of either branch of Congress, unless it might be a committee of investigation; and therefore the President, if he should reply to the request of the committee, would only do so out of courtesy and not because he is under any obligation to do so. So much for that.

Now, Mr. President, I dissent from the interpretation of this statute given to it by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. He limits the meaning of the word "place" in this statute to the actual polling-booth where the votes are being deposited, and supposes it to be perfectly lawful to have troops at the town or village or hamlet where the votes are cast provided they are not immediately and directly at the polling-booth. I dissent entirely from that interpretation of this act. It is a familiar principle of criminal law that a man, if he is within striking distance, may be found guilty of being accessary to the violence that is committed; and so, if troops are within striking distance of the polling-booth or if they are at that distance where their presence may influence the election either by the intimidation of voters or otherwise, they are within the meaning of this statute. We can have some light upon this subject from the legislation of the mother-country, England. The Senator will not deny that the Queen of England has as ample power to station troops wherever she pleases in England as the President of the United States has to station troops in the United States. No one can deny that. Yet, sir, there is an act of Parliament which says that at every general election for members of Parliament no troops shall be within one mile of a polling-place. What then is the universal practice there? There are plenty of troops that are stationed from time to time within less than a mile of the polling-places; but the universal practice there is, and a practice which if violated would stir the British heart from one end of that realm to the other, to remove those troops the day before the election and not send them back until two days after. My learned friend from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] suggests to me that the statute is a very old statute, passed in the eighth year of the reign of George II. They are somewhat careful in that old country, monarchy as it is, that military force shall not interfere with the free elections of the people. But now the Senator from Illinois, the chairman of the Military Committee, seems to think that the President of the United States can fill a town full of the Army of the United States, and not violate either the letter or the spirit of this statute if their bayonets are not under the noses of the people when they are voting. That is not the true interpretation of this statute at all. I grant that it is not as explicit as it ought to be by far, it is not as explicit as the British act of Parliament; but still in its letter as well as in its spirit it is not the statute which the Senator from Illinois supposes it to be.

Now, sir, I say once more that this resolution is a respectful resolution to the President. The Senator from Illinois seems to suppose that it assumes that there has been a violation of the law. It assumes no such thing. On the contrary, it asks simply for the circumstances of the case. Have we not a right to them? Have we not a right to them, if for no other reason than for the purpose of knowing whether or not this statute ought not to be amended and ought not to be made more specific? Have we not a right to them for the purpose of knowing upon what information it is that the President sent those troops there? Have we not a right to know whether the President has not been imposed upon; and if he has been imposed upon by any officer of the United States, have we not a right to provide a remedy to prevent such imposition in the future, if we cannot punish the officer for the imposition already practiced upon the President? Why, sir, in no sense is this resolution disrespectful to the Executive. On the contrary, it is in the highest degree respectful to him; and it seems to me that it is simply for the Senate to abnegate its power of judging of the propriety of an inquiry to send this resolution to a committee.

Mr. LOGAN. Just one word, Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from Ohio in reference to what he has said about the construction of the statute, I should like to make an inquiry of him. If his construction is correct that troops cannot be stationed at a town or city on the day of an election, as he seems to think is the correct construction of the law, where would the troops be stationed on the day of a general election, as on the 7th of last November? There would be no town in the United States of America where troops could be permitted to encamp. I suppose that we should have to arrange to send them up in a balloon, and hold them there for a week perhaps, until after the election was over and then let them down again. [Laughter.] That is the only way I can conceive in which we could encamp our troops at all. There is hardly a community anywhere in the United States in which an election was not held on the 7th of November. According to the interpretation of the Senator from Ohio we could not encamp troops anywhere in a town or city where an election was being held. In the city where I live there are I do not know how many, but a great number of polling-places, and troops could not be stationed there at all on the day of election if that is the interpretation of the statute. No, sir, the meaning of the statute is that troops shall not be held at the voting-place; that is to say, at the polls, so that men shall be intimidated by them. That is the meaning of the statute; it can have no other meaning; and to construe it that they could not be stationed at a town where an election was being held, seems to me to be entirely contrary to good and common sense.

Now I will say to the Senator from Virginia, as he seems to think that the object was to get this resolution before the committee that it might be delayed, that I certainly have no such object. But the resolution itself does exactly what I stated to the Senate that it did; that is to say, it presupposes on its face an unlawful act on the part of the President. It is:

That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the Senate, if not incompatible with public interest, under what authority and for what purpose troops of the United States occupied the city of Petersburgh.

What is the meaning of the word "occupied" when applied to troops? It certainly is very different from the idea that they were stationed there, that they were encamped there. It means that they took possession and held the city and controlled it. That is the meaning of the language. I said the resolution did bear on its face an accusation of the President of an unlawful act, and for that reason I asked its reference to a committee. The Senator well knows and understands the English language, and he certainly knows that that is the meaning of the resolution.

Now, sir, in order to satisfy the Senator and others who are desirous of having this information, I will say that I certainly have no objection to acquiring the information. My suggestion is only as to the manner of getting at it and the character of the resolution. If the Senator will change the resolution by striking out that part of it that speaks about the occupation of Petersburgh, and inquiring why and under what authority the troops were stationed there at that time, I shall have no objection to it.

Mr. WITHERS. Let us hear what the Senator proposes.

Mr. LOGAN. To assume that they occupied the city on election day is assuming that the President took possession by his troops of that city for an unlawful purpose. I would amend the resolution so as to read in this way:

That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the Senate, if not incompatible with public interest, whether troops of the United States were stationed in the city of Petersburgh, in the State of Virginia, on the 7th of November, 1876, the day of the general election.

Mr. WITHERS. If the construction of the Senator of the phraseology be correct we should simply get a return from the President to the resolution as offered by me, that no troops had occupied it. That would be all.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

Mr. WITHERS. Now there is no doubt of the fact that United States troops were in the city of Petersburgh on the day of election, and that they were not merely in transitu.

Mr. LOGAN. That is not the question at all. I say that you ask the President why they occupied it. You assume that they did occupy the city. That is the fact which you assume.

Mr. WITHERS. If the Senator's construction was correct the President would simply say that no troops occupied it.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; that would be a response to your resolution. I would say to the Senator, then, strike out the word "occupied" and ask the President this:

Whether troops of the United States were stationed in the city of Petersburgh, in the State of Virginia, on the 7th of November, 1876, and, if so, under what authority and for what purpose.

I am willing to agree to the resolution in that form.

Mr. WITHERS. I am willing to accept that modification.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

Mr. WITHERS. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment suggested by the chairman of the Military Committee, and substitute the word "stationed" for "occupied" in the resolution.

Mr. SARGENT. I thing that is not all the modification.

Mr. WITHERS. I think it is the only one suggested. Let the Secretary report the resolution as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read as modified.

Mr. LOGAN. It will read in this form, if the Senator accepts the modification:

That the President be, and is hereby, requested to inform the Senate, if not incompatible with public interest, whether troops of the United States were stationed at the city of Petersburgh, in the State of Virginia, on the 7th of November, 1876, the day of the general election; and, if so, under what authority, and for what purpose.

Mr. WITHERS. Very good.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no objection to the resolution in that form.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be so modified.

Mr. MORTON. There is no allegation that these troops were at the polls or that they were there to over awe or influence anybody. There is no pretense of any improper interference with the election or with the affairs of Virginia in any respect. They were simply there, perhaps a small number, one, or two, or three companies, I do not know how many, but a mere handful of troops. They had a right to be somewhere. The Army is a lawful organization, and the troops are not bound to be confined to the District of Columbia or to a Territory. They have a right to be in the States if the President so orders; and unless there is some interference, unless they were at the polls or did some act of a doubtful character, why make the inquiry? The very fact of the inquiry is an imputation that there was something singular about it, that there was something suspicious about it, that requires to be inquired into. Did they do anything wrong? Is there anything singular about it? That troops should be scattered, a few in one State, and a few in another, is not at all remarkable and not at all improper, and the general condition of the South for some years past and its present condition might afford a reasonable explanation for putting two or three companies of troops in one State and two or three in another without having the President catechised to know what he meant by it.

Mr. WITHERS. He can give his reasons.

Mr. MORTON. He could give the reasons; but the very inquiry is an imputation that there is something wrong that requires to be explained. Now, as these troops were not at the polls, as there is no such pretense, but perhaps were entirely outside of the city though in the neighborhood of it, and as they have done nothing wrong and nothing improper is imputed to them, why make this inquiry? If our friends from Virginia will say that they did something wrong, that they exercised an improper influence, or took a position that was calculated to overawe, or to intimidate—to use a word that some people do not like, but which is very common—if there was any intimidation practiced, let it be stated; but if they were simply there to stay a week or a month, or three months, it is no subject of inquiry by us. I am willing to inquire if there is any possible circumstance of suspicion about it; but I say if we want a reason for it, the general disturbed condition of the Southern States for some years past is a sufficient reason for putting troops at places where they would be on hand if they should be required. They had to be in some particular part of a State.

Mr. WITHERS. The Senator from Indiana has given a reason, but I wish the President's reasons.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not want to prolong this debate, but I cannot let the remarks which have just been made by the Senator from Indiana and those which were made by the Senator from Illinois pass without my protest at least. They seem to think that the question turns on whether the troops did something that was wrong when they were there. I say that is not the question at all. That is not the meaning of this statute. This statute does not say that they shall not be there and do something wrong, but they shall not be there at all.

Mr. LOGAN. Where?

Mr. THURMAN. You say at the polls; I say within striking distance of the polls. That, I say, is the fair meaning of the statute. You say at the polls. Take your own interpretation of the act. Suppose these troops were at the polls and did nothing wrong, would it not have been a violation of the statute, unless their presence there was necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States or to preserve the peace? No man can deny that; and yet they might have been at the very polls themselves and been the most civil, well-behaved, and well-mannered men in the world, and done nothing whatsoever that was wrong, and still, plainly, it would have been a violation of the statute. It is not a question at all about what they did; whether they did what was right or whether they did what was wrong. The question is, were they at a place where they ought not to have been at that time? In England I said that troops were prohibited from being brought within one mile of a place of election. I do not know but that it is two miles. I said one mile, and that is my recollection; but some of my brother-Senators say they are required to be removed two miles from the voting-places. What would be said there if troops were kept within the prohibited distance? Would it be any answer to say that they did no harm, that they kept in their barracks and took their rations and were very civil and well behaved and interfered with nobody? Would that be any answer at all to the provision contained in the statute that they shall not be there at all, whether they are well behaved or whether they are not? I wish, therefore, to say that I dissent wholly from the idea that this question is to be determined by the conduct of the troops on that occasion.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, when the statutes of the United States shall prescribe that troops shall not be stationed within one mile or two miles of the polls, and the Executive, in violation of that law, shall send them within a nearer distance without sufficient cause, under the Constitution, then the example of England might be quoted in this Chamber, and would be more potent also. If it could be shown that England, notwithstanding men are killed there in lawlessness for endeavors to exercise their right of suffrage under English laws, looks coldly upon its subjects driven from the polls and deprived of their rights as Englishmen, then that example might be pleaded in favor of such a policy on the part of the Executive of the United States. There is no parallel whatever between the case of English society and that which has existed during this last election throughout many States of this Union.

Mr. JOHNSTON and Mr. WITHERS rose.

Mr. SARGENT. I decline to yield.

Mr. WITHERS. Then I repel the imputation contained in your language.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will observe the rules.

Mr. SARGENT. You will have an opportunity to reply to me. If I say anything that is improper, it will be time then for you to reply, and in order. I say there is no parallel whatever between peaceful elections in England, where the rights of both sides are respected and the law proceeds on that hypothesis, and the events which have happened in the Southern States of this Union during this presidential election. Why, sir, the air is full of testimony of gross and flagrant crimes committed against life and liberty with the purpose of preventing American citizens from exercising the highest right which belongs to them under the law. It is not well to have this extreme sensitiveness over the use of the Army of the United States, when it is a fact well known to every Senator within the sound of my voice that there are illegal organized combinations of men, calling themselves sometimes rifle clubs, calling themselves by other names, that took possession of the polls and of the registry places, who first, by fraud defiled the registration, and then by violence prevented a fair election even for those registered. To object that the Executive of the United States upon the suggestion of things like these, which come up to us on every avenue of information, which crowd themselves upon his attention, given to him by executives of States, given to him by respectable, honorable men of the localities where these things are occurring—to say that he should turn coldly away from this; that he should keep his troops at Fort Leavenworth, out upon your borders, keep them away from the towns and the States where these things are happening which disgrace the American name, is to deny that he should properly discharge his functions under the Constitution; and I do not propose for one by my vote in the Senate to call in question the act of the President in so grave a matter, and where he is acting under the executive oath.

I regret that there was not the strong arm of the United States by means of its army at Hamburgh, last spring. I regret that subsequently, when the grand jury that met in that place were dispersed by the rifle clubs assembled there under pretense of a democratic meeting, so that they could not summon witnesses, and the judge from the bench advised that the case be laid over, that there be no action upon it then, I regret that there was not an army strong enough to enact justice upon the assassins in that case, to at any rate see that they were indicted, and that they were tried before a tribunal having jurisdiction of their offenses, and if they were found guilty upon proper evidence to see that sentence was duly executed upon them. I regret that there was not some power within striking distance, to use the language of my friend from Ohio, when Eliza Pinkston's husband was killed and her babe's throat was cut in her arms and she herself was first violated by man after man or brute after brute, and then stabbed and defaced so that she scarcely resembled any more God's image. I regret that when these things are happening in the various States of the Union, Senators think it is necessary to imply that the President of the United States has been too ready in affording protection in these directions.

I believe that the President of the United States has certain duties to perform under the Constitution of the United States. He is commander-in-chief of the Army of the United States, and the statute which has been read does not provide that he shall not station troops in any State of the Union where he sees fit, or in any community or in any place, but that he shall not interfere at the polls except under certain circumstances. That there was a necessity for interference at the polls in many cases, is shown by the circumstance that there were large communities of republicans, known to be such, who were prevented from voting the republican ticket by a terrorism worse than any which has ever been exercised on the face of the earth before this time, unless within a few years past. I commend the President of the United States for the action he has taken in this matter, and I do not believe that this Senate ought, by an inquiry of him, to carry the imputation that the use of the Army was improper in stationing it where it might be within reach, in order to prevent outrages of this character.

I shall vote against the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, the resolution relates to matters in the State of Virginia, not to matters in the State of South Carolina or Louisiana. If the Senator from California or any other Senator says or insinuates that there has been in the State of Virginia any misconduct, any violation of the law, any man intimidated, any fraud committed at elections, or anything done which justifies the interference of the United States, he is laboring under a very great mistake. I say that the State of Virginia, from the termination of the war to the present time, has been peaceful and quiet, and the elections have been fair; there has been no Ku-Klux organization in the State of Virginia; there have been no such organizations as those the Senator describes as rifle clubs; the only intimidation that has been practiced has been that practiced by colored people against democratic colored people; and no republican has been intimidated or kept from voting in the whole State of Virginia.

I agree very well that the United States troops have to be stationed somewhere; that the President is Commander-in-Chief of the United States troops; and that he has a right to station them somewhere. They ought regularly to be stationed at the arsenals, at the barracks, or at some point over which the United States have jurisdiction, which has been specially set aside by law for themselves. At Petersburgh there is none of these things. There are no barracks there. There is no fort there. There is no point there of which the United States have acquired jurisdiction for the purpose of stationing troops and keeping their Army. But a few days before the election troops came to the city of Petersburgh, marched to the custom-house, which is in the center of the city, and there remained until after the election. There was no foreign foe there. There was no report even of apprehended violence, no reason to believe that there was going to be any breach of the peace or violence of any sort, as there never had been any at that city. And yet the unusual thing was done of taking troops from the place at which they had regularly been stationed and bringing them to Petersburgh just before the election, and keeping them there until after the election, and when the election was over sending them away. I do not mean to say and do not say that they did anything wrong while there; on the contrary, I believe they behaved with great propriety while they were there. That is the testimony of the citizens of Petersburgh; but, as the Senator from Ohio has said, that is not the question. The question is, for what purpose were they sent there? Why were they sent there? They could have staid just as well at Old Point Comfort, where there is a United States fort. They could have just as well staid at the navy-yard at Portsmouth, where there is United States property. When you couple the coincidence that they went to Petersburgh just before the election, remained there during the election, and left when the election was over, it seems to me it was an unusual movement, that requires some investigation.

Mr. MORTON. Will my friend allow me to ask a question?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. I understood the Senator from Ohio to say that respect for the high office of President required us to presume that the troops were sent there from some good motive or for some proper purpose. I think that remark on the part of the Senator from Ohio was right. Now, unless somebody will take the responsibility of alleging some improper purpose, I think that presumption ought to prevail and this inquiry ought to be dropped. As the Senator from Virginia himself says, they behaved with propriety while they were there, did nothing wrong; and there is no question of the power to send them there. It seems to me that the Senate of the United States ought not to make such an inquiry, and thereby cast an imputation, unless somebody will take the responsibility of saying that they were sent there for an improper purpose. Until somebody takes that responsibility, the other presumption stated by the Senator from Ohio ought to prevail, that they were sent there for a proper purpose.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The question under this resolution is not what the troops did when they were there. The charge is not that the troops behaved improperly. They did not, as far as I know or have had any information. The information I have, and I presume it is true, is that they behaved properly. It is their presence there, the fact that they were sent there at all, that we desire to inquire into. It was an unusual place to send them. Nothing that the public could see justified it. There was no reason that any citizen could see why it was done. The movement was an unusual one. The fact that it occurred just at the time it did, we think affords a reason for asking the President why it was done. We looked upon it as a threat, as a menace. Although we had done nothing wrong, although we are as law-abiding as any people in the world, yet we were subjected to this menace. The election in that district passed off perfectly quietly, and the returning board of the State has given the return to Jorgensen, the republican candidate for Congress. No intimation is made that there was any attempt to defraud Jorgensen out of the return. The returning board, consisting of the governor and other public officials of the State, have certified to Jorgensen's election and given him the return fully, freely, and fairly.

For these reasons it seems to me this resolution ought to pass and the President ought to be asked to give the information called for.

Mr. LOGAN. Although I have already troubled the Senate several times on this question, I desire now to call the attention of the Senate to this statute especially and to reply to one or two remarks made in this debate by the Senators from Virginia.

It seems that there is getting to be a great dread of troops in this country for some reason or other. It does seem to me very strange that the troops of the United States, the defenders of the nation, are to have no resting or abiding place anywhere on Southern or Northern soil. We are to maintain an Army, and that Army is to be a vagabond Army, and it is to hunt and seek a place of resting far out on the confines of our own country.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. JOHNSTON] says that these troops did no harm that he knows of. If they did no harm, in God's name are the people of Virginia so hostile to the defenders of their country that they cannot allow them to have a resting spot for a few days within their borders without finding objection to it?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I did not say so. They are welcome to any part of the State of Virginia——

Mr. LOGAN. If they are, then why inquire why they are there?

Mr. JOHNSTON. If they come there for a lawful purpose.

Mr. LOGAN. Does the Senator say they came for an unlawful purpose?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I do not know. That is what I want to find out.

Mr. LOGAN. If you do not know, you ought not to insinuate it. Now, sir, I understand—I do not know how true it is—that there was a sergeant with ten men sent to the place named. Is that so?

Mr. JOHNSTON. No, sir; there was a major, with a company perhaps, but I do not know certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. How many in the company?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I do not know that. It does not make any difference how many there were; one was the same as a thousand, so far as the principle is concerned.

Mr. LOGAN. I have heard of whole States being almost scared into a fit by the rustling of a cow's head at night, and it seems that great terror has stricken the people of Virginia, especially the two Senators, on account of the appearance of a major in that State; I do not know whether he was a Georgia major or what kind of a major; whether he wore a high shirt-collar or a low shirt-collar. I cannot tell how that was.

Now, I desire to call the Senator's attention to this statute. The Senator from Ohio spoke of the laws of England not allowing or permitting troops to be within two miles of a voting place; that is, of a poll. He told us that it was an old statute. I believe there are about three places in England where soldiers are permitted to be nearer than a certain distance of the polls on the day of election. Now, I ask the Senator from Ohio whether, at the time our statute was passed, the English statute being much older, the members of Congress who enacted it were enacting it with reference to troops not being stationed close to polling places? Why did they not say, as is said in the statute of England, that they should not be within a certain distance of the polling place? But that is not our law. The law of this country is that—

No military or naval officer, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control, any troops or armed men.

Where?

At the place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States, or to keep the peace—or to keep the peace at the polls.

Where?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Suppose the laws of Virginia say that an election shall be held at Petersburgh, and troops are sent to Petersburgh, is not that sending them to the place where the election is to be held?

Mr. LOGAN. Not the whole of Petersburgh; it applies to the voting-place. Suppose an election law says New York is the place of holding an election, does the Senator say that troops stationed in New York City would have to be removed from the city on the day of election because a voting-place was close to the place where they were stationed? Will he pretend that that is the law? Will he pretend that because troops are in a city they must be removed on account of an election there? Why, sir, the statute means no such thing. It means that troops shall not go to the polling-place unless their presence is demanded in order to preserve the peace. That is the meaning of the statute, and no other construction can be given to it.

But our friends are becoming so sensitive in reference to the Army and Navy of this country that I believe they will drive them into the sea if they are let alone, or abolish them.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The Navy ought to be in the sea. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOGAN. You think they ought to be there?

Mr. JOHNSTON. The Navy.

Mr. LOGAN. O, the Navy. [Laughter.] Some of it is there, and the rest of it perhaps will be; we cannot always tell, but we certainly do not want to send the Army there. My friend would send the Army out to live among the Indians and let them have no other habitation.

Now, Mr. President, although I do not care anything about this resolution as it is amended, I think it ought to be referred to a committee or it ought not to be passed at all. I do not presume the President of the United States cares anything about it. But I wish while I am up to say that in my judgment the President of the United States has a right to move troops anywhere in the United States for a lawful purpose, and we have no right to deny that authority; and he is the judge as to where troops shall be moved so that they are not moved in violation of law. Troops are moved to my city, frequently pass through it or are stationed at Chicago, and come and go, and our people are not alarmed by the presence of troops whether on election or any other day. We are not frightened; we do not rush to the Senate to inquire why troops have passed through Chicago, or why they have stopped at Springfield. If a major should make his appearance in Chicago to-morrow with perhaps half a company of infantry, I do not think anybody would be alarmed, I do not think anybody would be scared. I think every citizen would say that the President had a right to send them there or elsewhere if he desired so that it was for a lawful purpose. And inasmuch as the Senators fail to say that these troops were sent to Petersburgh for an unlawful purpose, in my judgment this looks at least as though it was an attempt to insinuate some wrongful act on the part of the President without—I will not say manliness, I will not use any such term, but at least without a basis for making the accusation. If I wanted to charge the President with doing an unlawful act I would say so. I would say it was unlawful, I would say it was wrong, and I would ask why he violated the law. I would not say troops appeared there and behaved themselves in a respectful manner, did no wrong, violated no law; just merely appeared there, ate their rations in camp, as they had a right to do; nobody was molested, nobody interfered with; but why did the President allow them to do it? Why did he allow them to eat rations on "the sacred soil" of Virginia? Why did he allow a major and ten or fifteen men to trample upon that sacred soil? Why did he permit a blue coat to appear in Petersburgh, not in violation of law, not in violation of any statute of the United States, not in violation of any of the rights of the people of Virginia? As they did no wrong whatever, it looks to me as though the people of Petersburgh had objection to troops coming close there at all. They were there once and the people objected to it; they still object; and that is about all there is in this objection to what the President has done.

Then, sir, I think this resolution is only the beginning or the entering-wedge to a kind of general assault on the administration of this country, on the President of the United States, a man to whom the people of this country are indebted more than to any other man for the rights that the people have under the Constitution and the laws of this Government to-day. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore rapped with his gavel.

Mr. MORTON. Since this debate began, Mr. President, I have been informed by a gentleman from Virginia of some facts at Petersburgh that may furnish the reason why troops were ordered there. As there has been no imputation that they were sent there for an unlawful purpose or did anything wrong, I see no reason for the inquiry; but I am informed that about a year ago at a municipal election in that city there was a bloody riot, in which three republicans were shot, one of whom has since died from his wounds, and four or five others were severely whipped and injured. I do not know whether the statement is true or not, but this is the statement made to me. Further, some two or three years ago the Legislature of Virginia passed a bill to extend the terms of the town officers of that city beyond the period for which they were elected; the governor of Virginia vetoed that bill very properly, for which he was burned in effigy in the city of Petersburgh. I do not know whether that story is true or not, but I am so informed; and if these things be true, they may possibly furnish some reason why this handful of men were sent there.

Mr. WITHERS. If that be the reason why these troops were sent to the city of Petersburgh, because three or four years ago a modification of the charter of the city was passed by the Legislature, which was vetoed by the governor, then let the President say so.

But, Mr. President, I must confess to a little surprise that, after having agreed to such modification of the resolution as met the approval of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, who intimated that, if thus amended, he was willing to give it his support——

Mr. LOGAN. No; I said I had no objection to it. I did not say I would support it. I say now I have no objection to it as modified.

Mr. WITHERS. I accept the qualification. His statement was that if the resolution were so modified he would have no further objection to it. I supposed then that the vote would be taken upon it and that the resolution would pass nem. con. But when the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] with his usual fiery and impassioned zeal attempted to draw a parallel between the scenes which have been enacted or are alleged to have been enacted in South Carolina and Louisiana with the condition of things which existed in Virginia, refusing to submit to any interruption whereby the apparent intimation was fixed on Virginia and Virginians of having thus acted, I must confess and apologize for having been guilty of a violation of parliamentary law in injecting into his speech my disclaimer and repulsion of the intimation.

Sir, I did not desire, as I have previously stated, to go into any discussion upon the actual facts in this case until they should have been ascertained by a response to this interrogatory. Other gentlemen seem to act upon a different hypothesis, going upon the assumptions which they proceed to combat. I refrain from it in order that we may arrive at a conclusion. If it be the sentiment of the Senate that all inquiries as to the acts of the President are improper; if it be the sentiment of the Senate that the disposition of the Army in the States of this Union is not a proper subject of inquiry by the representatives of those States; if it be true, as the distinguished chairman of the Military Committee alleges, that the people of Virginia are peculiarly sensitive and nervous and timid, so as to be easily frightened at the standing collar of a major, Georgia or otherwise, and when, in the plenitude of his bravery, he proceeds to contrast the conduct and feelings of his own people with those of Virginia, I have nothing to say in the matter. I have no doubt that "brave men lived before Agamemnon." But if we are thus timid, if we are thus sensitive, it seems to me we have a constitutional right to make inquiry of the President of this nation, when he quarters troops in a State where not an armed hand of violence was raised, or is alleged to have been raised, to interfere with the vested rights of any person. When the prima facie construction of the Constitution forbids the occupancy of any portion of a State by United States troops, except on certain given conditions which are not alleged to exist, in the present temper of the public mind, and in view of the present encroachments of power, when we have an army standing ready and a Senate ready apparently to back up and sustain the action of the Executive, whatever that action may be, and when we are criticised severely and harshly for presuming to question it, I think then, sir, another long step is taken toward the deprivation of the liberties of the people and a new era is marked in American history, certainly in the history of this portion of America.

Now, sir, the fact of the presence of this armed force in the city of Petersburgh is one which is admitted upon all hands. Whether they were there for a lawful or an unlawful purpose is the subject of the inquiry predicated in the resolution which I have submitted, and I prefer, as I say, to wait for a response to that resolution before going further into the discussion of the merits of the question. Let us have a response to the interrogatory and then we shall be prepared to judge of the legality or illegality of the act and of the mode and measure of redress which is proper to be taken in the circumstances, assuming that the purpose was illegal. If legal, of course every one will acquiesce in it, no difficulty will be made, no criticism made upon the action of the President, but we shall all admit that it was right and eminently proper. That, sir, is the whole scope and object of the inquiry, and I prefer not going into a discussion of the general principles involved in the matter until we shall receive a response to the interrogation.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I made objection to this resolution because I thought it cast an imputation on the Executive which was not deserved, and because no possible reason has been given why the inquiry should be made. But, sir, I am induced to withdraw my objection and let this resolution go to the President with a view of getting at the facts in regard to Petersburgh.

The Senator from Virginia on my left [Mr. JOHNSTON] said that there had been no violence in Virginia, and if anybody supposed that there had been he was laboring under a great mistake. I am advised that at the municipal election at Petersburgh in May, 1876, three republicans were shot, others beaten, the room from which the republican tickets were distributed was broken into and tickets stolen therefrom, and general fear prevailed of other outrages; that these outrages were committed by regularly drilled companies of desperadoes who were armed and drilled and acted in a military form; and no one was punished for these outrages thus committed.

Now as our friends are in quest of information, I hope they will get it. I for one shall vote for the resolution.

Mr. WITHERS. I am very glad to hear that, because I am satisfied that when the information is elicited on these points the Senator will find cause to rather blush for his party.

Mr. MORTON. We will try it.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I should like to hear the resolution read as modified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be again read as it now stands.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the Senate, if not incompatible with public interest, whether troops of the United States were stationed at the city of Petersburgh, in the State of Virginia, on the 7th of November, 1876, and, if so, under what authority and for what purpose.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I have not the slightest objection myself to such an inquiry as that being addressed to the President of the United States. I did not know before that troops were stationed at Petersburgh, in the State of Virginia, on the day named. I do not now know why they were stationed there. But if the Senators from that State are curious to know what the reasons were for having troops at that particular locality, I certainly think it is a curiosity which ought to be gratified. The President of the United States used to have a somewhat happy knack for posting troops in the proper places. If he directed any troops to Petersburgh, unless he has lost that knack I am inclined to think he had some good reason for doing it, and I have not the slightest objection to his having an opportunity to state what that reason was. So that I shall vote for the resolution as it stands before the Senate.

If any Senator assumes that there is a statute of the United States which commanded the President not to have troops at Petersburgh on the 7th of November last, I can only say that I have seen no such statute yet. I do not expect to find it. The statute read by the Senator from Illinois just now does not command any such thing; and it seems to me very manifest that if troops could not be in Petersburgh lawfully on the 7th of November because there was an election in Petersburgh on that day, neither could troops be in any other town in the United States, because in every other town there was an election on the same day. They would therefore be illegally anywhere within any town in the United States. I do not think that is the fair interpretation of that statute. The statute evidently does undertake to put some restrictions upon the placing of troops on election day. I want to say of the statute itself that it is in my judgment an affront to the Army of the United States. I do not belong to the Army; I never did; I doubt if I shall ever enlist in it now; but according to my understanding it is an affront to the Army of the United States. I do not know of any place so sacred in this country as that our Army may not be intrusted in it, whether that be the place where votes are cast or the place where God is worshiped. I believe the Army is as safe in either place; the citizens of the United States wearing the uniform of the United States are as safe as citizens who do not wear that uniform in one of those places or the other.

I know this statute seems to be of republican origin. I have great confidence in whatever republicans have done, and that confidence is not abated at all, but I nevertheless think that this statute is not politic; it ought never to have been put on the book, but being there while it is there it should be obeyed. There is no reason in this country such as might be urged in Great Britain for keeping the Army at a distance from the polls where an election is held. The Army is commanded by the servants of the people in this country. The army of Great Britain is not commanded by those servants. He who moves your troops is as responsible in this country to popular rebuke as any other servants engaged in any branch of the public service. I do not know of any reason why we should be jealous of the exact locality which may be occupied by any portion of our troops on any day of the year.

But, sir, as I have the utmost confidence that there was some good reason or supposed to be some good reason why troops were sent to Petersburgh on the 7th of November last if they were sent there, and as I can find no law which prohibits the sending them there, I shall be very glad to have a respectful inquiry addressed to the President that he may state for the satisfaction of our friends, the Senators from Virginia, just why it was done. I have the most abiding confidence that when they hear the President's reasons they will be satisfied with those reasons, and no doubt I shall be satisfied with them myself.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I did not intend to trouble the Senate with another remark on this resolution; but some things have been said which induce me to trespass for a few minutes on the further attention of the Senate.

I said when I first addressed the Senate that, in the absence of anything to the contrary, the presumption was that the President in ordering troops to Petersburgh, if he did order them there, acted in conformity with the statute. That is a presumption which is due to all official acts of the lowest officer, and certainly to the official acts of the highest executive officer of the nation. But at the same time I said, and that I repeat, that notwithstanding that presumption we have a right to inquire into the facts, and that in doing so we do not cast any imputation upon the President, and certainly are guilty of no disrespect toward him. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] quoted that observation of mine that the presumption was that the President had acted in conformity with the statute, and said that that was conclusive reason why this resolution ought not to pass until somebody took the responsibility of alleging that the order of the President, if made, was in violation of the law. That was the position which the Senator from Indiana took. But soon after that the Senator re-appears in his seat with a paper in his hand and reads from it what he informs us is a statement that has been furnished to him that certain violent acts did take place at Petersburgh in some time past; and all at once changing his idea about the respect that is due to the President, changing his idea that the presumption that the President has acted in accordance with law ought to control until somebody shall allege the contrary, giving up that position entirely, and seeing that an answer to this might redound to the benefit of his party, he all at once, after having opposed the resolution, now says that he will vote for it! Ah, Mr. President, how has that scrap of paper which he read here upon the information of somebody of whom we know nothing, changed the position of this question from what it was when the Senator said that the presumption in favor of the President ought to be conclusive until somebody would take the responsibility of charging him with dereliction of duty or a violation of law? But enough for that.

Now, I will make a remark to which I beg the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, [Mr. LOGAN,] and that I think with submission is worthy of his attention. The chairman of that committee has insinuated that those who favor this resolution are enemies of the Army. Let me say to that Senator that the very worst enemy the Army of the United States has is the man who wishes to see it employed in interfering with the elections in this country. [Applause in the galleries.] He is its worst enemy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will pause a moment. The Chair will remind those occupying the galleries that it is against the rules to applaud either one side or the other. He now instructs the officers to remove any man occupying the gallery who makes such applause.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, on that very point I wish to suggest that yesterday there was applause and again to-day, and that it turns the thing into a very disreputable performance. I hope the Chair will enforce the power that he has to have every person arrested who, under any circumstances, violates the order of the Senate in that respect.

Mr. THURMAN. I hope so too; that is to say, I hope the rules of the Senate will be enforced. This is a deliberative body, and not a popular assemblage. Whatever may be the motives of men, those who are here as spectators of our proceedings have no right whatever to interfere by applause or dissent. I heard nothing of any applause yesterday. My poor remarks got no applause from the galleries. Perhaps those of the Senator's did.

Mr. EDMUNDS. O, yes; yours did.

Mr. THURMAN. Then I was unfortunately so deaf that I did not hear it. I was listening to the applause of my friend from Vermont; I did not hear the applause of the galleries at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend yesterday was so happy and so correct in the remarks which elicited the applause that I did not feel myself at liberty to raise any point then. But now I do think that the Chair ought rigorously to enforce the rules in that respect; and if this be repeated again under any circumstances, I hope the persons will be arrested and brought to the bar of the Senate and imprisoned for contempt. We cannot go on in this way.

Mr. THURMAN. I hope so too; for if ever there was a time in the history of this country when careful deliberation, when sound sense, when freedom from passion, as far as it is possible to free the human heart from it, ought to prevail, that time is now; and I for one shall not do anything whatsoever that shall tend to inflame the passions of men, but shall appeal in all I have to say to their reason.

Sir, I had said to the Senate, and especially to the Senator from Illinois, the chairman of the Military Committee, that the very worst enemy the Army has is he who would use it in interfering in the elections of this country. It is a fundamental principle, not only of American liberty, but of English liberty too, that the military shall be subordinate to the civil power. That principle is embodied in almost every constitution that ever was adopted in the United States. The people of the country from which the most of us are derived have an innate jealousy of the use of the military. Why, look at England. Her appropriations for the army are only from year to year, so jealous is she of a standing army. Look at our own Constitution which prohibits appropriations for any object for more than two years. See how jealous our forefathers, both in the old country and in this, have been of the interference of the military in the elections of the country. And let me tell you that, notwithstanding the events of the last fifteen years, that spirit of liberty has not died out in the American heart. If, therefore, I were an enemy of the Army of the United States and wished to see it abolished, I could contrive no better plan than its use in interfering in the elections of the country. The inevitable result would be the election by the people of a House of Representatives whose power over the purse would soon dwindle the Army into a mere shadow. It is not true, sir, that those who protest against military and armed interference in the elections are the enemies of the Army. It is my solemn belief that there is no duty ever performed by a soldier so onerous to him, so distasteful to him, as this employment that has been made of the soldiers in the elections of the country. I believe I do not know a man who wears the uniform of the United States Army, be he officer or be he private, who would not at this very moment be rather engaged in a winter campaign against the savages on the frontier than to be engaged in these squabbles about the elections in the States of the Union. It is no hostility then to the Army that prompts us to inquire why it is that troops are stationed at the place where a general election is held; but it is because "the price of liberty is eternal vigilance," and, if you cease to cherish those great principles which lie at the foundation of liberty and of free government; if you let them cease to be dear to the hearts of the people, then, sir, liberty and free government will cease.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] was pleased to express the hope that there is no danger from the Army of the United States, and to say that the officers of the Army are the servants of the people; that our case is a little different from that of England. Well, Mr. President, I am not going to run the parallel between English freedom and American freedom. I certainly do not want to run any parallel that might not be advantageous to my own country, but let me tell the Senator that there was a government once whose renown will never die out as long as history is read or memory lasts, whose officers were also officers of the people, and whose conquests covered almost the whole known globe. That was Rome. Her officers were officers of the Roman people, officers for only twelve months at a time, her military councils holding power for but twelve months at a time; and yet a military chieftain overthrew the liberties of Rome, and from the time that he passed the Rubicon she was a republic only in name and a despotism in fact.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio has fallen inadvertently into a slight error in stating what the Constitution is about appropriations. If I correctly understood him, he said that our Constitution limited all appropriations to two years. Among the powers of Congress is this:

> To raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years.

The limitation on appropriations is to two years for the Army, but not for other objects.

Mr. THURMAN. I am very thankful to the Senator for correcting me with his usual accuracy. The very fact that that is singled out, and that an appropriation for the Army is limited to two years while other appropriations may be for a longer period, only makes more emphatic the position I took.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So it does, but I like to have my friend, as he almost always is, perfectly accurate. I entirely agree with the Senator from Ohio that the price of vigilance is eternal liberty, and that the price of liberty, as he stated it, is eternal vigilance. One species of that vigilance is the exercise by every department of the Government of its constitutional functions, and that it shall not fail to exercise those functions at any time or at any moment of the existence of the Republic; and in one department of the Government, in the exercise of its duty, in order to see that the laws of the United States are faithfully executed, in order to support the process of the courts, as the Army is bound to do when properly called upon, it is one of the high duties of the President of the United States to so distribute the force that the Constitution and Congress have placed at his command that he may be always and in all places enabled to execute the oath he has taken to support, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States, and to see to the faithful execution of the laws, and to aid in the enforcement of judicial process by the only force known to the laws of the United States when there is resistance to judicial process, the Army.

Therefore it may happen, as it did at Boston, in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, when a so-called fugitive from labor was to be returned to his slavery, that it was supposed to be the duty of the President of the United States to draw into the city of Boston from forts and places the armies of the United States to execute the process of a commissioner of the circuit court of the United States, and to remand to Virginia or to some other State a so-called fugitive from labor. That was done not a great many years ago. It was a good deal criticised in the interest of humanity, and liberty, and justice, but it was not criticised I think by right-thinking men in respect of the constitutional duty of the President, however unpleasant it might be, to see to it that that arm of the Government, its force, its power residing in the Army, was applied to constitutional uses. So it may happen on this occasion that that great portion of the Army, or small portion, whatever it may have been, that is said to have been taken to Petersburgh or stationed there, was taken or stationed there for just constitutional purposes, for the protection of liberty in the upholding of constitutional law.

In such a state of case, if any Senator seems to suppose, as the Senator from Virginia does, that there was something improper or irregular either in fact or motive about this event that he assumes took place—I know nothing about it—I am disposed for one to gratify his feeling, his wish for information; because, if the President of the United States has, as I believe he has, had good reason for whatever he has done, I shall be glad to have the people of the United States, as well as the Senator from Virginia, know it.

There is this singularity, so far as I have heard the debate, in what has been stated by the Senator from Virginia, and by other Senators. I have failed to hear any suggestion even of a suspicion that the supposed presence of troops in Petersburgh on the occasion referred to was in any respect unlawful in fact, or accompanied by any improper motive. If I am right in that, there would be good reason for hesitation, I think, on the part of the Senate in adopting the resolution, because it would imply that on the suggestion of any Senator and at all times we would saddle the Executive with the onerous and annoying duty of reporting daily to Congress whenever in the United States there was any change in the disposition of troops or their location; that we might ask him to-day, on the curiosity that I certainly feel, as some of my friends are there, as to where certain regiments of infantry are in the Black Hills and on the Yellowstone, and how they are getting on, and why they have been sent to a cold and wintry place, instead of being in a better one, and all that. And yet every Senator would say that an inquiry of that kind ought not to be forced on the President of the United States; not that he has any objection to answering it, but it is asking useless questions that the public interest does not require to be answered, and that we ought not to impose upon a co-ordinate branch of the Government the necessity of making daily reports of the roster and the disposition of all the troops of the United States. Nobody would contend for that.

The only fault that I see in this proposition, if there be any, is the failure of my honorable friend from Virginia to state that he himself has been informed or believes that this supposed presence or movement of troops was in any respect in violation either of the Constitution or of the laws, or of that just and proper disposition of the force of the United States that the President is always bound to make. If he had stated that either upon his own responsibility or upon information that he was willing to be responsible for as believing to come from respectable sources, then in my opinion he would have made a clear case for an inquiry. As it is, on this naked question I doubt exceedingly whether it falls within correct principles of mere practical administration of affairs; I do not mean constitutional principles; of course it is perfectly out of constitutional principles; but this is a subject that appears to excite the feelings of some Senators and gentlemen, one that I am sure I am not desirous should be blinked or disguised at all, for I should be glad to have the President of the United States report why it is and how it is that the force of the United States has been distributed in respect of turbulences and resistances to law growing out of election and franchise questions for the last four years. If it stood upon that ground there would be great reason for such an inquiry; and in this particular instance, without committing myself to all sorts of inquiries in the future which are merely burdensome and not improper in themselves, I shall vote for the passage of this resolution.

I should be glad to have the President of the United States report to us the occasion of every movement of troops that has taken place in connection with elections or disturbances growing out of political ideas of whatever character, if his movements, as I believe, have always been right, growing out of his fidelity to his duty under the Constitution, carefully keeping himself within the limits of the law and the Constitution, and doing whatever he has done only with the motive that he is bound to possess, and does, I believe, of preserving the peace under the laws of the United States, and within the limits of his constitutional power. I should be glad to know that, and if, as seems to be implied, although not stated, there is some ground as somebody supposes to suspect that this handful of men who are said to have been in Petersburgh on this occasion were there for some purpose not affecting the preservation of the peace under the laws, not affecting the enforcement of judicial process, but for some other purpose, then certainly I agree with what Senators have said that it is high time the Senate of the United States should know it, so that in this particular instance although on the face of the resolution, it does not point that I can see any reflection in it, I shall vote in favor of its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. No. 26) authorizing an allowance to certain clerks of committees.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1611) authorizing the changing of the name of the sloop Addie Parker, of New Bedford, Massachusetts;

A bill (H. R. No. 1824) to change the name of the pleasure-yacht Hiram B. to Iola;

A bill (H. R. No. 3687) to amend section 3117 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relative to entry of goods taken or delivered at intermediate ports;

A bill (H. R. No. 4112) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to report upon the necessity of a public building at Rochester, New York; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4116) to change the name of the steamship Whirlwind to that of Arcadia.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills:

A bill (S. No. 620) to remove the political disabilities of James Argyle Smith, of Mississippi;

A bill (H. R. No. 648) for the relief of Andrew J. Barrett;

A bill (H. R. No. 1075) directing the Second Auditor to settle the pay and bounty account of John Ammahaie, or Ammahe;

A bill (H. R. No. 1503) for the relief of Sarah F. Albertson, of Boonville, Missouri; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1581) for the relief of John Gowers, late of Company C One hundred and eleventh regiment New York Volunteers.

ELECTORAL VOTE OF LOUISIANA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States which was read, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I have the honor to transmit herewith a letter (accompanied by testimony) addressed to me by Hon. JOHN SHERMAN and other distinguished citizens, in regard to the canvass of the vote for electors in the State of Louisiana.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, December 6, 1876.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to hear that document read.

Mr. SHERMAN. As it is lengthy, I move that it lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to inquire how far the order to print would go, whether it would include all these matters that accompany the letter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We ought to print everything the President sends, as a matter of course.

Mr. THURMAN. Or is it simply the message that is to be printed?

Mr. SHERMAN. The document itself is accompanied by papers; that it is necessary, as a matter of course, to have in order to understand the document. The paper refers to the documents upon the table of the President of the Senate, and my motion is to print it in the ordinary way of printing any communication from the President of the United States.

Mr. THURMAN. With all the documents—everything?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not know that. I am not prepared to say that all that matter ought to be printed until I understand what it is. I am perfectly willing that the message itself shall be printed, and that the letter addressed by my colleague and others to the President shall be printed, but that all the matter which accompanies those papers shall be printed, for the present, without knowing to the contrary, I am not exactly prepared to say ought to be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio object to the printing?

Mr. THURMAN. I do.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my colleague objects I will make a statement to him and to the Senate. As my name is attached, with the names of other gentlemen, to the letter, I desire to state that the letter was the result of a request on the part of the President of the United States that we should proceed to Louisiana to witness the counting of the vote of that State for presidential electors. When we severally arrived in New Orleans we found there gentlemen selected by the national democratic committee of the United States, appointed for the same purpose. These two committees so selected met there and they performed as they thought important public duties. Those selected by the President, aided greatly by gentlemen sent there by republican state organizations, have communicated the result of their visit to the President of the United States in the form of a letter, which is also accompanied by a full report of the proceedings and the testimony taken before the board of returning officers of that State.

Mr. EATON. May I ask the Senator from Ohio a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to finish my statement first.

Mr. EATON. I wish to ask whether this report to the President is from both sets of gentlemen, whether it includes both sides?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will answer the question if I am allowed to proceed in my way. I will state that when we met there the common desire of both committees was to secure an open and fair canvass, so that every citizen of the United States might look in upon the action of the returning board and see what was done. Therefore, by the concurrence of both committees, anticipated by the invitation of the board of returning officers itself, we were present at all the sittings of the board, although we had no more legal claim to be present than other citizens of the United States. Yet, to prevent the inconvenience of a great crowd, five gentlemen appointed by either committee were present and heard every word that was said and saw every act that was done by this board of returning officers. Whenever a paper was opened about which there was any contest or controversy the candidates on both sides were called upon with their attorneys to be present. Further, to secure a publicity that would be general throughout the United States, each committee employed a stenographic reporter at its own expense, and by this means full reports of the proceedings of this board were published every morning in the respective papers of the republican and democratic parties. Thus every word that was said before this board and every act done was reported in the morning papers of New Orleans, and the whole report is communicated in this mass of documents now awaiting your order for publication.

After having seen the canvass completed in this open and fair manner, so that everybody could see that it was done publicly and fairly, we have brought the whole report, together with copies of the testimony taken by commissioners appointed by the board, so far as we could get it on either side; but as I shall mention after a while a portion of the testimony is not here. We have submitted all to the President of the United States, with our general statement as to the character and nature of the canvass.

Now I will answer the question submitted to me by the Senator from Connecticut. It is a very pertinent one. He asks me whether this document contains all the testimony taken. I say it does not, but I say for myself and the other gentlemen who signed the paper that we did everything that could possibly be done to secure every scrap of testimony taken on either side. But under the law of Louisiana it seems that they examine witnesses by interrogatories and cross-interrogatories which are served upon the opposite party and are answered by the witness. When the depositions were taken for the democratic electors it was not possible for us to procure copies of that testimony until the papers were filed formally as depositions before the board of returning officers, and even then we could not copy them until the board acted upon them. We tried to but could not, because, from the nature of the examinations, the depositions were under the control of these electors until presented to the board of returning officers, and much of this matter was not presented until the last day when their public sessions were finally closed. Anticipating the trouble that would arise out of this failure on our part to give all this testimony I applied—as will appear from a published communication which I have seen in the papers since I came home—to the democratic committee there to furnish copies of depositions taken by them or to enable us to secure copies of them. For the reasons which they gave in their published letter they declined, thinking they would seek some other mode of communicating the testimony on their part. That was the general substance of it, but I will state that the papers now presented contain every particle of evidence submitted to the board that was accessible to us, and an accurate account of every act done and every word said by every member of the board. The testimony consists mainly of depositions taken by commissioners upon interrogatories furnished by each side—many of Army officers and supervisors of election, and affidavits attached to and made part of the returns of election officers.

Mr. McDONALD. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio if the committee attending there at the request of the chairman of the democratic executive national committee did not first propose that there should be a joint action between the two representative parties in regard to securing a fair count and if that was not declined by the gentlemen representing the other side.

Mr. SHERMAN. The democratic committee did on their part before we arrived there publish to the world a letter in which they proposed to us to join with them to influence the action of the board of returning officers.

Mr. McDONALD. I will ask the Senator from Ohio if it appeared——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will hear a question, and then I hope the Senator will not interrupt me further.

Mr. McDONALD. I understood the Senator to say that this proposition was published before the arrival of the gentlemen who had gone there at the request of the President.

Mr. SHERMAN. There was one there, I think, at the time. Is that the question? Is the Senator through?

Mr. McDONALD. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will answer that that letter was published to the world when only one of the gentlemen named by the President had arrived there, but two other gentlemen representing political organizations, republican organizations in the Northern States, were also present. But we made no point upon that except that they published this document to the world when but one of those named by the President had arrived. When we arrived we declined their proposition very promptly.

Mr. McDONALD. Will the Senator allow me to ask him one other question?

Mr. SHERMAN. One other, yes.

Mr. McDONALD. Was it proposed to the committee representing the democratic party there by your committee that there should be a joint report, or did you propose anything to them except that they should furnish to you what testimony they might have that you might incorporate it in your report?

Mr. SHERMAN. All the questions put to me by the Senator from Indiana are answered in this document. The document shows the letter to us, our reply, and the correspondence that occurred. The document also shows the letter on our part asking them for copies of their depositions, stating that the request was made with a view to communicate them to the public at large, and it gives their reply. My friend asks me questions which are answered by the papers themselves.

I am told that this document has gone to the other House as well as to this. It is made the express duty of the President of the United States to submit to either House of Congress matters proper for public information. It is clear that no matter has occurred in the history of the United States more important for public information than the transactions connected with these canvassing boards, and also connected with the whole proceeding in the making of a President of the United States. In the strict performance of that duty, he has sent you a communication signed by several private citizens, and it is accompanied by information which bears upon a public act. Therefore, the publication of this document, it seems to me, is not only proper, but it is indispensable. The people of the United States have a right to know all that has been said, all that has been done, and all that has been proved before that returning board of officers. I, for one, say (and I have no doubt the same thing will be assented to by those who agree with me in political opinions) that if at any time, in any form, the testimony submitted to that board, taken on behalf of the democratic electors, is presented here the Senate will vote for its publication. Indeed, as the correspondence shows, my effort was to secure this testimony, so that I might say to the Senate, if called upon, that every scrap, every word, every deed done by this board of officers is open and public; and I say now, before the vote is taken, that there probably never has been a more public act done in the United States of America than was done before this board of returning officers. It is true that, by their rule, they excluded all the people except a limited number, because, from the very nature of their duty, partly ministerial and partly judicial, those returns had to be opened in the presence of a few persons. They were so opened; but, whenever a contest arose, appearing either upon the face of the papers themselves or appearing from public information known at large, the very moment that contest appeared, the attorneys on both sides, who were very troublesome and, it seems to me, very annoying sometimes, (I speak of them as a general rule,) and the candidates on both sides were admitted there and made their contest. We witnessed the whole of that; and our record, not differing in any essential respect from the democratic record, will show the way that was done. All that was done there is contained in these papers.

Mr. McDONALD. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio one other question.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. McDONALD. I ask the Senator if this board did not frequently go into what they termed executive sessions, from which all parties were excluded.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am very glad my friend has asked me the question, because we have executive sessions here in which all persons are excluded. The executive sessions of this board were the very public sessions which I have described. This board, with a strange misuse of language, called their sessions open when they received motions and made orders, public orders, as to announce the rules and the like, or to receive protests. Then some member of the board would move to go into executive session. When they went into executive session, all the republican committee and all the democratic committee were present. The reporters on both sides were there; and everything that was done by them in executive session was printed the next morning in the public papers by men of both political parties; and there was no disagreement in their report.

Mr. McDONALD. Down to what time of their investigation did that take place?

Mr. SHERMAN. Down to Saturday last at two or three o'clock. I was present; and when all the whole mass of testimony on both sides, including everything contained in these papers, was presented in evidence, then we, the signers of this paper, conceiving that our business was done, left for our respective homes.

Mr. McDONALD. Then I understand the Senator knows nothing of the action of the board from Saturday night on.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know before we left the board adjourned sine die to make their final decision, just as the Supreme Court adjourns to go into its consultation-room to make up its decision.

Mr. McDONALD. Did the board adjourn sine die on Saturday evening?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. They declared the case closed and went into private consultation on this mass of testimony to examine it, and to take up the case of each election poll, and to decide the questions before them.

Mr. McDONALD. Then I understand from the Senator that he knows nothing about what transpired before the board, what evidence they received, if any, after Saturday at three o'clock?

Mr. SHERMAN. I know from the public prints that they received no evidence after that time. I know that this mass of testimony contains not one single thing that was not submitted to the board in open day, and copied for us. Nothing else was submitted. I know that this board of returning officers did precisely what any court in this broad land of ours would do under like circumstances. They heard the case to the fullest extent; during two weeks of laborious labor they opened the returns, analyzed them, heard contests and protests, examined witnesses orally, received depositions taken before commissioners under the law of Louisiana. They worked as the rest of us had to work until the case was exhausted and both sides had submitted all the testimony they desired to submit. Then they said, "the case is closed; we will take it up and decide this matter as soon as we can. Certainly we must decide it before the day fixed by the Constitution of the United States for the declaration of the vote.

I make this statement now, because I have seen in the public prints since I came North the whole of the proceedings of that board, and the conduct of the gentlemen before the board, entirely misrepresented. I will now only say in the presence of my friend from Indiana [Mr. MCDONALD] and my friend from Kentucky [Mr. STEVENSON] who saw some of these things.

Mr. MCDONALD. No, sir, I was not present at any board-meeting.

Mr. SHERMAN. I thought these gentlemen were present. At any rate all that was said and all that was done was as public as the proceedings of the Senate of the United States in open session, and what they called an executive session was a simple misnomer of a proceeding that was as public as the day.

Perhaps I have said enough, because I do not wish to add to any excitement. I do not wish to prejudge this matter. I do not wish to engage in a debate upon the matter until these documents are printed. The action of this board has now been made public. I know nothing of it except what I see in the public prints. But, from my knowledge of the testimony, I feel bound to say that when printed it will disclose to the people of the United States an organized effort on the part of the democratic State committee of Louisiana to conduct the election m the State of Louisiana so as to defeat by intimidation and violence, if need be, the election of the electors on the Hayes ticket and to carry the election of the electors on the Tilden ticket. I believe the facts presented by this testimony clearly and conclusively show that there was such an attempt, and that it was carried into execution in several parishes or counties of the State of Louisiana. In forty or forty-two of these parishes there seemed to have been a fair election and no obstruction to the freedom of voting, but in others there was organized violence accompanied with whipping, terror, intimidation, murder, and wrong so painful in its character that I could not listen to it or read it with patience or toleration. The depositions that are contained in this document and the cross-examinations furnished present scenes that I am sure the people of the United States will look upon with horror and humiliation. I do believe the success of such a plan accomplished with means so terrible to human nature would have been a disgrace to civilization and a reproach to our republican institutions.

I have said this much without going into detail—without saying anything about particular polls, parishes, or places, but merely to give you the general effect of this testimony upon my mind. I am sure I went there with no purpose but to witness a fair count, with no desire to imagine or propagate scenes of horror. I took no part in the proceedings except as a witness. I listened to the testimony such as was oral, I read such as I had access to, and I have read more of it since I left there, having copies of it. Unless the case as made on these papers is changed materially by the testimony and depositions produced on the other side, it does prove the broad, grave charge I have made, that an organized conspiracy of intimidation to defeat the will of the majority of the legal voters of Louisiana has been legally and properly defeated by this returning board in the exercise of powers plainly conferred by law, and openly and boldly performed in the light of day. When the papers are printed and laid on our table I may desire, if the subject should come up, to make good the statements of this letter, but until then I do not care to pursue the matter further.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, I was one of the persons selected by the national democratic committee to visit New Orleans to obtain if possible a fair count of the vote given at the late election. As I was there and took some part in trying to obtain that result, I am not willing that the statement made by the gentleman from Ohio should go to the country without some explanation. My impression was when I was in New Orleans that the election throughout that State had been fair and orderly, without any intimidation, and without any force used at the polls more than may happen and has always happened in almost all the States. The first attempt that was made after reaching New Orleans, was to get the co-operation of the gentlemen who were sent there by the request of the President, to get them to co-operate with us to obtain a fair count of the vote. The gentleman from Ohio says that the effort was made to influence that vote. That remark I think is not correct. I had some connection with others in preparing the letter, although I did not write it. It was written by a man who writes much better than I can; but the object was to obtain a fair count, and not to bring about any extraneous or any improper influence. That object was proper in itself, as it was for this that both parties visited New Orleans; but this request was by the opposite side denied. We then again addressed them, and a second denial was the result of our second application. After a great deal of see-sawing and trouble, which you would not infer from the speech made by the gentleman from Ohio, it was finally conceded that five gentlemen from our side and five gentlemen from the other side should be present, and this under the most difficult circumstances, before that board. Rules were prescribed that made it utterly impossible to obtain anything like a fair investigation unless it was by that side that had the sympathy of the board. For instance, you could ask no question of the opposite witness unless the interrogatory was filed in writing twenty-four hours beforehand and handed to what was called the opposite party. The Senator says the seals of the returns were opened before these gentlemen. The returns were opened as he says, but they were not and could not be examined by them, at least not by our side. Such was the rule. The gentleman from Ohio states that a fair examination took place. The rule was that the seals of the returns were to be opened before the committee, but the examination was to be made by the canvassers themselves, in what they call executive session.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator allow me a word on that point?

Mr. BOGY. Let me finish my sentence. I was not a member of the committee of five; therefore I do not know exactly what an executive session means, but I understood it to be very different from what he says. Now I will hear the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend says he was not there, but I think everybody who was there will bear me out in what I stated. I said that not only were those seals broken, but the papers were passed around and all had a chance to inspect them. There were only fifteen parishes in the State that were contested, but whether contested or not we had an opportunity of inspection. The returns were passed around. Indeed, I saw them in the hands of the democratic committee. They felt it to be their duty to inspect every return, and I think every one was inspected. Then, whenever there was a conflict in the nature of a protest, they called in the attorneys and candidates on both sides to examine the papers.

Mr. BOGY. Of course, as I was not there I cannot speak of what took place in practice. The rules printed and handed to the committee were entirely different. The seals were to be broken in presence of the committee but the examination of the contents of the envelopes was to be private, and I do know from what I was told there—I only state what was told to me by gentlemen of very high standing—that the first examinations were made in the way that I have mentioned; that while the seals were broken before the committee, the after examination took place privately. Of course I do not wish to be understood as denying a matter of fact that the gentleman from Ohio states. I was not there as long as he was; I was there but a short time, but that such was the fact when I was there, I have no doubt.

The law of Louisiana requires that a statement of all acts of intimidation, all unlawful acts, all improper conduct which took place at the time of the election, or immediately preceding the election, should be made a part of the return of the commissioner of each parish at the same time that he makes a return of the votes, and the law is to that extent very particular that the fact of intimidation and of unlawful conduct shall be made with the return of the votes. We were informed at that time that the returns made contained no returns of bad conduct or intimidation at the polls, and that the information now spoken of and which is returned here to-day to be printed and go to the country consists of statements and affidavits obtained in violation of law, and after the returns required by law had been made. I presume the gentleman from Ohio will not deny that.

Mr. SHERMAN. Please repeat that.

Mr. BOGY. The law of Louisiana requires that the fact of any unlawful conduct, any intimidation, or any other improper conduct which may have taken place on the day of election, or immediately preceding the election, or even when the voters were being registered, that statement of fact—it is called a statement in that law—should be made a part of the return of the county officer when he returns the vote. That was not the case, as I was informed when in New Orleans.

Mr. SHERMAN. According to my recollection of the law of Louisiana, my friend does not exactly state it. The supervisor of election, as he is called, is bound to attach his statement to one of two duplicate returns, not to both, supported by the affidavits of three citizens. In one case which excited a good deal of comment and was the subject of telegraphic communication to the North, in the parish of De Soto, the paper came and was opened. It appeared to have been sealed up on the 16th, but it came to us and was opened on the 25th. When opened, there were found inside the envelope certain certificates, including the certificate of the supervisors of election and the affidavits of three disinterested persons under the law. It was not claimed, I believe, that it was necessary to attach this statement at the time the return was made; but it must be attached before it was returned to the board. In that case, the case of De Soto, when the papers were opened, at once it was seen that there must have been an opening of that envelope; but upon looking at the papers themselves, the affidavit of the supervisor of election set out the fact that he brought the returns to New Orleans himself, that he was afraid, for fear of his life on account of threats, to attach the affidavit to the legal return in De Soto Parish; the name of the town I have forgotten. This was supported by the affidavits of three witnesses taken in New Orleans and who came down with him. They certified that they were afraid to make the affidavit in the place where the poll was held. Instead of attaching this paper to the envelope and the returns themselves he opened the papers, and then, after inserting these affidavits, he sealed them again. In that I think he was wrong, although there probably was no fraudulent intent. The affidavits themselves, showing that they were sworn to in New Orleans the day before, were actually opened by the board. On this subject there was a great deal of comment. The error of the supervisor was in not first wrapping these affidavits on the outside of the package and then sending them before the returning officers, when there could have been no objection to their legality. The point was not made that he had not the right to make these returns.

Mr. BOGY. This is what a friend of yours and an acquaintance of mine in the city of New York calls "a mere clerical error," the opening of the seal and injecting into that paper another paper, and then sealing it. This is called a "clerical error."

Mr. SHERMAN. That was a telegraphic falsehood. My friend is justified in repeating it because he saw it in the newspapers, but I saw what occurred and heard what occurred, and I say here that Mr. Stoughton and I exactly agreed on that point, and although they gave me credit for justice and fairness and tried to throw discredit on Mr. Stoughton he did not say that it was a clerical error. The telegram colored the whole transaction.

Mr. BOGY. I have the floor, I believe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BOGY. The Senator's statement bears out my statement, and I am astonished that the Senator should understand the law regulating the election in Louisiana so imperfectly, when he was there for three or four weeks making that a special study. Now I do say, as a fact, and I shall bring the law which I have at my room, whenever necessary, that the law of Louisiana requires that the fact of any intimidation, or of any unlawful conduct, or any improper behavior which prevented a free election, must be returned by the county officer with the return of the votes to the officer in the city of New Orleans authorized to receive the returns. The law goes further; it tells how that return shall be made.

Now, the statements proposed to be printed here to-day, if not all fully nineteen parts out of twenty, were made outside of that law and were gotten up in the city of New Orleans independent of the returns and in violation of the law. They are affidavits taken in the city of New Orleans, or depositions, as they are called. They have a peculiar way of taking depositions in that country. I repeat, all this information was obtained in violation of the law, and after the parties got to the city of New Orleans, and in almost every instance they were kept by the parties who brought them to the city of New Orleans for days before they were handed to the proper officer. The fact was notorious and cannot successfully be denied. My assertion can be proved, that they were held back by the parties for days.

While it is true that on the face it appeared to be all right, and the examination all fair, because the two parties were represented by a committee of five gentlemen each, and distinguished gentlemen they were, too, yet one had all the facilities imaginable, and had the ear and regard of the canvassers, while the other had no means to get at the truth except under the most difficult circumstances. These affidavits were gotten up in violation of law, as I have already said. If you apply as a test the case mentioned by the Senator from California this morning of Eliza Pinkston, which was depicted here in such glowing language, you will judge of the correctness of all this testimony. A grosser and more infamous imposition from one end to the other was never attempted in a civilized country than this case of Eliza Pinkston, which had nothing to do with politics; the whole statement is founded in falsehood.

The people of New Orleans, democrats and republicans, know the statement I make here to be true and the story of this case as it is made to appear as infamous and disgraceful. I do not think that the Senator from California knew these things or he would not have alluded to the case of Eliza Pinkston.

Mr. President, I would say, in behalf of the gentlemen who were there with me, that when we first got to the city of New Orleans, after organizing ourselves as a committee, a resolution was passed that the first thing to be ascertained was how had the State of Louisiana voted, and if it had voted for Hayes we resolved that the fact should be stated to the people of the United States over our names; and on the other hand if it had voted for Tilden we were to invite the co-operation of the gentlemen on the other side to assist us in getting a fair count. We accordingly for some time attempted to get the correct information from all the different parishes of Louisiana. There are fifty-seven parishes in that State, and although the information obtained was not of an official character, it was of the very highest credibility. In many cases, perhaps in twenty-odd, the committee had what were called duplicate returns; meaning thereby a return of the votes of the parish signed in most cases by the United States supervisor. We then sent messengers and telegrams and went to work in every way possible to obtain information from the other parishes, and in that way we obtained information from all, I think, but two parishes, and they lie away off on the Sabine, where the population is very sparse. After that information was obtained a letter was addressed to the republican committee asking them to co-operate with us. The committee declined. We were informed by gentlemen of New Orleans that the returns made from all but two or three parishes contained no information whatever of any intimidation or bad conduct on the day of election. Of course this information is not and was not official; but was of very high character and such as carried conviction with me of its truth. I believe it now.

Mr. President, the Senator speaks of a letter which he and his associates addressed to the committee on the other side, to obtain from them the testimony which had been given, and he says that was declined. The testimony which had been taken by both sides was in possession of the board of canvassers, was notorious, and the committee of the other side did not wish to place this testimony in a position to be disposed of by these persons, and for which they were to be held responsible. The request was altogether out of the way and was made as one of those political smart things that our friends supposed would be an advantage.

Now, sir, if the Senator from Louisiana will give me possession of that book which he has in his hand for a moment, and which contains the law of elections of Louisiana, I will show him that the statement I made that any and all evidence of outrages must be returned with the votes, I think, within twenty-four or forty-eight hours, is correct.

Mr. WEST. I do not think the Senator can show that. I will give him the book.

Mr. BOGY. If it is not in that book, you have not got the right law, because I know it is the law of Louisiana.

Mr. WEST. I will not take the law of Louisiana from that. We will show you, however, the interpretation of the law in a few minutes.

Mr. BOGY. I will look at it, and I assert that the statement I make is correct. Any act of misconduct at the polls has to be returned with the list of voters. I state that as a fact.

Mr. SHERMAN. Can it not be written in New Orleans as well?

Mr. BOGY. No, it cannot be written in New Orleans. It has to be written from the seat of justice of the county or parish and as a report. That is the law in so many words.

Mr. WEST. Here is the law; I hand it to the Senator and ask him to please find the statement in this law that requires the officers of election to mail or date their returns from the county seat. It may be here, but I think not.

Mr. BOGY. All this statement that I make will be seen to be true if the law is in this book. If it is not, I have got it at my room.

Mr. SHERMAN. You ought to have it here.

Mr. BOGY. I should have had it, but that I did not expect you would take a snap-judgment on us this morning. I will look into this book, and I am sure if it is the correct law it will fortify my statement. [Examining the book.] Mr. President, this being a very important point; as I wish my statement to be sustained, I will look into it, and if not sustained I will take it back forthwith.

Mr. President, I will state this fact upon my responsibility as a citizen and a Senator, that I and those gentlemen who went with me to New Orleans made an effort to ascertain in good faith the fact whether the election in Louisiana had been fairly conducted or not. I felt then as I feel now, that this subject is above party. The peace of the country may depend upon this thing; and my mind was made up then, and I firmly believe the minds of my colleagues were made up equally as firmly as mine, that if the State of Louisiana had fairly and squarely voted for Hayes, to state it over our names. But we were satisfied beyond the possibility of any reasonable doubt that the election had been fair and that the democrats had carried the State by between seven and eight thousand majority, and had carried a majority of the Legislature, and also carried the member of Congress, notwithstanding the fact that upward of three thousand persons were disfranchised in the city of New Orleans and could not vote. It is the easiest thing in the world in that country to disfranchise a man. A few days before the election some six or seven thousand notices were sent to A B and C D, charging them with having used improper means to intimidate some colored individual, no matter when or where; and while a man is under these charges his name is erased from the list of voters, and of course cannot vote.

Mr. CONKLING. What charges?

Mr. BOGY. Anybody can make a charge. That is, I go before the United States commissioner as a citizen and I charge that Mr. ROSCOE CONKLING a year ago was guilty of intimidation in doing this or that, any specification I please to make, you are thereupon notified. Some seven or eight thousand were so notified that they had been charged with this offense and would remain under that charge until the question was investigated by the United States commissioner, and while under that charge their names are erased from the list of registered voters and they cannot vote. There being but one United States commissioner and he having six or seven thousand cases to examine, or more, perhaps eight or nine thousand cases—I will not be precise but the number was large—he could not possibly discharge them all. So there remained under these charges some three thousand persons in the city of New Orleans who did not and could not vote because their names were taken off the list of registered voters. Yet the democratic member of Congress from that district was elected, and also in the adjoining district. So while it was apparent that the democrats had carried the State fairly and squarely, carried the Legislature and I think every member of Congress, this returning board, composed of these four men whose names are known to the country, two of them being white men and two of them colored men, have changed that majority into a minority and have returned four republican members of Congress, a republican Legislature, and have given the State to Hayes.

If the investigation had been carried on in the way the Senator from Ohio would impress upon the country it would be proof positive that the election had not been fair, and therefore it would not be right to give the election to Mr. Tilden; but I do say that from all the information I could get when in New Orleans the election was fair throughout the State, as fair as in the State of New York or in the State of Illinois. There might have been some disturbance at the polls here and there; such things happen all over the country; but there was nothing unusual.

The Senator from Louisiana, who ought to know and does know the law, said that I did not state that law correctly. I will read it:

That immediately upon the close of the polls on the day of election the commissioners of the election at each poll or voting-place shall proceed to count the votes, as provided in section 13 of this act, and after they shall have so counted the votes and made a list of the names of all the persons voted for, and the offices for which they were voted for, and the number of votes received by each, the number of ballots contained in the box, and the number rejected, and the reasons therefor, duplicates of such lists shall be made out, signed, and sworn to by the commissioners of election of each poll, and such duplicate lists shall be delivered, one to the supervisor of registration of the parish and one to the clerk of the district court of the parish, and in the parish of Orleans to the secretary of state, by one or all such commissioners in person, within twenty-four hours after the closing of the polls. It shall be the duty of the supervisors of registration, within twenty-four hours after the receipt of all the returns for the different polling-places to consolidate such returns, to be certified as correct by the clerk of the district court, and forward the consolidated returns, with the originals received by him, to the returning officers provided for in section 2 of this act, the said report and returns to be inclosed in an envelope of strong paper or cloth, securely sealed and forwarded by mail. He shall forward a copy of any statement as to violence or disturbance, bribery or corruption, or other offenses specified in section 26 of this act, if any there be, together with all memoranda and tally-lists used in making the count, and statement of the votes.

That must be done within twenty-four hours.

Mr. WEST. After he receives it.

Mr. BOGY. Another place in this law says that it must be returned to this canvasser within twenty-four hours, and he within twenty-four hours must make this return. I stated that to be the law of Louisiana. It is very difficult when everything is denied to be able to put your hand on it. I am not a New Orleans lawyer, but I state that to be the law, that the return has to be made to this county officer within twenty-four hours, and he within twenty-four hours from that time has to make that return to the officer in New Orleans.

He shall forward a copy of any statement as to violence or disturbance, bribery or corruption, or other offenses specified in section 26 of this act, if any there be, together with all memoranda and tally-lists used in making the count and statement of the votes.

That law has not been complied with. In nineteen cases out of twenty the testimony reported by the Senator from Ohio was taken outside of this law, and perhaps in every case. What is the twenty-sixth section? The twenty-sixth section says:

That in any parish, precinct, ward, city, or town in which during the time of registration, or revision of registration, or on any day of election, there shall be any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences, at any place within said parish, or at or near any poll or voting-place, or place of registration or revision of registration, which riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences shall prevent, or tend to prevent, a fair, free, peaceable, and full vote of all the qualified electors of said parish, precinct, ward, city, or town, it shall be the duty of the commissioners of election, if such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences occur on the day of election, or of the supervision of registration of the parish, if they occur during the time of registration, or revision of registration, to make in duplicate and under oath a clear and full statement of all the facts relating thereto and of the effect produced by such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbances, bribery, or corrupt influences in preventing a fair, free, peaceable, and full registration or election, and of the number of qualified voters deterred by such riots, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation and disturbance, bribery—

I am not responsible for all these crimes in that country. They are very numerous—or corrupt influences from registering or voting, which statement shall also be corroborated under oath by three respectable citizens, qualified electors of the parish.

That contemplates when that is to be made, and it is not to be made ad libitum whenever it may suit the purpose a month or six weeks afterward, as in this case. That law, infamous as it is in some respects, yet if carefully carried out would not have allowed this vast amount of testimony to be presented of an ex parte character before the returning board. It will again appear and be made plain, I think at the proper time, that this returning board had no right whatever to investigate anything in relation to the election of presidential electors. The whole force, intent, and purport of that law is that it shall apply to local state officers and members of Congress. I will not detain the Senate by explaining my views upon that subject, but at a proper time it can be made plain beyond a doubt that it never was intended to embrace the question of the election of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States.

I think I have made good the statement I advanced awhile ago that according to the laws of Louisiana all the facts in relation to any of the numerous offenses described in that law must be returned with the list of voters within twenty-four hours from the time they were received by the canvassers at the county seat. The commissioners of the election which we call judges of election in the other States, must make return to the county seat twenty-four hours after election, making at the most forty-eight hours. That law, I say again, has not been complied with. The twenty-sixth section goes on to enumerate the character of the offenses. And that has not been complied with neither. Hence, I do not think it would be doing right to the people of the United States to place before them a mass of stuff of this kind and call it testimony, and thereby induce the people of the United States to believe that this examination by the returning board was fair and impartial, to use the language of the gentleman from Ohio, who compared it to the investigation by a court of the highest character and standing. Sir, in that he and I disagree. It was ex parte; all the facilities were given to one side, none given to the other, and it was in violation of law from the beginning to the end.

Mr. STEVENSON and Mr. SHERMAN rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senators to yield to me for one moment that I may allude to a jocose reference made by the Senator from Missouri to a citizen of the State of New York. He alluded to a telegraphic allegation that Mr. Stoughton, a man of high respectability and a lawyer eminent in his profession, witnessing a disclosure of irregularities in the case of De Soto Parish I think, upon opening the envelope from which it turned out that an affidavit the jurat of which showed plainly that it was made several days subsequent to the date of the return and to the date of the entry made by the clerk on receiving the return, and on its coming to his notice that such an irregularity occurred, passed it by saying that it was a clerical error. Many persons have been amused and not altogether good-naturedly amused at the expense of Mr. Stoughton in this regard. I wish to state, and I feel warranted in doing it emphatically because I speak upon such information as I regard of the very best authority, that Mr. Stoughton never made any remark of the sort. On the contrary, he said to one of the gentlemen attending on behalf of the party to which the Senator belongs that, obviously, undeniably, that envelope had been opened and there had been inserted in it afterward this affidavit, that there could be no question of it; but he never did say that it was a clerical error or make any remark or allusion to it for which he should have been subjected to the ridicule and the censure which somebody saw fit to cast upon him.

As Mr. Stoughton is a constituent of mine and a friend of mine and a highly respectable gentleman, I have thought it fit to enter here this specific denial which I venture to do in his behalf.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky has the floor, but yielded to the Senator from New York.

Mr. BOGY. I did not make the statement of my own authority. I read it in the papers that Mr. Stoughton had characterized this thing as a clerical error. Perhaps my friend from New York may have read the same thing.

Mr. CONKLING. Repeatedly.

Mr. BOGY. I not knowing differently made that statement, and I think I would leave to my friend from New York to decide if I was not justified in making the statement as a fact. I am glad to hear it is not true.

I would state, furthermore, that I myself know Mr. Stoughton personally, and my relations with him are of a very pleasant character. Indeed, I am indebted to him for very kind treatment the last time I was in New York. Therefore I had no disposition to make an unkind statement in regard to Mr. Stoughton. But having read the remark I honestly believed that he had made it. When it was denied by my friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] I accepted the denial at once, and when it is again denied by my friend from New York, I accept it again. If I have done him an injustice, it was not intentional.

Mr. CONKLING. I have only to say that I did not understand the Senator from Missouri to intend any injustice to Mr. Stoughton and the only difference between the Senator from Missouri and myself as he now states himself is this: When that remark was read to me from a telegraphic dispatch, in place of believing it as the Senator did, knowing Mr. Stoughton, I ventured to say at once that I did not believe it, and I never believed it down to the time when Mr. Stoughton assured me himself that he never heard of it until it was reported to him as having appeared in some northern journals.

Mr. BOGY. You have the advantage of knowing him better than I do, and therefore I was justified in repeating what I read. But the papers are so very often untrue, as you know to be the case, that perhaps we cannot believe anything stated by them.

[Mr. STEVENSON addressed the Senate. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky objects to the present consideration of the motion to print. It will go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to make some reply to the observations of the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Kentucky. It will be observed that I studiously avoided discussing the papers contained in that document, but only gave my general impressions of the result and stated what occurred at the time the testimony was taken. Now we are met by various questions of law and fact which can only be debated after we have had a chance to examine the very papers contained in that document.

The last point made by my friend from Kentucky is that the returning board had no power to pass upon the election of presidential electors, and he says on this subject he can convince republican lawyers as well as democratic lawyers that the returning board had no right to pass on the election of electors. Now I venture to say that there is not a democrat within the sound of my voice who reads this language of the last election law of Louisiana but will say that the returning board has as clear a right to pass on the election of electors as upon that of any constable or governor in Louisiana. I will read it. This is the last law:

That five persons, to be elected by the senate from all political parties, shall be the returning officers for all elections in the State, a majority of whom shall constitute a quorum, and have power to make the returns of all elections.

And yet, although that is the last law, and a clear law, giving to this returning board the power to pass upon all elections held in the State of Louisiana, my friend from Kentucky says they had no power to pass upon the election of electors.

Mr. BOGY. That law makes no provision for the election of electors at all. If that is the last and only law, there is no law for the election of electors.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then you shift your ground. The Senator from Missouri says there is no law providing for the election of electors. Neither party discovered this. Those elections are held under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, and necessarily are provided for in the laws of every State. You should not construe a law of the State on the supposition that it is violative of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States or that the State has neglected its plain duty.

My friend from Missouri talks about ex parte affidavits. I tell him that there was not a single ex parte affidavit admitted by that board of returning officers except those that were expressly provided for by law, and if he had been present he would have known that. How can my friend get up and say, "Here is a great mass of ex parte affidavits?"

Mr. BOGY. Is there any law besides the law you hold in your hand, and does not that law require that these affidavits must be made within twenty-four hours of the time the returns are made? I have read you the law.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope my friend will keep cool and sit still. He said that here was a mass of ex parte affidavits, and that he did not want them spread before the people of the United States, for fear the people could not tell the difference between true and false testimony. I tell him that there is not a paper on these files in the nature of an ex parte affidavit except the ex parte affidavits attached to the certificates of the commissioners of registration, and they by the law, by the election law which he read himself, are made prima facie evidence, to give the board jurisdiction, and then there must be further testimony, in the language of the law, taken according to the laws of Louisiana, and the great body of that testimony is depositions taken with as much form and ceremony as if upon them depended the largest sugar plantation in Louisiana.

Now he says there is no law for the election of electors and then talks about these affidavits being made in violation of law, and then he says that the commissioner ought to have attached his objections to this election, his allegation that there was intimidation, violence, and fraud, to the identical paper within twenty-four hours after the returns are received. Mr. President, the language of the law does not bear that construction. He read it himself. If he will analyze it he will find that that provision about the twenty-four hours applies only to the making up of the consolidated returns, and that the clause providing for sending forward the affidavits and certificates is not limited by twenty-four hours, and as I was told there, and as was conceded to be the fact, it was the practice there of the supervisors of registration to go to New Orleans with the returns and file them with the returning board. That seemed to be the admitted practice.

My friend argued this great case involving the freedom of election in the United States on the question of a twenty-four hour rule when the very officer who is required to make this return swears that he could not make the return at that time and place without danger of his life, and he and other witnesses from the neighborhood went to New Orleans in order that they might make their affidavit without fear of their lives. If there was a law in Louisiana requiring the twenty-four hour rule to apply, the people of the United States would disregard such a rule, when the reasons for deviating from it are given. Here are the affidavits of the supervisor himself and other sworn witnesses, that he could not then and there have made that affidavit without endangering his life. Sir, the idea of trying this case like a quarter-sessions or justice's of the peace court is absurd. The fact is if you believe these affidavits, if you believe the certificates of the supervisors of registration and these citizens, you have all that is needed to give the returning officers jurisdiction of the case, and having jurisdiction of the case they then must try it upon the sworn testimony of witnesses examined and cross-examined.

That is enough for these minor objections. My friend from New York has done justice to an eminent citizen of the State of New York, who, at great inconvenience to himself, at a personal loss to himself, paying his own expenses, and performing a laborious and unpleasant duty, went there and discharged that duty honestly and faithfully. There seems to have been a desire in some way or other to place Mr. Stoughton in a wrong position. I do not know why, but they did it. I know personally myself that Mr. Stoughton never made such a remark as that which was attributed to him. He sat by my side when the De Soto papers were canvassed and he and I agreed throughout in that whole examination that there had been an act at least of impropriety in one supervisor opening his returns and putting in these affidavits and then sealing them again. If he had just taken these affidavits and with red tape attached them around the outside of the papers, they would have been in strict conformity to the law of Louisiana; but he did not do it.

Now, Mr. President, let us go a little further. My friend from Kentucky says I precipitated the debate. In opening it I did not say anything except of what occurred there in open session to show that this testimony was taken openly before the board. I did state the general result of it; but he himself has stated twice as much as I did; and not only that, the democratic committee, before the board had acted on these returns, while they still had the case before them, issued a pronunciamiento to the people of the United States, giving their version imperfect as it was. Sir, I would not have done it. I did not do it. I said nothing about this matter in a public way until I came here and I was called upon to vote in the Senate of the United States. So I have not precipitated this debate. It has commenced, and it will go on when this testimony is printed and can be analyzed.

But my friend from Missouri took an unfortunate step in this debate that justifies me in going a little into the examination of the testimony of a single witness. He referred to the case of Eliza Pinkston, whose deposition was published all over the United States. He said that the murder of Pinkston was not on account of political trouble. He says that it was done for other than political purposes. Sir, on the short and brief facts of that case I would leave the whole matter to the people of the United States. We have the sworn testimony of two witnesses, both of whom received the severest injury that could be inflicted on man or upon woman, one of whom was unimpeached, Cora Williams. Not one word was said against her in any respect whatever. She suffered the same wrong and indignity that was inflicted on Eliza Pinkston, except that her throat was not cut and she was not hamstrung and wounded all over. Eliza Pinkston's husband was killed in the dead hour of night by a democratic band of marauders and her child was taken from her arms and butchered. There were the dead bodies. There was no controversy about that. When that woman, herself having been wounded in several places, fled after these demons had left her in her humble home to a white man's house for protection, she fled to the home of the father of one of the men who was a member of the very band of regulators who did this act, and there she was told that if she involved white men in the case they would finish her, and then she talked about "niggers" being there, and thus they seek to impeach her testimony given with her wounds yet bleeding and her dead husband and child buried like dogs without inquest or examination.

At that very same time, within hearing of the shot that killed Pinkston, another woman was injured in the same way as Mrs. Pinkston and she knew the men who did it. She told their names and her testimony is uncontradicted by a single witness or a single circumstance. She heard the shot that killed Pinkston; she saw Mrs. Pinkston within a few hours when they came together. Her husband had fled to the swamps. Ah! my friend, the scenes that occurred in those parishes that are called "bull-dozed," where thousands of negroes fled from their cabins, slept at nights in the swamps, and worked at picking cotton in the day-time, were disclosed by that testimony. But, says my friend from Kentucky, whose heart I know beats with the same feeling as mine does in regard to such atrocities, he saw negroes who were presidents of democratic clubs, he saw negroes who voted for Tilden and voted willingly. How comes it, then, my friend from Kentucky, that in forty-two parishes where it was conceded that there was a fair election, where there was no pretense of intimidation, or wrong, or fraud on either side, there was a certain and general republican gain, and there, where the negro had the right to vote, he voted for the party that gave him liberty, that secured him civil and political rights, as by the instincts of humanity he would be guided to do? Why was it that there, where there was a free election, there was an increased republican vote, while in the very parishes that were bull-dozed, where there was a majority of registered colored votes in one parish, not a single republican vote cast? And the evidence shows you that one large town of three thousand inhabitants, near which was a company of United States soldiers, for three days before the election was picketed by these armed marauders, these organized democratic rifle clubs three miles outside, and negroes were driven away who came to vote at that place. When twenty-six negroes came in the Sunday before the election, so that they might be there in time to vote, they were shot upon and three of them were killed or fled to parts unknown. And this is proven by testimony that is not gainsaid.

How comes it that one negro man, respected by all the neighborhood, spoken of kindly by the white people, seeming to be an honest, plain, simple man, who told his story well, when he started at two o'clock in the morning as an officer of the election to go to hold an election in one of these bull-dozing parishes, had gone but a little ways when a company of men, whom he knew by name, whom he named to the board, living in the neighborhood, seized him, held him, took away his ballot-box, destroyed it, and then deliberately shot him? He came before us with the wounds upon his person; and no election was held in that precinct that day. Do you think a President of the United States ought to be elected in this way? No, no. Mr. President, these scenes of violence and tumult and turmoil are proven by testimony which cannot be gainsaid. You cannot turn it aside. Not only that, the law of Louisiana, with a charity and wisdom that might be fairly followed by other States, provides for the very situation and circumstances that they found there.

In 1870, I think it was, after the murders that occurred in 1868, men of both parties joined in providing an election law that would prevent these atrocities, and Judge Campbell, now, I think, one of the judges of the supreme court of that State, at all events one of the judges of that State, drew the law under which this returning board acted, and he gave to this board of returning officers these extraordinary powers for the very purpose of protecting the negroes from this maltreatment by organized bands of marauders, from the terror, tumult, intimidation, riot, and violence that had occurred in the election of 1868. That law is spoken of as a horrid law. I must confess when I went to Louisiana I had such a distaste of the turbulence and disturbance we had heard of about them that I hardly knew what to believe; but when I examined that law and the reasons for passing that law, given in one of the papers on your files, I could not help seeing that the occasion had arisen for the passage of such a law, that such laws were necessary to protect those people in the enjoyment of their rights, if they were allowed to be protected. There was the law; it gave to the board of returning officers full power, in case of riot, tumult, intimidation, murder, violence so extensive as to change the results of election, to throw out the vote of the parish or polling place or district where the violence might have occurred. The reason of the law then became obvious. It was a great power to intrust to a returning board. It was a power only to be exercised under such care and caution that it could not lead to any great danger, and it was only intended to protect the purity of election.

Well, sir, in 1872 the democrats were glad to avail themselves of this very law and did do so. They got control of the law and claimed to use the powers of the law. Two years ago, when its powers were used against them, their complaint was acted upon by a committee of Congress. It turns out now that in the parishes which were bulldozed two years ago there was a quiet and peaceable election this year. The people of all those parishes this year voted precisely according to what the returning board two years ago showed would have been their vote if there had been an honest election then. So the very decision of this returning board two years ago, and which was set aside by a republican committee because the board had exceeded its powers, turns out to have been correct, for in these very parishes the republican members are elected this year, showing you that this returning board did do what they thought was right then and did do actually right. The result of the election this year shows that they exercised a wise judgment and did what was right. They knew more about the process and effect of intimidation than even our own republican committee of congressmen.

Now, sir, I did not want to go into this debate. God knows I would rather get rid of it entirely and let the testimony be printed. If there is anything on the other side, any explanation, let it be given.

Mr. STEVENSON. Please let me have that law which the Senator has read.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am not quite through, but I will give the Senator the law.

Mr. President, there was one remark made about the affidavits of people who came to New Orleans. That is sufficiently answered already by the testimony. It is true, I have no doubt, that some colored men did vote in Louisiana for the democratic ticket without intimidation, but they were "few and far between." As near as I can gather, the people of Louisiana are divided largely by the color line. Perhaps it is natural that it should be so. The great body of the white people of Louisiana participated in the rebellion. Perhaps it is natural that they should vote the democratic ticket and join the democratic party; while, on the other hand, the blacks were emancipated by our policy; they were clothed with the right of citizenship and they were given the ballot, and they would naturally belong to the republican party. These general reasons, which gave color to political parties, no doubt have divided the whites and blacks in Louisiana by the color line. It is unfortunately so. A policy ought to be adopted that would break down this distinction. These people have got to live together and I would be very glad indeed to see any policy adopted which, while securing the blacks peace, safety, quiet, the free right of the elective franchise, would see them divided and mixed and mingled with their white friends in party ties and party divisions on some other than a color line. But there it stands. There are, according to the best statements made to us by men of both political parties, about seven thousand white republicans in the State of Louisiana. There is an excess of at least twelve or fifteen or seventeen thousand—I do not know which—but probably about twelve or fifteen thousand as stated by most of them, of black voters over white voters.

Mr. BOGY. The white population exceeds the black population of Louisiana, according to the census of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir.

Mr. BOGY. Yes, sir; according to the census of the United States the white population exceeds the black population of Louisiana.

Mr. SHERMAN. The census shows just about an equipoise of whites and blacks in 1870, but the census of 1875, taken under State authority, shows a large majority of colored people, how many I cannot tell; but the census itself and the returns of the registration are given in these papers. But that is not all. My friend may probably know that in Louisiana, which is composed largely of varied elements coming from all parts of the world, there are about eleven thousand white men who, if naturalized, could vote, but who have never been naturalized. They still adhere to the land of their nativity. Whether that is more or less, it is manifest that the republican registered vote in Louisiana, taken by any mode you choose, gives a republican majority of 12,000 or 15,000; and when the question comes up how was this majority overcome, you are met by the fact that in forty-two of the parishes where there was a fair election, the republicans gained on the vote of two years and four years ago, and in the fifteen parishes where there was this intimidation to a greater or less degree, the republican majorities were overturned and democratic majorities given. When you inquire into the cause of this extraordinary fact you find it disclosed in this testimony. Intimidation, violence, tumult, riot, murder, burning, all these crimes have intimidated and overawed the republican vote. In some places where the negro vote is two to one white vote, not a single republican vote has been cast. There are many election precincts where there are more than two blacks to one white, where no republican vote was cast. This is shown by the testimony.

Now, Mr. President, in the face of these facts, any impartial man who will study the history of Louisiana and read the testimony in this case on both sides, must come to the conclusion that the very case provided for by the election law of Louisiana has come; that riot, murder, intimidation, and violence did so prevent a free election there as to change the result, so that it became the absolute duty of the returning board, by their oaths, to make a return according to the language of the law, by rejecting the votes at those election polls where this violence and intimidation had occurred. That they have done. The members of the returning board are just as much officers in the performance of a limited judicial duty as your Supreme Court is in a broader one, just as much as a justice of the peace is. The judicial powers and duties of that tribunal must be respected by the tribunals of the United States. The Constitution of the United States declares that the electors shall be elected according to the laws of the States. It is Louisiana that says how her electors shall be elected; it is Texas that says how her's shall be elected; it is Ohio that says how her's shall be elected. The United States have no power to interfere with their laws. Their laws and their tribunals, their mode of returning and contesting have to be regarded. It is by their laws that this case must be decided, and by the laws of Louisiana this returning board is required to pass upon these returns. It has done so, and I feel bound as a man who saw them do it, who witnessed their proceedings, to say that they did it in a manner to demand and require of you the same respect for their decision as would be given to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. Their decision is final, made so by the law of Louisiana and by the supreme law of the land; and, in making that decision, they conducted themselves with manly courage, I feel bound to say, in the midst of great excitement. They are men "to the manner born;" every man in that board is a native of the State, except Anderson, who was born in Virginia; but they are all southern men. Anderson and Wells are men as highly to be respected as any member on this floor. You may laugh as much as you please—as highly as you, sir, [turning to Mr. BOGY.] Mr. Wells has been governor of that State. He is the son of a distinguished man who lived many years in that State before Governor Wells was born. He is a property-holder and planter. Anderson was a member of the Legislature there for twenty years, elected by the people of his parish, of which nearly all are planters and colored people, before and during the war and since the war. I could not help feel a little indignation when I saw the taunts about these men in the Northern States while they were performing a bold, and manly, and disagreeable duty to them.

It will not do to ridicule these men. From the best information I can get, their opinion is worth as much, and their vote is as pure in this matter as the vote of a Senator of the United States, and it will not do for us to laugh them to scorn. They are men who have exhibited in this whole matter courage—the very quality which we admire in men. Why, sir, if they wanted to yield a moment to temptation, to popular feeling, to social desire, how easily they could have done it. But they have done their duty. I did not know, and when I left Louisiana I left in doubt how they would perform it, and what would be their decision. I now see, from the mass of testimony, that the evidence of intimidation extended not merely to the five bulldozed parishes, as they are called, where the intimidation was the worst, but it extended to fifteen parishes to a greater or less degree.

My friend from Kentucky has referred to Major Bascom, a respectable Army officer. I would leave this case upon the testimony as to East Feliciana, where this gentleman was stationed as an officer. I did not see Major Bascom to know whether he had sworn to any statement, but I believe his deposition was taken, though I have not yet seen it. I would be willing to let this case rest upon the very parish in which Major Bascom was said to have lived and performed his duty as a United States officer. A very distinguished gentleman has examined and criticised every particle of the testimony in regard to that parish, and according to his statement it presents one of the most glaring cases in the whole State. Take the case of the East and West Feleciana, two of the parishes where there was most complaint of violence and murder and intimidation. They were examined with the utmost care by lawyers, either of whom would be entitled to the respect of the Senate of the United States, one an eminent private citizen, and another a member of the House of Representatives. They have examined that testimony, and upon that testimony alone, in spite of the statement of Major Bascom, I am willing to rest this case.

But, sir, that is not all. We are not only to be governed by law but we are to be governed by the forms of law, and the forms of law in Louisiana have been fully observed and the spirit of the law has been observed.

Mr. McDONALD rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. McDONALD. I should like to ask just one question. Was the form of law observed in filling the vacancy that existed in the board?

Mr. WEST. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it was.

Mr. WEST. It can be demonstrated here to the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. A great many of these ideas will be dissipated when you come to examine the matter.

Mr. McDONALD. I will ask another question.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me answer one.

Mr. McDONALD. Does not that law require a representation of all parties on the board? I ask whether they had that representation?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, they had that representation. A democrat was appointed on that board; he chose after remaining a while to resign, and the other members of that board have tried and appealed to several democrats in the State of Louisiana to take that vacant place without success. But when the democratic committee recently proposed to them the name of a certain gentleman and dictated to them a particular appointment they disagreed about it and did not do it. That is all there is of that. They could not agree as to filling that vacancy.

Mr. President, I have already gone far beyond what I intended and I will stop here, hoping that Senators will allow this testimony to be printed. As a matter of course, if a single objection is made it will go over until to-morrow, but that will only delay the matter for the moment, for while the vote of Louisiana has this day been legally and irrevocably cast for the republican candidates, yet I want this testimony printed and all the light of investigation thrown on the election in Louisiana to show how narrowly the people of the United States have escaped the danger of having a President elected by violence and murder.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, considering the great length of time that this subject has occupied in the Senate to-day, and, also, that perhaps during the remainder of this session we shall get quite a surfeit of the subject, I should have preferred not to have risen in my place; but there are some few things that have fallen from the lips of Senators to-day which require at my hands such statements as I shall now make.

Whenever the democratic party of this country, and particularly whenever the democratic party of the State of Louisiana, fail either to convince the country or themselves that a black man can be converted into a democrat—and my experience is that they might as well expect to see the grand old Mississippi run up stream as to expect to see a colored man vote the democratic ticket when his neighbors are being murdered by his side for their political faith—but whenever they fail to convince themselves that such can be done, they resort to this old exploded fallacy that the races in Louisiana, white and black, are nearly equally divided, and that the whites are in slight preponderance, and therefore that the State is democratic. Trying their own "color line" and assuming that we have not a white man in our ranks, let me tell Senators to-day that nine-tenths of the men who have been elected in Louisiana at the last election came from the old confederate stock who have seen the error of their ways and are joining the republican ranks. Whenever they fail to convince themselves of that they come back to that old exploded fallacy, and what is it? Let the Senators turn to the census of 1870. I will be particular because the facts are impressed upon my memory by repeated assertion. Let them take pages 619 and 629 of the second volume of the census, on the statistics of population, and they will find but a very meager difference between the number of the white male adults and the number of the black male adults. They will find absolutely the fact that the white male adults preponderate to the extent of one hundred and fifty over the blacks. But it is very convenient for them to stop there in their researches. Let them go to the column of citizenship and they will find in that column that they have 15,000 unnaturalized foreigners in the State of Louisiana, and God knows how many of them they vote. There are nine thousand in the parish of Orleans alone, men that have been there thirty years under the protection of the British flag and using it when they are called upon to do jury duty. Such is the fact. Absolutely under the census of 1870 there is a preponderance of 15,000 black voters over the whites in Louisiana, and the gentlemen are not even willing to accord us that majority, accumulated as it might be by the men of my political faith and color there. I hope we have heard the last of that fallacy. It has been exploded over and over again.

Mr. President, something has been said about this returning board, and its action in 1874 and 1876. It will be shown by the testimony here—I have not seen any of it, but I am part of it, because I went through the canvass in all parts of that State—that parishes which by violence and outrage and murder in 1874 cast a democratic vote, this year, with peace and with quiet are restored to their normal condition, have rolled up a republican majority. They will find that parishes which in 1874 cast a republican vote to the extent of 5,000 majority, this year by violence and murder and outrage have been distorted to a representation of 3,500 democratic majority. These are the facts that they will find; we shall have enough of this, and it will go to the country. All that I can rejoice in is that my voice, which has been raised over and over again on this floor in regard to outrage and violence in Louisiana, is now to be echoed by Senators from every section of the Union who have witnessed what I have often borne testimony to here.

Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky almost overwhelmed me with his high legal authorities. First, I had to contend with the honorable Senator himself. Then he quoted one of our old associates here, a man pre-eminent for his judicial opinions in this country, the Ex-Senator from Illinois. Then he quoted an eminent gentleman from Ohio. I will admit all that, and I bow in humility to their superior wisdom and knowledge of law. I have stated no opinion here; I have stated the law and let anybody put his own construction on it that pleases. But, Mr. President, why have I not stated an opinion? Because neither I nor any Senator here has any right to interfere with the machinery provided by a State under the Constitution of the United States for its appointment of electors. Suppose the Senator does differ from me? Suppose the honorable Ex-Senator differs? Suppose the highest authorities in the land may choose to differ, will you go back of the machinery provided under your Constitution and you organize yourselves into a grand returning board, grander and with greater powers than Louisiana has ever had, and presume to say that that State shall not cast her electoral vote? Is not that proposition foreshadowed here by the Senator from Kentucky, that the Congress of the United States on the second Wednesday of February is to outreturn Louisiana, is to assume a jurisdiction that Louisiana never dreamt of, and perhaps cast out votes from other sovereign States?

Sir, that is the tribunal provided by law, and I have just as much right to touch the returns of the State of the Senator from Kentucky or the State of the Senator from Missouri as they have to touch those of Louisiana. Ah, Mr. President, how often we hear this reference to the tranquillity, the peace, and the good order that prevailed on election day in Louisiana. It is the peace of death, purchased by the death of thousands of republicans. How was it in 1868 when the news came here that an election unparalleled in tranquillity and peace had been held in this State? Why, sir, where a republican vote of 45,000 had been cast only five months before, we could with all our efforts and with the bravery that some white men manifested get only 1,500 votes. That is the kind of peace and good order we have in that State. You will see evidences of it here. But Senators are scarcely right in calling for a judgment before we hear the testimony. They are scarcely right in making their assertions before we get the opportunity to see how far they are substantiated. I am glad for one that at last Louisiana's voice is to be heard; that at last it is coming to the country to know how men suffer, how men are murdered and butchered in the wilderness in the South, and I am glad that it is to be known to the country what measures we had to take to protect men there for opinion's sake. It will come in due time. It is here, and we shall all listen to it, and I am satisfied that when the verdict of this American people shall come they themselves, when they render it will be astonished that they have left us in our days of trial to suffer as we have done throughout the South.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I wish to add a word or two in reply to both the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from Ohio. If I understand the Senator from Ohio, he claims the jurisdiction of this board under the second section of the act admitted to be the only one regulating elections in Louisiana. That section declares:

> That five persons, to be elected by the senate from all political parties, shall be the returning officers for all elections in the State, a majority of whom shall constitute a quorum, and have power to make the returns of all elections. In the case of any vacancy by death, resignation, or otherwise, by either of the board, then the vacancy shall be filled by the residue of the board of returning officers. The returning officers shall, after each election, before entering on their duties, take and subscribe to the following oath before a judge of the supreme or any district court.

Now I insist that the words "all elections" in that section is limited and controlled by the first section of that act, which the Senator did not read, but which I will now do: "That all elections for State, parish, and judicial officers, for members of the General Assembly, and for members of Congress, shall be held on the first Tuesday after the first Monday of November." I insist that the words "all elections" in the second section cited by the Senator is limited to the State officers enumerated in the first section. There is no reference in the act admitted by the Senator from Ohio to be the only act on the subject of elections in Louisiana to the election of President and Vice-President. That act does not refer to presidential electors. But the Senator from Ohio attempts to escape the difficulty by announcing that the election of electors in the States is regulated by Federal enactment, and therefore it was not necessary to refer to the election of electors in the State. This is a novel doctrine, that the Federal Government can regulate the election of electors for President in a State. If such a dogma as that has ever been uttered before, I am not aware of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Did I say that?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes, sir, unquestionably. You stated that while the same law cited by you did not mention presidential electors that the omission was provided for by some act of Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend must certainly have misunderstood me. I said that the law applied to all elections in Louisiana, the election for electors as well as others.

Mr. STEVENSON. You clearly misunderstood yourself, and I am not surprised at it. I am, however, perfectly willing the Senator shall take back what he said; but then the difficulty presents itself where is the law of Louisiana providing for the appointment of presidential electors. The Senator has failed to show it.

From time immemorial electors have been regarded as State officers, elected under State authority, paid out of the treasury of the State. The Federal Government does, I believe, pay the messenger who bears the electoral vote of the States on the certificate of the Vice-President, and that is the only Federal regulation with the vote of the electoral college. An elector of President is a State office; the election is regulated solely by State law; electors are paid out of the State treasury, and therefore I insist the Senator from Ohio must exhibit to the Senate the act of Louisiana under which the appointment of electors in Louisiana was held; the jurisdiction of the returning board to canvass the votes for presidential electors. If no such act is in force then there was no authority to hold it. Now, I insist the act cited by the Senator from Ohio as the only election law in force in Louisiana makes no reference to the appointment of electors or to the filling of vacancies. I have read this act fifty times, and if there is a word in it in regard to the electors or the electoral college except that a provision on the day of the election for President the election for State officers shall be held, I am mistaken.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me read it:

That five persons to be elected by the Senate from all political parties shall be the returning officers for all elections.

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes, sir; but now read the first section, which confines all elections to such officers, and not to presidential electors.

Mr. SHERMAN. "The returning board for all elections."

Mr. STEVENSON. That is for all elections specified and included in that act; but show me the power in that act to appoint an elector for President or to fill a vacancy in the electoral college when one shall occur.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think there will be any vacancy in the electoral college of Louisiana.

Mr. STEVENSON. My position is that the State law cited by the Senator from Ohio contains no authority on the subject of the election of President and Vice-President and the appointment of electors. If that statute repealed all other laws there was no authority to hold an election for President. If the act cited by the Senator from Ohio did not repeal the act of 1868, which is the only act in Louisiana providing for the appointment of electors for President and Vice-President, then the act of 1868 is still in force. That act provides that the governor of Louisiana, on the fourth Monday in November, shall examine and certify the returns in the appointment of electors. I give no opinion whether the act is repealed or not. If it is repealed no authority to appoint electors in Louisiana existed. If it is not repealed the governor of Louisiana, and not the returning board, is the only authority to count and return the votes. Either horn is fatal to the claim of the returning board.

The Senator from Louisiana was pleased to say that I was seeking some legal authority in Congress to exclude the vote of Louisiana. I desire to say that there was nothing which I said which authorized the Senator to attribute to me any such sentiment. It was unjust and gratuitous. Nor could any such inference be deduced from my argument touching the law of Louisiana. I have said nothing about the power of Congress to canvass and exclude the vote of Louisiana or any other State for President. I cited the law to prove the want of jurisdiction of the returning board. But I said nothing as to the candidates for whom Louisiana had voted. On the contrary, I said that I had not made my opinion up as to the charges of intimidation, because I had not seen and read the evidence. I had a distinct impression that Louisiana had voted for Tilden, but it was not so strong that it could not be removed. I did not argue the question of fact, but rather of law, and I did not intimate what authority could pass upon the question of the validity or invalidity of the vote of Louisiana. That will come up hereafter. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

Mr. President, I have not a word to say as to the eloquent and extraordinary eulogy that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has passed on the personnel of the Louisiana returning board. He says they are equal in respectability and character to any Senator in this Chamber.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not say that.

Mr. STEVENSON. I should be glad if the Senator would tell us what he did say? I do not certainly want to misquote or misrepresent him.

Mr. SHERMAN. I said their action as returning officers is entitled to as much respect as that of any one of us here.

Mr. STEVENSON. The Senator, I must insist, went a little further. He was eloquent as to their worth and respectability. I wish to make no issue now as to the character of the Louisiana returning board. I have only to say that the Senator from Ohio and his party candidate for Vice-President [Mr. WHEELER] would seem to differ widely in their opinion as to the character of the returning board. Mr. WHEELER has put on record his opinion of the capacity of this board to make a fair count on election returns. The Senator's candidate for Vice-President set aside the action of the returning board as unjust and illegal. The Senate of the United States has also set aside the findings of this returning board as being illegal; and I deny——

Mr. SHERMAN. Will my friend allow me to correct him in one particular; he would not do injustice to any one?

Mr. STEVENSON. No, I would not.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have recently read, as I never did before, the Wheeler report, and in that very report signed by Judge HOAR and Mr. WHEELER they passed a very high eulogium upon the returning board. It is true they differed with the board as to the construction of a single clause of a single law, and how often do we differ here among ourselves about the law? I will not interrupt my friend long, but there is here a very strong eulogium on the returning board in this very report which I have before me.

Mr. STEVENSON. Please let me have that. Does that paragraph contain all that they said about Mr. Wells? [Laughter.]

Mr. WEST. They had a very high respect for him.

Mr. STEVENSON. I have said nothing personally to-day of Mr. Wells or Mr. Anderson. I may have occasion to look to that hereafter. I was speaking of what Mr. WHEELER did. He certainly put out a great many members of the Louisiana Legislature that the returning board had put in. They must have been put in illegally and wrongfully, therefore. Besides, the records of the Senate show that the history of elections in Louisiana has been a sad history of wrong and oppression. For many successive years that gallant and down-trodden Commonwealth has been oppressed, and the recorded suffrages of her people, legally cast and properly authenticated, have been derided and set at naught. Her chosen officers have been denied the offices to which they were elected. The Senate of the United States has declared that there was no legal government in Louisiana when the returning board of that State would have installed usurpers. If half of what the Senator from Ohio says about the returning board be true, if they are the upright, law-abiding, honest officials which he to-day asserts them to be, the Senate has sadly erred, I fear, in many of its rulings. Pinchback should have been admitted; but this was done by republican and democratic votes alike in this Chamber. Eminent republicans and democrats alike in the past have united in condemning the wrongs and crimes of Louisiana returning boards.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will my friend show me the report which shows that these men have been guilty of wrongs and outrages? If he can do it, I will give up.

Mr. STEVENSON. I have shown you what Mr. WHEELER did to reprobate the action of the returning board by vacating its returns; need I refer the Senator to the report of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Carpenter] in which he said that the whole history of the returning board of Louisiana was a fraud from beginning to end so far as the election of republican candidates——

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend has changed the issue. He said a distinguished committee of this body had said so and so of the personnel of this board; that they had been guilty of wrong and outrage. If he will show me that passage or anything that will bear that construction, or anything in that report except a difference of opinion on a legal point and a eulogy of their personal character, I will yield.

Mr. STEVENSON. I have already shown the wrongs of the returning board in having the returns of members of the Legislature set aside by the republican candidate for Vice-President. I now refer to Mr. Carpenter's report, then Senator from Wisconsin, a known republican and a man of the highest ability, as to the thousands of fraudulent ballots put into the boxes at the election in Louisiana, and his startling exposure of the system of fraud practiced in Louisiana elections. This returning board undertook to return republican candidates upon evidence that shocked men of all parties.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. STEVENSON. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask the Senator, with great respect, when it was that this report of Mr. Carpenter, of Wisconsin, to which he refers, was made?

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not recall the year. The Senator perhaps remembers better than I do, and as his memory is always better than mine he can state it if he deems it important.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In 1873. Then I wish to ask the Senator whether a single member of the present returning board of Louisiana was a member of the board of which Mr. Carpenter spoke?

Mr. STEVENSON. I really do not know. I am very glad the Senator from Vermont has called my attention to it. I had supposed that some of the present returning board were on that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not a single member.

Mr. STEVENSON. Then I take all back I have said touching the iniquities of the returning board in 1872. I wish to do injustice to nobody.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I know it. That is why I ask the question.

Mr. STEVENSON. I repeat that I am gratified that the Senator from Vermont has corrected me, for I desire no statement to go out in matters like these that is not exactly true; and if I have done injustice to this returning board, I shall always rejoice to correct it. I take back all reference to the returning board of 1872. I desire always to be right and to have the truth on my side. The present board was not the returning board then in 1872?

Mr. WEST. If the Senator will pardon me, both the law and the board are dead.

Mr. STEVENSON. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] thinks there is one on the board now acting who was acting then.

Mr. WEST. I state what I know.

Mr. STEVENSON. Very well. This returning board have sins enough to answer for without going back to 1872. I charge that this returning board failed to discharge their duty or to obey the law in failing to fill the vacancy on the board. They were sworn to do their duty. The law of Louisiana creating this returning board requires that both parties shall be represented. Why did not Wells and Anderson fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of the democrat? What motive prompted this board, so highly eulogized by the Senator from Ohio, from performing what the law demanded and required of them? Men who thus flagrantly violate law should not justly stand on the same footing with Senators of the United States or with judges of the Supreme Court.

The Senator from Ohio puts a question to me, Why have there not been frauds and intimidation in other districts where the republicans have increased their vote? I believe it was Archimedes who said, "If you give me a fulcrum for my lever I will move the world." So, too, if the Senator from Ohio be allowed his premises he doubtless could make everything logical. But his assumption is all wrong that there were no frauds and intimidation in that portion of Louisiana where the republicans gained. I am credibly informed that there was more intimidation by white republicans over colored voters in the Red River country of Louisiana than in any portion of the State. I can give high authority for this statement. I am informed that the colored voters were marched up in pairs with their registration papers in one hand, and as they approached the polls folded republican ballots were handed to them, and if any refused or showed any reluctance he was instantly taken possession of and summarily and cruelly dealt with by republican intimidators. The attorney-general-elect of Louisiana will, I am sure, bring proof of the truth of this species of republican intimidation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Where do you get that?

Mr. STEVENSON. My authority is not based upon such testimony as that offered by you in the person, Mrs. Pinkston. Her statement, as you know, was contradicted. My authority, as already stated, rests on the statement of the governor-elect of Louisiana and the attorney-general. I was grieved at the eloquent manner in which the Senator from Ohio attempts to revive all the animosities and prejudices of the North and the South by his recital of Mrs. Pinkston's injuries. I am informed that these assaults and killings recited by Mrs. Pinkston had no political bearing, and that her testimony was impeached and overthrown by some reputable witness.

Mr. President, can it be possible that the legality of the Louisiana returning board has to be sustained by such ex parte recitals as the Senator from Ohio has exhibited to-day in the Senate as to Mrs. Pinkston's injuries? My observation during a visit to a large sugar plantation while in New Orleans exhibited the kindest relations between the whites and the blacks; and could every Senator in this Chamber have witnessed, as I did, the happy condition of the colored people, with their wives and children of all ages, and their friendly relations toward the proprietors of that plantation, it would dissipate these stories of cruelty and wrong between whites and blacks. That outrages have been committed I do not doubt. God forbid that any of them should ever find an apologist in me. But that these outrages are often political I do not believe. The solution of the changed vote of the colored people in the old slave States is that the negroes are sick of the wrongs, injuries, and extortions under carpet-bag rule and they desire a change.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEVENSON. With great pleasure.

Mr. HOWE. I should like to ask him whether the planter to whom he referred is a gentleman by the name of Lawrence?

Mr. STEVENSON. He is not. The plantation to which I went was that of a widow lady who was at the time I was there in New York, but whose plantation was managed by her brother, a worthy gentleman of high character, and his son who is a talented member of the present Legislature of Louisiana at this time. It was the Poydras plantation.

Mr. HOWE. The representation answers the description very well of a gentleman I know, and hence my inquiry.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, it is very late and I shall detain the Senate but a moment. I am not willing that the speech of the Senator from Ohio should go to the country without some word of explanation from me. I was also in New Orleans, and speak from some knowledge obtained while I was there, of what occurred under my own observation. The gentleman makes a speech in advance to sustain the doings of the returning board, as well as its character, and to make it appear that it was not only composed of men of ability and of capacity, but that their action was altogether just and impartial. I will not detain the Senate by going into a lengthy statement of the character of that board. Certainly if there be any truth to be attached to the report of General Sheridan, Mr. Wells cannot be a man of much character, for in a report made a few years ago to the President of the United States he said that he was a man not worthy of belief. This returning board is not composed of men who are esteemed as good and honest men in that State. Mr. Anderson, who is now a member of the board, went on it pretending to be a democrat, and he has been since that time considered a radical of the most decided character. Another member of this board, named Kenner, is a colored man, who is known to be infamous, and who was indicted for robbing a gambling-house a few years ago, and now keeps in New Orleans a saloon of the very lowest character. This is Mr. Kenner. The other man, Mr. Casanave, is also colored, but appears to be an innocent man without any mental capacity.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope my friend will not attack the character of these men. He says Mr. Kenner was the keeper of a low gambling-house.

Mr. BOGY. No, a saloon; and I saw the indictment myself.

Mr. SHERMAN. An indictment can be easily procured.

Mr. BOGY. I saw the indictment which some years ago was found by the grand jury against this Mr. Kenner. I said that he keeps in the city of New Orleans now a low saloon. A clever man may keep a saloon, but I mention it as evidence that he is not a man of high position. The gentleman said that that board was composed of men as respectable in their personal character as Senators on this floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. I said the two persons that I named; but I never saw Mr. Kenner unless in the board. I never heard that he had kept a gambling-house.

Mr. BOGY. I did not say he keeps a gambling-house; but he keeps a saloon where he sells liquors every day. I passed in front of his saloon myself.

Now, sir, a word with regard to all the testimony alluded to by the Senator from Ohio. He has made a speech which will go to the country showing these alleged outrages. I do not deny that such testimony was taken and presented to the returning board; I do not deny the fact that that testimony had influence on that returning board; yet I do deny the fact that that testimony is true; and when the time comes the respectable men of Louisiana will disprove all these things. These terrific outrages that have been reported and related by the gentleman from Ohio are not true, although they are stated to be true.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not relate a single instance of outrage except the one the Senator referred to. I can tell him stories in that testimony about which there is no contradiction.

Mr. BOGY. The gentleman contradicts himself again. I do think he is laboring under a peculiar hallucination of mind to-day. He did relate more than one case, several cases where great outrages were reported. His speech in the RECORD will show it. He related not only the Pinkston case but other cases in which these men had been badly treated, taken out in the night and murdered. These statements were made for that returning board. In New Orleans they are known not to be true by the respectable men of both parties, democrats and republicans. They were manufactured and made there and sworn to by colored men who cannot sign their names, and who make their marks not knowing what is written. You cannot tell if the affidavits returned have been taken or not. It is all a vast system of imposition gotten up by bad men to make an impression upon the mind of the people of the United States that the citizens of Louisiana have been guilty of these horrid frauds.

I speak from my observation in the city of New Orleans. I took great pains to inquire. The State of Louisiana is as peaceful, as quiet, as law-abiding as the State of Ohio, and there has been no intimidation, no outrages committed at this election more than was committed in the gentleman's own State, or the State of Pennsylvania, or in any other State. It was the policy of the democratic party not to commit wrong of any kind. They were satisfied that they had a majority in the State. Gentlemen are much mistaken when they believe that a colored man must from necessity be a republican. The colored men know well now that the republican party did not give them freedom because they believed they were entitled to freedom. They know well now that freedom was conferred upon them from policy so that they might be used as instruments in elections. They have found that thing out. In addition to this, the administration in Louisiana by the republican party has been so infamous, so corrupt, that even the colored men have been disgusted, and they are no longer willing to support that party. I saw many colored men myself while I was in New Orleans. I made it my business. I went there for the purpose of investigating the question of the recent election. I saw men from different parishes in that State, French and English, negroes, and they all told me that they had heretofore been republicans, but were no longer willing to be so; that they had been robbed in everything; that they were promised education and have not received any; that the school funds have been robbed in all the parishes; that bad officers have been sent to them, and that a system of infamous corruption has pervaded that State from one end to the other, until it had become revolting to them, and for that reason they had become democrats.

It is said that the color line is drawn in Louisiana. So it is. It is from necessity. It may be a misfortune, and much to be regretted; but that being so, it shows that the State is democratic. For according to the census of 1870, the white population exceeded the black population. The Senator from Louisiana says, however, that the black voting population exceeds the white voting population.

Mr. WEST. By 15,000.

Mr. BOGY. I only know that the white population exceeds the black population, and that most of the white men are democrats, and that there are from five, to ten and fifteen thousand negroes who are democrats, to say the least, is certainly not stretching it very far; and that makes the State democratic. If it be true that they have destroyed so many of the colored men, to carry out the idea of my friend from Ohio, that they have slain them in every direction, how can it be that since 1870 they have increased so as to have the preponderance? If in 1870 we had the majority, according to the census, and if the whites have killed thousands since that time, how can it be that the negroes have become so numerous?

Mr. ALLISON. They have gone there from other States.

Mr. BOGY. I cannot tell. It seems they have increased in all the Southern States. My friend from Iowa says they have gone from other States. If they are likely to be killed with that rapidity which it is said they are, I do not think they would be encouraged to go there from the other States.

Mr. CRAGIN. I presume the Senator wishes to be correct. I have before me the census of 1870, and it shows that the colored population in 1870 was a little over two thousand more than the white. If the gentleman would like to look at it, I will send it to his desk.

Mr. MORTON. Including all the white aliens?

Mr. CRAGIN. Including all the white aliens.

Mr. BOGY. It requires some examination. We had that book before us in Louisiana, not the compendium but the large edition of the census, and it was an acknowledged fact, not denied by the republicans there, that in 1870 the white population exceeded the negro population. I understood the Senator from Louisiana to say the same thing.

Mr. WEST. I will admit it.

Mr. BOGY. Therefore it will require some little time to explain that. I do not deny the correctness of the reading of the Senator from New Hampshire; but there must be some explanation of it. The fact was not denied in New Orleans that the white population exceeded by some sixteen hundred the colored population.

I will not detain the Senate, Mr. President, at this time. My object is only to correct the impression which will be made upon the country by the speech of the Senator from Ohio. I understand his object perfectly well. It is to sustain the action of the returning board. It is to make the impression that the people of Louisiana have been guilty of fraud and violence at the recent election, and to sustain the character of the testimony taken by himself and others in violation of law. He admits himself that the testimony was taken in violation of law.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not.

Mr. BOGY. He admits himself that it was taken in violation of law, but justifies it on the ground that these men could not comply with the law and make the returns for fear that they might be assassinated.

Mr. SHERMAN. That would not be in violation of law. I certainly did not admit that we had taken any testimony. I never took a scrap of testimony.

Mr. BOGY. I did not say that you had. The gentleman was there, one of a committee of five, while the testimony was taken and he was there when it was read. The testimony was taken in violation of law and so admitted by him, but justified upon the ground that the persons were afraid to comply with the law, fearing they might be assassinated. That excuse is given. The law nevertheless is positive, it is imperative, and you have no right to disregard it. This board is composed of four members and ought to be composed of five members. Why was not the fifth member elected, and he a democrat? The gentleman says it was offered to parties in Louisiana. I heard that thing talked of in Louisiana and the democratic committee designated half a dozen different gentlemen of high standing to be members of that board, and they were all refused. I never heard that the appointment was tendered in an official way by that board to any other man in Louisiana. It might have been talked of, but so it is that that vacancy never was filled to this day. It was their duty according to law to have a democrat on that board, and there is none now. They could not afford to have a democrat there who would be a witness to what transpired in the so-called executive sessions. These sessions were held after both committees had left, and they wanted no eye not friendly to witness their infamous doings. When the sealed packages were opened and documents introduced, as the proof is was done from the parish of De Soto, and through a clerical error, it would not have done for a democrat to be present. The fact is it is admitted to have been done in this case, and that it was done in many other cases there can be no doubt. For this reason it was wise to confine the board to four republicans.

At the proper time I presume this subject will come up again. The history of Louisiana is a painful history. It is a history of blood, of murder, and of violation of law, painful indeed. Nevertheless, I think, painful as it is reported to be, it is very much exaggerated, and I believe that the white people there are as anxious for good and quiet government as the white people of any other State of this Union, and are as little guilty of fraud and violence as any other people of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the question before the Senate, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection was raised to printing, and under the rule the motion to print the message and documents will now go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why should it go to the Committee on Printing?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule requires it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no motion to print extra copies.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule requires that motions to print all such documents shall go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I move to take up Senate resolution——

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the rule be read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, I should like to hear it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the rule.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

A Committee on Printing, to consist of three Senators, to whom shall be referred every question on the printing of documents, reports, or other matter transmitted by either of the Executive Departments, and all memorials, petitions, accompanying documents, together with all other matter, the printing of which shall be moved, excepting bills originating in Congress, resolutions offered by any Senator, communications from the Legislatures, or conventions lawfully called by the respective States, &c.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the exceptions read through. I am surprised if a motion to print a message from the President of the United States must be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading, as follows:

Excepting bills originating in Congress, resolutions offered by any Senator, communications from the Legislatures, or conventions lawfully called by the respective States, and motions to print by order of the standing committees of the Senate.—Senate Manual, page 142.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then the Committee on Printing can report back, and that report will not be subject to objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule requires that the motion shall be referred to the committee if there be objection. By unanimous consent printing has been directed heretofore without a reference, but objection being made the motion goes to the Committee on Printing under the rule.

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES—JOINT RULES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution No. 10, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, of which I gave notice yesterday. I will say that I do not intend to press it to-night but wish to leave it as the unfinished business for to-morrow.

Mr. MERRIMON. With a view to have a definite understanding as to the rules we are proceeding under, I object, and cite in support of my objection the twenty-first joint rule:

After six days from the commencement of a second or subsequent session of Congress, all bills, resolutions, or reports which originated in either House, and at the close of the next preceding session remained undetermined in either House, shall be resumed and acted on in the same manner as if an adjournment had not taken place.

The six days have not elapsed. It is true there is a rule of the Senate which conflicts with that, but I take it that this rule supersedes that rule of the Senate, and that according to the terms of the rule, its spirit, and the practice under it, no unfinished business can be proceeded with until the time prescribed shall have elapsed. I know that at the last session the Senate undertook to re-adopt the joint rules which had prevailed in the Forty-third Congress and anterior to that time from almost the beginning of the Government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remind the Senator that if he states his point of order the Chair will rule upon it, and then the Senator can proceed upon the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. MERRIMON. I want to state the facts in order that my point of order may be seen. I submit that the joint rules are in force, and that under the joint rules this unfinished business cannot now be proceeded with. Therefore, the Senator from Vermont in making his motion is not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order. The joint rules are not in force, and the fifty-second rule of the Senate governs the case. Does the Senator appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. MERRIMON. The Chair knows that I have very great respect for his rulings, but with a view of having this matter looked into I beg to appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina appeals from the decision of the Chair. Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. MERRIMON. I wish to be heard upon the question. The greater number of the joint rules of the two Houses have existed since 1790. They have been continually used and both branches of Congress have practiced under them from that day until this. I do not know of any proceeding of the Senate by which these rules were repealed, and if there is such I shall thank any one to cite it. I know that at the last session the Senate re-affirmed these joint rules——

Mr. WEST. With the consent of the Senator from North Carolina, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope not. Let us finish this matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Louisiana insist on the motion?

Mr. WEST. There is nobody more interested in this matter than the Senator from Vermont. I withdraw the motion, but I do not believe this question can be pressed to a decision to-night.

Mr. MERRIMON. I repeat what I said a moment ago.

Mr. MORTON. I ask my friend to give way for a motion to adjourn.

Mr. MERRIMON. I will.

Mr. MORTON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 6, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at twelve minutes after twelve o'clock; and the business of the morning hour is the calling of the committees for reports, beginning with the Committee on Elections.

There were no reports from the Committee on Elections.

WILLIAM S. MORRIS, ET AL.

Mr. TARBOX, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 1857) for the relief of William S. Morris, William Mann, Charles A. Oakman, George W. Hillman, the Union Transfer Company of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, the Union Transfer Company of Baltimore, Maryland, and John R. Graham, late of Philadelphia, now of Washington, District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

DE FOREST W. CARPENTER.

Mr. TARBOX also, from the same committee, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 677) for the relief of De Forest W. Carpenter, postmaster at Richford, Vermont; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

EDGAR A. BEACH.

Mr. TARBOX also, from the same committee, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 385) to pay Edgar A. Beach, of Essex, Vermont, the sum therein named; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

H. H. ALEXANDER.

Mr. TARBOX also, from the same committee, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 3447) for the relief of H. H. Alexander; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

HENRY B. BROWN.

Mr. TARBOX also, from the same committee, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 1058) for the relief of Henry B. Brown; which was referred to the Committe of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

D. D. WEAD.

Mr. TARBOX also, from the same committee, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 672) to reimburse D. D. Wead, postmaster at Sheldon, Vermont, for stamps and moneys stolen from him December 31, 1873; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WIDOW OF P. M. ARMSTRONG.

Mr. TARBOX also, from the same committee, reported back with an adverse recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 1903) for the relief of the widow of P. M. Armstrong, of Overton County, Tennessee, under the act of March 3, 1873, and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF NAME OF YACHT.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. No. 1824) to change the name of the pleasure yacht Hiram B. to Iola.

The bill was read. It grants authority to the owner of the yacht Hiram B. of the port of Edgartown, Massachusetts, to change its name to Iola, by which name said vessel shall be known and registered.

The amendment of the committee was as follows:

Add these words:
And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to allow said change of name.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PIERCE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES CALER.

Mr. PIERCE. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the memorial of James Caler, to report it back with a bill.

The bill (H. R. No. 4115) for the relief of James Caler, of Stamford, Connecticut, was received and read a first and second time.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to James Caler, of Stamford, Connecticut, the sum of $2,900, said sum to be in full compensation for damages incurred and for extra labor performed by said Caler in the execution of his contract with the United States for dredging the bar at Rutherford Park, on the Passaic River, New Jersey, dated the 28th day of June, 1873.

Mr. HOLMAN. That bill of course goes to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PIERCE. I was about to move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and with the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

CHANGE OF THE NAME OF A VESSEL

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1611) authorizing the changing of the name of the sloop Addie Parker, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to allow the owner of the sloop Addie Parker, a vessel of American ownership and license, to change her name, and be hereafter known as the Addie.

The committee reported an amendment to add to the title the words, "of New Bedford."

The amendment to the title was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PIERCE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE SYNEPUXENT BAY.

Mr. KEHR, from the same committee, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 3163) to authorize the Ocean City Bridge Company to maintain and operate a bridge heretofore erected over and across Synepuxent Bay in Worcester County, Maryland, with an amendment.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of Amrica in Congress assembled, That the Ocean City Bridge Company, a corporation created by an act of the General Assembly of the State of Maryland, passed at the January session thereof, in the year 1876, be, and it is hereby, authorized to maintain and operate a bridge heretofore built across Synepuxent Bay, from Hommock Point to Ocean City in Worcester County in said State, with all the powers, rights, and franchises, and subject to all the conditions, duties, and obligations which are conferred and imposed upon said corporation in and by the several provisions of the said act of incorporation.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter or amend this act so as to prevent or remove all material obstructions to the navigation of said bay by the construction of said bridge is hereby expressly reserved, and any change needful to that end shall be made at the expense of the said corporation.

The amendment reported by the committee was to strike out the second section and substitute in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 2. If the bridge authorized by the preceding section shall at any time, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, substantially or materially obstruct the free navigation of the Synepuxent Bay, the same shall, by the direction of the Secretary and at the expense of the owner or owners, be so altered or changed as to obviate the obstruction. And if, in the opinion of the Secretary, the removal of the bridge shall be necessary to secure the navigation of said bay, such bridge shall, within sixty days after notice to that effect, be removed by the owner or owners at his or their expense.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KEHR moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGES ACROSS THE OHIO RIVER.

Mr. REAGAN, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 2263) for the repeal of so much of the act of December 17, 1872, as provides for a pivot-draw in any bridge to be erected across the Ohio River between the cities of Covington, Kentucky, and Cincinnati, Ohio.

Mr. REAGAN. The committee recommend the passage of this bill, but I do not ask action upon it now. I ask the consent of the House that it be made the special order for Thursday, the 14th of this month.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Texas will allow this measure to come up at a later day than that named.

Mr. REAGAN. The measure is one involving great interests, and it is important that it should be acted upon speedily.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly it is a measure of very great moment.

The SPEAKER. The bill cannot be made a special order except under a suspension of the rules, and it is not within the power of the House to suspend the rules to-day.

Mr. REAGAN. I am aware of that, but I ask unanimous consent that the bill be postponed and made a special order for that day.

Mr. BANNING. I trust the gentleman from Texas will make it a special order at a late day, because my colleague, Mr. SAYLER, whose constituents are very much interested in the bill, and who will unavoidably be absent, would like to have an opportunity to be heard upon it.

Mr. REAGAN. Will it answer the purpose of the gentleman from Ohio if I ask that it shall be made the special order for Tuesday the 19th instant?

Mr. BANNING. I wish the gentleman would fix upon a day after the holidays.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish, on account of the important interests involved, to have as early a day as possible fixed for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BANNING. Then make it immediately after the holidays?

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Texas will consent to that.

Mr. BANNING. I know that Mr. SAYLER cannot be here before the holidays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio cannot make a qualified objection. Will the gentleman from Texas indicate the day on which he asks that this bill be made a special order?

Mr. REAGAN. I will ask that it be made the special order for the first Tuesday after the holiday recess.

Mr. HOLMAN. Subject to the consideration of the appropriation bills?

Mr. REAGAN. O, certainly.

There was no objection, and the bill was made the special order for the first Tuesday after the recess.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Is it understood that this bill is made the special order for one day only?

The SPEAKER. That is the understanding of the Chair.

ENTRY OF GOODS.

Mr. REAGAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3687) to amend section 3117 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relative to entry of goods taken or delivered at intermediate ports.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 3117 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3117. If any vessel so enrolled or licensed shall touch or enter at any intermediate port in the United States, and there discharge cargo taken on board at an American port, or at such intermediate ports shall take on board cargo destined for an American port, the master of such vessel shall, before leaving, report to the collector such arrival, and produce his manifest; and it shall be the duty of the collector to indorse thereon, certified by himself, a description of the cargo so taken on board or unladen, and return the same to the master, which he shall deliver to the collector of the port at which the unlading of the cargo is completed, within twenty-four hours after arrival, which manifest shall be placed on file in the office of the collector."

Mr. REAGAN. I ask that that bill be put upon its passage now.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Texas will explain the effect of this bill upon the present law?

Mr. REAGAN. I yield for that purpose to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. BRADLEY,] who originally introduced the bill.

Mr. BRADLEY. This bill seeks to amend the section of the Revised Statutes designated, and the object to be accomplished is this: Under the present law a vessel clearing from a port in any district within the United States for a port in another district, is permitted to stop at intermediate ports and discharge or take in cargo. When arriving at the other destination the cargo there discharged is reported as having been received at the port of clearance, and the injustice wrought by this plan, gentlemen will notice, is this: The vessel receiving the cargo at intermediate ports having cleared from the original port of clearance on its arrival is credited to the port from which it clears, and no report being required at intermediate ports.

To illustrate, I will take my own district and my own town to explain the difficulty. Bay City is an intermediate port on the northwestern lakes between Buffalo and Chicago. It is common for vessels to clear from Buffalo for Chicago. They run into Bay City, take on cargo, proceed to Chicago and report. The report is entered setting forth that the vessels received the cargo at Buffalo.

Now, when we go to the reports at the custom-house for the purpose of ascertaining the business of a port, we find that Buffalo is credited with two-thirds of the business of Bay City, and hence an injustice is done. When the merits of a town or a port are considered in matters of legislation as well as other matters important in regard to its business, it does not receive the credit to which it is entitled. This bill seeks simply to provide that whenever a vessel enters an intermediate port and receives cargo it shall so report, and the records of the custom-house shall show when and where any portion of the cargo is received or discharged. That is all the change proposed by this bill.

Mr. REAGAN. The section of the Revised Statutes intended to be amended now reads as follows:

If any vessel so enrolled or licensed shall touch at any intermediate port in the United States, and there discharge cargo taken on board at an American port, or at such intermediate ports shall take on board cargo destined for an American port, the master of such vessel shall not be required to report such lading or unlading at such intermediate ports, but shall enter the same on his manifest obtained at the original port of departure, which he shall deliver to the collector of the port at which the unlading of the cargo is completed, within twenty-four hours after arrival, and shall subscribe and make oath as to the truth and correctness of the same.

It will be observed that the section as it now stands provides that the port from which a vessel clears shall be credited with whatever of commerce is carried from one of the intermediate ports to some other port to which the vessel may be destined. The object of the amendment is to so change the section as that each port from which articles are exported to another port may be credited with those exports. It seems that there is so manifest justice in the request for the change of this section that it is hardly necessary for me to make any further explanation. I will therefore call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. REAGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STEAMSHIP WHIRLWIND.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4116) to change the name of the steamship Whirlwind to that of Arcadia; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. CONGER. I would like to have some gentleman of the Committee on Commerce state what this ship is, in what district it is owned, and what occasion there is for changing the name.

Mr. PIERCE. I will say to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] that this is a first-class vessel. The name of Whirlwind is objectionable; people do not like to go to sea in a whirlwind, [laughter,] and the owners desire to change the name. The inspectors of the board of underwriters of Boston are most reliable and careful men, and they certify fully as to the seaworthiness of this vessel in every respect.

Mr. CONGER. Is it a passenger boat?

Mr. PIERCE. It is.

Mr. CONGER. A steamboat?

Mr. PIERCE. It is. If the gentleman will examine the papers he will find that it is a vessel of the first class.

Mr. CONGER. Where does she run?

Mr. PIERCE. Between Boston and the British provinces.

Mr. CONGER. The old custom of allowing the Secretary of the Treasury to change the names of vessels led to some of the most serious disasters that have ever been known upon our waters. The name of an old vessel would be changed and a new name given to it, a new coat of paint and putty put upon it, and the public would think it was a new vessel and a safe vessel. Gentlemen will recollect that in one year there were hundreds of lives lost in old vessels because the public were deceived by the new names given to those vessels.

In view of that, Congress took away the power of the Government or of any of its Departments to change the names of passenger-carrying vessels, or, as a friend near me suggests, putting new wine into old bottles. The evils of changing the names of old vessels were very great and serious. From that time to this even Congress has refused to change the names of more than four or five passenger-vessels, so far as I recollect. It is bad as a precedent; and, in my judgment, there should be some strong reason why Congress even should exercise a power which has been so disastrous in its results when exercised by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. PIERCE. I ask for the reading of the certificate of the inspectors of the board of underwriters, so that the gentleman may see that this is a sound and first-class vessel.

The Clerk read as follows:

MARINE INSPECTION OFFICE,
Boston, Massachusetts, May 20, 1876.

We, the undersigned, having examined the steamship Whirlwind for the purpose of rating and placing her upon the books in this office as a record of her condition and seaworthiness, and in our opinion she is now in a good seaworthy condition for carrying both cargo and passengers.

EBR. DAVIS,
[SEAL.] R. G F. CANDAGE,
Marine Inspectors for the Boston Board of Underwriters and Record of American Shipping and Foreign Shipping.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
Suffolk, ss:

BOSTON, May 22, 1876.

Then personally appeared the above-named Ebr. Davis and R. G. F. Candage and made oath that the foregoing certificate by them subscribed is true.

Before me.
[SEAL.] GEO. M. AMERIGE,
Notary Public.

Mr. CONGER. Will the gentleman inform the House what is the age of this vessel?

Mr. PIERCE. I ask that the memorial of Mr. Loring be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and Representatives in Congress of the United States:

The undersigned, a citizen of Boston, Massachusetts, respectfully petitions that the name of the steamship Whirlwind be changed to Arcadia.

Your petitioner, having recently bought the steamship, has rebuilt her, renewing the planking from the water line, masts, boilers, &c., and has thoroughly refitted her. The ship is built of the best material, of large size, and great strength for a vessel of her dimensions. She is sound and thoroughly fastened. The annexed certificates of the master carpenter and the marine inspectors of this city will be a sufficient guarantee of her strength and seaworthy condition. I ask for a change of name for the reason that the present name is prejudicial to the ship. The name Whirlwind carries with it in the imagination of almost everybody much that is dangerous and treacherous; it is neither euphonious nor agreeable, and is altogether too suggestive for a passenger-ship.

And your petitioner will ever pray, &c.

HARRISON LORING.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PIERCE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ERRONEOUS CREDITS IN POST-OFFICE ACCOUNTS.

Mr. WADDELL. The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads have directed me to report back the bill (H. R. No. 3713) to enable the Postmaster-General to place to the credit of the proper account any moneys erroneously deposited to the credit of the Post-Office Department. I move that this committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the bill be read.

Mr. WADDELL. It is an erroneous reference. We ask that the bill be referred to another committee.

Mr. CONGER. I am aware of that; but I want to see what it is proposed to refer to another committee.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That, to enable the Postmaster-General to place to the credit of the proper account any moneys erroneously deposited to the credit of the Post-Office Department and covered into the Treasury, such a sum as may be necessary be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of the revenues of the Post-Office Department; and, for the purpose herein expressed, this appropriation shall be deemed and held to be a permanent annual appropriation.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman whether this bill refers to moneys paid in by postmasters in the Southern States prior to and during the rebellion.

Mr. WADDELL. I do not remember the points involved in the bill. I was instructed by the committee, toward the close of last session, to ask the reference of the bill to another committee; and I am now simply discharging that duty.

I am at this moment informed by the chairman of the committee [Mr. CLARK, of Missouri] that the bill does not relate to the matter which the gentleman mentions. At any rate, it makes no difference about the contents of the bill; it was referred to us by mistake.

The motion of Mr. WADDELL was then agreed to; and the bill was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

JOHN WIGHTMAN.

Mr. WADDELL, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 3259) for the relief of John Wightman, a contractor for carrying the mail in Pennsylvania, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

ADVERSE REPORTS ON DEPREDATION CLAIMS.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported adversely upon the following claims; which were laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

Claim of Anastacio Cordoba for $375 on account of depredations by Cheyenne Indians;

Claim of Hall Brothers for $995 on account of depredations by the Araphoe Indians;

Claim of Thomas Gurule for $507.50 on account of depredations by Navajo Indians;

Claim of Miguel Gonzales for $80 on account of depredations by Navajoe Indians;

Claim of José Telles for $55 on account of depredations by Gila-Apache Indians; and Claim of José Y. Garcia for $70 on account of depredations by Gila-Apache Indians.

COLONEL FRANK L. WOOLFORD.

Mr. MACDOUGALL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4117) for the relief of Colonel Frank L. Woolford, late of the First Kentucky Cavalry Volunteers, of certain disabilities; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that Colonel Woolford be relieved from all penalties and effects of General Order No. 117, dated Washington, March 24, 1864, and signed "E. D. Townsend, Assistant Adjutant-General," dishonorably dismissing Woolford from the service of the United States; that he be restored to all the rights and privileges to which he would have been entitled had said order not been issued and enforced. But nothing in the bill is to entitle him to any additional pay or allowances.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACDOUGALL] will make a brief statement of the facts upon which this bill is based.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] to make a statement, as this is a matter coming from his State.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Speaker, this bill is for the relief of Colonel Frank L. Woolford, late of the First Kentucky Cavalry. He enlisted in the Union Army early; raised a regiment; and I think I can truthfully say that he did more fighting than almost any other colonel or general in the Federal Army. About the year 1864 it seems he displeased the President of the United States by some speech he had made at Lexington, Kentucky. After that speech he was dismissed the service. Colonel Woolford was badly wounded while in the Union service and is now gradually dying of his wounds. I have talked to the Adjutant-General of the United States, and he has consented to the removal of these disabilities if it is the pleasure of Congress to do so. My object in introducing the bill on the petition of a large number of citizens in Colonel Woolford's own county, irrespective of party, asking these disabilities be removed, is that he may be able to apply for the pension to which he is justly entitled. That is the whole case.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MACDOUGALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. FAULKNER. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to move that House bill 2245, to carry into execution the provisions of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution concerning citizenship, and to define the rights of citizens of the United States in foreign countries and certain duties in diplomatic and consular offices, be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules this cannot be received, as not being in order.

Mr. FAULKNER. It is a report from a committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that it is not in order during the morning hour, and there are other reasons why it is not in order at any other time during the day. The report cannot be received at this time.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was received by his Private Secretary, Mr. U. S. GRANT, jr.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. DURHAM, from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 2991) to repeal section 4716 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and moved its reference to the Committee on Invalid Pensions; which motion was agreed to.

OMISSIONS IN REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. ROBINSON, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 2825) to correct errors and supply omissions in the Revised Statutes of the United States, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was read, as follows:

That for the purpose of correcting errors and supplying omissions in the act entitled "An act to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States, general and permanent in their nature, relating to the District of Columbia, in force on the 1st day of December, in the year of our Lord 1873," so as to make the same truly express such laws, the following amendments are made therein:

Section 192 is amended by inserting after the word "the," in the second line, the word "Union."

Section 195 is amended by inserting after the word "ten," in the second line from the last, "Revised Statutes of the United States."

Section 309 is amended by striking out the words "three hundred and three," and inserting "three hundred and six."

Section 312 is amended by striking out the words "three hundred and three," and inserting "three hundred and six."

Section 322 is amended by inserting after the words "United States," in the second line, the words "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

Section 445 is amended by striking out the word "two" at the end of the section, and inserting "three."

Section 467 is amended by inserting after the word "President" the words "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

Section 476 is amended by inserting after the word "section," at the end of the first line, the words "four hundred and thirty-nine."

Section 618 is amended by striking out the word "clerks," in the first line of the third paragraph.

Section 717 is amended by inserting after the words "Revised Statutes" the words "of the United States."

Section 764 is amended by inserting after the words "Revised Statutes," in the last line, the words "of the United States."

Section 765 is amended by inserting after the words "Revised Statutes," in the third line, the words "of the United States."

Section 780 is amended by inserting after the words "Revised Statutes," in the line next to the last, the words "of the United States."

Section 811 is amended by inserting after the words "indebted to," in the second line, the words "the defendant in."

Section 841 is amended by adding after the word "section," in the third line, the letter "s," so as to read "sections;" and after the words "one hundred and four," in the same line, add the words "one hundred and seven and one hundred and eight," and at the end of the section add the words "and bribery at elections."

Section 843 is amended by inserting after the words "Revised Statutes," in the eighth line, the words "of the United States."

Section 847 is amended by striking out in the last line the words "in the following section," and inserting the words "otherwise by law."

Section 873 is amended by inserting after the words "the circuit," in the second line, the words "and district;" in the same line by striking out the word "District" and all the remainder of the section, and inserting the words "of the United States by the act of February 26, 1853."

Section 897 is amended by inserting after the words "Revised Statutes," in the last line, the words "of the United States."

Section 1193 is amended by inserting after the words "Revised Statutes," in the fourth line, the words "of the United States."

Section 1283 is amended by striking out the word "eight," in the fourth line, and inserting the word "nine."

Section 1288 is amended by inserting after the words "Revised Statutes," in the second line, the words "of the United States."

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman reporting the bill will explain its effect.

Mr. ROBINSON. The bill does not supply any substantial omissions in the statutes, but merely corrects clerical errors in the revision of the laws in 1873. There is no new legislation in the bill, no alteration of any former statutes. It is reported from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws with the unanimous sanction of that committee.

Mr. CONGER. As this relates to a bill of the District of Columbia, and not to our general laws, I perhaps ought not to make the objection to it which I should in the other case. I think the amendment of any general law without reciting the law as amended is very dangerous. It is within my recollection that the change of a numeral in a section effected a very great and very disastrous change in our customs laws. I do not now oppose the passage of this bill on that ground because it is an amendment of a local bill, but I do call the attention of the committee in any revision of the laws to the propriety of reciting the amended section entire in the bill, for the use of the public and for the use of members of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. The objection mentioned by the gentleman from Michigan, and which my colleague will undoubtedly fully appreciate, is so grave a one that, unless there is some pressing public necessity, I hope my colleague will consent to the recommittal of the bill to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. Except in rare instances, this legislation has never been allowed in the course of late years. In the State of Indiana, and in almost all the States of the West, a constitutional provision has been adopted against this form of legislation, as my colleague is aware. Therefore I ask him to allow the bill to be recommitted, with the view of making the sections full and complete, instead of merely referring to the errors of the sections in the statute which it is proposed to correct by their number.

Mr. ROBINSON. This whole question was considered by the Committee on the Revision of the Laws.

Mr. HOLMAN. The morning hour has expired, and I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour having expired, the bill goes over to the morning hour to-morrow.

MESSENGER.

Mr. KNOTT, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee of Accounts:

Resolved, That one messenger be added to the list of messengers under the Doorkeeper of the House, to be assigned to duty to the room of the official reporters of debates, which is now unattended to.

PRINTING OF THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. CONGER, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That 20,000 copies of the President's message, with the accompanying documents, be printed.

REMOVAL OF SIOUX INDIANS.

Mr. FRANKLIN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire if any Department of the Government of the United States is attempting to procure the removal of the Sioux Indians from their reservation, as granted to them by treaty stipulations, to the Indian Territory; and, if so, by what authority of law such removal is contemplated, and the probable cost thereof, and whether said removal can be made without violating solemn treaty stipulations heretofore made with the civilized tribes inhabiting the Indian Territory, unless the said civilized tribes consent and agree to said removal.

SURETIES OF JESSE J. SIMPKINS.

Mr. GOODE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4118) for the relief of the sureties of the late Jesse J. Simpkins, collector of the port of Norfolk, Virginia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

BARBARA MILLER ET AL.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4119) for the relief of Barbara Miller, John S. Miller, and William H. Miller; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

ARTIFICIAL LIMBS FOR SOLDIERS.

Mr. SAMPSON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read and referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Whereas complaints have been made by disabled soldiers entitled to commutation for artificial limbs that the appropriation therefor was exhausted shortly after the adjournment of the last session of Congress, and they are therefore unable to obtain the allowances to which they are justly entitled under the law: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be instructed to inquire into the fact whether such appropriation has been exhausted, and, if so, to report at once the necessary bill to supply said deficiency.

FLORIDA COMMITTEE.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask to be excused from service on the committee appointed to investigate the recent election in the State of Florida.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the gentleman from Ohio is excused, and the Chair appoints in his place Mr. WILLIAM WOODBURN, of Nevada.

VOTE FOR ELECTORS IN LOUISIANA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I have the honor to transmit herewith a letter (accompanied by testimony) addressed to me by Hon. JOHN SHERMAN and other distinguished citizens in regard to the canvass of the vote for electors in the State of Louisiana.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, D. C., December 6, 1876.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the message of the President be referred to the special committee on Louisiana affairs.

Mr. HURLBET. There is no such committee.

Mr. SPRINGER. I mean the committee to investigate the recent election in the State of Louisiana.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the document accompanying the message be read.

The SPEAKER. That is the gentleman's right.

Mr. SPRINGER. The message of the President has been read; and I submit that the gentleman from Michigan has no right to call for the reading of the accompanying documents.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Michigan is entitled to have the accompanying documents read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Before entertaining the motion to adjourn, the Chair will lay before the House certain communications.

REPORT OF THE DISTRICT ENGINEER.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the engineer of the District of Columbia, transmitting, in compliance with a recommendation from the commissioners, a report of the operations of his office for the year ending November 30, 1876; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

REPORT OF THE TREASURER OF THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Treasurer of the United States, transmitting, in compliance with section 3111 of the Revised Statutes, his quarterly accounts for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1876, and also his annual report to the Secretary of the Treasury; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 648) for the relief of Andrew J. Barrett;

An act (H. R. No. 1075) directing the Second Auditor to settle the pay and bounty account of John Ammahaie or Ammahe;

An act (H. R. No. 1503) for the relief of Sarah F. Albertson, of Booneville, Missouri; and

An act (H. R. No. 1581) for the relief of John Gowers, late of Company C, One hundred and eleventh Regiment New York Volunteers.

VOTE FOR ELECTORS IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. CONGER. Instead of insisting that the document accompanying the President's message be read, I shall be satisfied if authority be given to print it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object to its being printed.

Mr. HOAR. Does the gentleman want to suppress the information communicated in the President's message and to prevent it from going to the country?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Gentlemen must see——

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Let me say just one word. Gentlemen must see that this will come up in the morning as unfinished business——

Mr. SPRINGER. That is what we want.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. And must be read or ordered to be printed before it is disposed of. It may as well be disposed of now.

Mr. HOLMAN. I insist on my motion that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HOAR. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 109, nays 132, not voting 49; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Atkins, John H. Bagley, jr., Beebe, Bell, Blackburn, Bland, Bliss, Boone, Bradford, John Young Brown, Buckner, Samuel D. Burchard, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. Caldwell, Candler, Carr, Cate, Chapin, John B. Clark, jr., of Missouri, Clymer, Cochrane, Collins, Cook, Cowan, Culberson, Davis, Dibrell, Durand, Durham, Eden, Egbert, Ellis, Felton, Finley, Forney, Franklin, Fuller, Gause, Gibson, Glover, Goode, Goodin, Gunter, Robert Hamilton, Hardenbergh, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hartridge, Hatcher, Goldsmith W. Hewitt, Hooker, Hopkins, Humphreys, Hunton, Hurd, Frank Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Kehr, Knott, Lamar, Franklin Landers, George M. Landers, Levy, Lynde, Maish, McFarland, Metcalfe, Milliken, Mills, Money, Morgan, Mutchler, Neal, Odell, Payne, Piper, Poppleton, Powell, Reagan, Rice, Riddle, John Robbins, Roberts, Scales, Schleicher, Sheakley, Slemons, Southard, Sparks, Spencer, Stanton, Swann, Tarbox, Teese, Terry, Thompson, Tucker, Turney, John L. Vance, Robert B. Vance, Charles C. B. Walker, Alpheus S. Williams, Jeremiah N. Williams, Willis, Wilshire, Yeates, and Young—109.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Ashe, Bagby, George A. Bagley, John H. Baker, William H. Baker, Ballou, Banks, Banning Blair, Blount, Bradley, William R. Brown, Horatio C. Burchard, Burleigh, Campbell, Cannon, Cason, Caswell, Caulfield, Chittenden, Conger, Crapo, Crounse, Cutler, Danford, Darrall, Davy, De Bolt, Denison, Dobbins, Dunnell, Eames, Ely, Evans, Faulkner, Flye, Fort, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Hale, Andrew H. Hamilton, Hancock, Haralson, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Hartzell, Hathorn, Haymond, Henderson, Hereford, Abram S. Hewitt, Hoar, Hoskins, House, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyman, Jenks, Joyce, Kasson, Kimball, King, Lawrence, Leavenworth, Le Moyne, Luttrell, Mackey, Magoon, MacDougall, Miller, Monroe, Morrison, Nash, Norton, O'Brien, Oliver, O'Neill, Packer, Page, Phelps, John F. Philips, William A. Phillips, Pierce, Plaisted, Platt, Potter, Pratt, Rea, John Reilly, James B. Reilly, William M. Robbins, Robinson, Rusk, Sampson, Savage, Seelye, A. Herr Smith, Springer, Strait, Stenger, Stevenson, Stone, Martin I. Townsend, Washington Townsend, Tufts, Van Vorhes, Waddell, Wait, Waldron, Alexander S. Wallace, John W. Wallace, Walling, Warner, Warren, Watterson, Erastus Wells, White, Willard, Andrew Williams, Charles G. Williams, James Williams, William B. Williams, Benjamin Wilson, James Wilson, Alan Wood, jr., Fernando Wood, Woodburn, and Woodworth—132.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ainsworth, Bass, Bright, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, Cox, Douglas, Hays, Hendee, Henkle, Hill, Hoge, Holman, Hubbell, Kelley, Lane, Lapham, Lewis, Lord, Lynch, McCrary, McDill, McMahon, Meade, New, Purman, Rainey, Miles Ross, Sobieski Ross, Sayler, Schumaker, Singleton, Sinnickson, Smalls, William E. Smith, Stephens, Stowell, Thomas, Thornburgh, Throckmorton, Gilbert C. Walker, Walsh, Ward, G. Wiley Wells, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Whiting, Whitthorne, Wigginton, and Wike—49.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. CONGER. I now renew my call for the reading of the documents accompanying the President's message.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to make a statement to the House.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. There was so much confusion while the message from the President was being read that I would like the Chair to state distinctly how the proposition stands before the House at this moment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will do so when the House comes to order. The Chair desires to state that the message proper was read, and a motion was made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to refer it to a select committee; whereupon the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] demanded the reading of the accompanying papers. The attention of the Chair has been directed to Rule 141, which is as follows:

141. When the reading of a paper is called for and the same is objected to by any member, it shall be determined by a vote of the House.

That rule was adopted on the 13th of November, 1794, and the note to it states that—

As originally adopted, this rule contained, after the word "for," the words "which had before been read to the House." They were stricken out on the 14th December, 1795.

The Chair desires to read further on page 193 of the Manual:

"Where papers are laid before the House or referred to a committee, every member has a right to have them once read at the table before he can be compelled to vote on them"—Manual, page 97—and this applies to the reading of papers on a motion to refer them.—Journal, 1, 34, page 1146. And so in regard to any proposition submitted for a vote of the House; but it being a right derived from the rules, he may at any time (when a motion to suspend the rules is in order) be deprived of it by a suspension of the rules.

A motion to suspend the rules is not now in order
The Chair will read further:

The rule above recited is not construed to apply to the single reading of a paper or proposition upon which the House may be called upon to give a vote, or to the several regular readings of a bill, but to cases where a paper has been once read or a bill has received its regular reading and another is called for, and also where a member desires the reading of a paper having relation to the subject before the House.

Mr. HURLBUT. The Chair omitted one paragraph.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had previously read that rule. The Chair decides that this case comes within the latitude of that rule. And it is a necessary step toward correct legislation that all such papers shall be read; and so deciding, the paper will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the President of the United States:

In pursuance of your request that several of the undersigned should proceed to New Orleans, and there witness the canvass by the returning board of the State of Louisiana of the votes cast in that State for electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, we have performed that duty and now most respectfully report:

That on our arrival in that city we found several gentlemen from other States who had proceeded there at the request of the chairman of the national democratic committee, and we also found there several gentlemen who came representing republican State organizations, who have throughout co-operated with those who went at your request, and whose names are also appended to this communication.

Between the gentlemen representing the democratic party and ourselves a correspondence in writing ensued, a copy of which is appended hereto. Reference to it will disclose that a conference with us for the purpose of exercising an influence upon the returning board was declined upon the ground that the only duty devolved upon us was to attend before the board, carefully note its proceedings, and finally to report a faithful history thereof, with such opinions concerning the same as truth and justice should demand. Such report we are now able to present, and we take pleasure in stating that our ability so to do is due to the exercise of a courtesy and kindness by the returning board which entitle its members not only to our thanks, but to that confidence which a just public extends toward every tribunal which desires that all its proceedings should be daily presented to public scrutiny.

It was our earnest wish that this publicity should be attained, but we should have felt a delicacy in requesting any privilege not in harmony with the usage of the board. We were, however, relieved from all embarrassment by the receipt of its formal invitation hereto annexed, delivered to us and to the gentlemen who attended at the request of the chairman of the democratic committees, inviting the attendance of five gentlemen from each delegation as spectators and witnesses of the proceedings of the board; and this invitation was accompanied with an offer to permit stenographic reporters, selected by each committee, to be present and make a full report of all proceedings and testimony; and to secure daily publication thereof by the press, the undersigned made arrangements for that purpose with the proprietors of one of the daily newspapers printed in New Orleans, and thus the papers there and elsewhere have been enabled to give such proceedings and testimony the widest circulation. In justice to the board, it should be stated that this privilege was freely accorded by its members without solicitation, and that they cordially united with us in the desire to have all their proceedings published throughout the country.

The scrutiny invited by the board has been constantly exercised. Day by day both committees have been in attendance before the board with their stenographic reporters; and, in addition, a privilege tendered to both the committees of inviting gentlemen from States other than Louisiana has been several times availed of. As returns were opened, whether contested or not, the papers inclosed have been freely tendered to the committees for examination, and have usually been carefully inspected, and, as a means of detecting any possible changes in the returns after leaving their respective parishes, both committees were furnished by the respective parties with statements of the vote as claimed by them respectively, that by comparison it might be known if any alteration had been made in returns to be passed upon by the board, with which statement the returns usually agreed. Whenever it was known to the board that a return was to be contested, the attorneys for the candidates interested were sent for, to be present at the ceremony of opening, and, when such knowledge was attainable only by inspection of the inside of the package containing such return, these attorneys were invited to be present before any action was taken upon it.

There were thus secured in the manner mentioned publicity of all the proceedings of the board, the most careful scrutiny of every package of returns by it opened, and an opportunity for candidates insisting upon the validity of returns to appear personally and by counsel before the board, in many instances before returns were opened and in every instance before action was taken upon them.

It has been we believe quite unusual to give such full and wide-spread publicity to the proceedings of a returning board, nor do we think that better means for permanently recording every word and act of its members, while engaged in the discharge of their duties, could have been afforded, than we enjoyed.

Having thus presented a statement of the means accorded of witnessing the canvass, it may be well to state briefly the causes which led to the creation of such a board in Louisiana and to call attention to the statute which devolves upon it powers and duties of great public importance.

The white people of that and other southern States had, by their rebellion, forfeited all right to representation in Congress or to any participation in the government of the Union, and had been compelled, as a condition of resuming their former political rights, to assent to the constitutional amendments by which, in hostility to their will, those who had been but lately their slaves were made citizens; and although it was their duty to submit to this political re-organization the annals of the South, and especially of Louisiana, disclose a wide-spread and persistent determination of its ruling white people to prevent the exercise of the elective franchise by the colored race except subject to their will. This was manifested by the violence, outrages, and murders perpetrated in that State just preceding the presidential election of 1868. They will be found stated in various congressional reports. From these it appears that over two thousand persons were killed, wounded, and otherwise injured in that State within a few weeks of the presidential election of that year; that half the State was overrun by violence, midnight raids, secret murders, and open riots, which kept the people in constant terror, until the republicans surrendered all claims, and then the election was carried by the democracy.

The parish of Orleans, which contained 29,910 voters—15,020 of which were colored, and which in the spring had given 13,973 republican votes, in the fall cast for General Grant but 1,178, a falling off of 12,795 votes Riots prevailed for weeks, filling New Orleans with scenes of blood, and Ku Klux notices were scattered throughout the city warning the colored men not to vote. In the parish of Caddo there were 2,987 republicans who in the spring of 1868 carried the parish, which in the fall gave to General Grant but one vote, and there also bloody riots occurred.

In the parish of Saint Landry the republicans had a registered majority of 1,071 votes, and in the spring of that year carried it by 678 votes, while in the fall not a vote was cast for General Grant, while for Seymour and Blair the democrats cast the full vote of the parish, 4,787 votes; and there occurred one of the bloodiest riots on record, in which the Ku Klux killed and wounded over two hundred republicans, hunting and chasing them for two days and nights, through fields and swamps. Thirteen captives were taken from the jail and shot, and a pile of twenty-five dead bodies was found buried in the woods. Having thus conquered the republicans, and killed and driven off their white leaders, the masses were captured by the Ku Klux, marked with badges of red flannel, enrolled in clubs, led to the polls, and compelled to vote the democratic ticket, after which they were given certificates of that fact.

These are some of the outrages which marked the pathway to political supremacy of those who but a few years before had obtained the mercy of a Government under whose laws the black republican and the white democrat were entitled to equal protection. It was but natural and just that the colored race should unite with and cling to the party to whose principles they owed freedom and protection; and this seems to have marked their political course from the time they were given the elective franchise, and their history in Louisiana has but illustrated this whenever they have been left free to vote as they pleased. Until a radical change could be effected in the nature and purposes of those who had been their owners, and who repudiated the idea of being placed upon terms of civil equality with them, it was evident that a fair election could not be held in parishes containing any considerable majority of colored voters, and hence the act of 1870, acquiesced in by both political parties and amended in 1872, was passed, creating a returning board, authorized to sit in New Orleans, having supreme authority to canvass the votes cast throughout the entire State, and authorized, if convinced that riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences had prevented voters from registering, or had materially interfered with the purity or freedom of election at any poll or voting place, or had materially changed the result of the election, to exclude votes cast at such polls or voting places from the final count.

This law with some amendments, not materially changing its nature, is that under which the present returning board of Louisiana is now organized and sits. That some such independent tribunal was necessary for the protection of the legal voter, and as a check upon the violence and intimidation which had before prevailed throughout the State, no one can deny. It will be seen, when the statute organizing this board and defining its duties is examined, how inadequate are its provisions to afford full relief against the wrongs it was designed to prevent. Thus the powers of the board are limited to the rejection of votes polled for the causes stated, while it cannot, in any case, add to returns votes which would have been polled but for the intimidation, violence, &c., mentioned. To illustrate, the undersigned will refer to the five parishes of East and West Feliciana, East Batou Rouge, Morehouse, and Ouachita, which appear, as the evidence discloses, to have been especially selected for the perpetuation of such violence and intimidation as should be necessary to prevent the republicans from casting any considerable vote in either. In each and all of these there is a large republican majority. In all of them the white voters registered for this year numbered 5,134; the colored, 13,244; a majority of 8,110. If by intimidation and violence the democrats could secure in each of these parishes a majority, an immense gain would be thus achieved; for if the board should upon the canvass reject the vote of all, it would be powerless to administer that complete justice which would consist only in declaring for the republicans such a majority in each parish as but for the intimidation and violence would have been cast for their candidates. The law, therefore, in this provides but a partial and inadequate remedy for the grave wrongs from which the colored people and white republicans of Louisiana have long suffered; and when the proof taken by the board is examined and weighed it will be found, we believe, that the returns by it excluded for the causes mentioned are generally from polling-places which, but for intimidation, violence, outrage, and murder would have given republican majorities, thereby greatly increasing that declared by the board. In considering its powers and duties this important feature of the law should be borne constantly in mind, for while that tribunal may upon proof and in the exercise of judicial discretion reject votes for the causes mentioned, it cannot upon so doing return any not actually cast.

It will therefore readily occur to any one that a careful selection by political managers of certain parishes known to have large republican majorities for scenes of intimidation and violence in the belief that other parishes within the State would enable them to carry it for their party, even should their majorities in parishes thus selected be rejected, might well be a favorite method for achieving success; and as we proceed it will be apparent that such was the mode adopted to carry Louisiana for the democratic party.

While from the very nature of the mischief to be remedied the law could but partially repair it, the statute under which the board acts is so framed as to prohibit the rejection of votes cast at any poll or voting-place unless certain solemn formalities are first complied with, which must be supplemented by the testimony of witnesses.

The statute organizing the board declares in substance that whenever from any poll or voting-place there shall be received by the board the statement of any supervisor of registration or commissioner of election, confirmed by the affidavits of three or more citizens, of any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences, which prevent, or tend to prevent, a fair, free, and peaceable vote of all qualified electors entitled to vote at such polls, the board shall proceed to investigate the facts, and if, from such statement and affidavits, they shall be convinced that such causes did not materially interfere with the purity and freedom of such election or prevent a sufficient number of qualified voters from voting to materially change the result of the election, then such vote shall be canvassed and compiled; but if they are not thus fully convinced, it shall be their duty to examine further testimony in regard thereto, and to that end shall have power to send for persons and papers. And if, after examination, the board shall be convinced that such acts of violence, intimidation, &c., did materially interfere with the purity and freedom of the election at such poll or did prevent a sufficient number of qualified electors from registering or voting to materially change the result of the election, then the board shall not canvass or compile the vote of such poll, but shall exclude it from their returns.

Nothing can be more simple, nothing more just than these provisions. They are, for the reason before stated, inadequate to secure the administration of a complete remedy, for it may be fairly said that, if by reason of violence and intimidation committed in the interest of one political party the adherents of another are restrained from voting through fear, an equitable remedy, if practicable, for the outrage would be to count in favor of the injured every vote thus lost. The ascertainment of this being however different, the statute of Louisiana has provided only for the rejection of votes; and it is worthy of remark that the most flagrant cases submitted to the board have, as proven, occurred in parishes where the republican registered vote, which would undoubtedly have been cast but for the intimidation and violence, largely exceeded the registered vote of the democratic party.

We have thus alluded to some of the causes which led to the creation of this board, and have also called attention to its duties, and to the proof upon which it is authorized to act. It is a tribunal established by the laws of Louisiana, entirely independent of the laws of any other State, or of the United States. It is empowered, among other things, to canvass and finally determine the number of votes legally cast for electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, but in the discharge of that duty it acts exclusively under authority of the laws of that State—the Constitution of the United States having declared that "each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress."

Not only is the action of this board independent of State or national laws, other than those of Louisiana, but its determination as to the votes cast and candidates elected is final and substantially conclusive, as appears from a decision of the supreme court of that State, reported in the twenty-fifth volume of the Louisiana Annual Reports, where the court, at page 268, say:

"No statute conferring upon the courts the power to try cases of contested elections or title to office authorizes them to revise the action of the returning board. If we were to assume that prerogative we should have to go still further and revise the returns of supervisors of elections, examine the right of voters to vote, and in short the courts would become in regard to such cases mere officers for counting, compiling, and reporting election returns. The Legislature has seen proper to lodge the power to decide who has or has not been elected in the returning board.

"It might have conferred that power on the courts, but it did not. Whether the law be good or bad it is our duty to obey its provisions, and not to legislate."

It became our duty immediately on arriving in New Orleans to thoroughly understand the constitution, powers, and duties of this board and to examine with care the statutes under which it was bound to act; and enough has been written to show that a tribunal charged with such duties and invested with such powers, the members of which were originally appointed by the senate, is entitled to the respect of all citizens until it shall be forfeited by a violation of its judicial or ministerial obligations. The great national importance of the duties to be performed by the board invested each member with much interest, and as many reports had been circulated concerning them, we were led to make some inquiry as to their individual history. Two of them, Hon. James Madison Wells, president of the board and General Thomas C. Anderson, next senior member, are southern-born, and of old and highly respectable families. The father of the former was Hon. Levi Wells, of the parish of Rapides, who in 1812 represented it in the convention called to frame the constitution of the State of Louisiana. The son received a liberal education and was early engaged in the care of the planting and other interests of his father. He was a Union man from the time the war broke out, and although he suffered greatly by it in the loss of property, he never faltered in his devotion to the Union cause. Under the Banks reconstruction scheme he was chosen lieutenant-governor on the ticket with Hon. Michael Hahn, who was elected governor, and upon the election of the latter to the Senate, a year after, Mr. Wells became governor of the State, to which office he was almost unanimously re-elected under the reconstruction plan of President Johnson. His experience in public life has been great and varied, and his capacity to discharge the duties assumed cannot be questioned. General Anderson was born in Virginia; has resided in the parish of Saint Landry for the period of some forty years; is a cousin of the General Anderson who commanded Fort Sumter at the outbreak of the war; was educated a lawyer; is the owner of and carries on several plantations; is widely known and highly respected throughout the State; has been intimately associated in the promotion of the social and industrial interests of his parish, and has represented it in both branches of the Legislature more than twenty years.

Mr. Casnave, the third member of the board, is a man of intelligence, of excellent character and business habits, not dependent on office for a livelihood, not seeking it, but a well-educated citizen who has long conducted a prosperous and respectable business in the city of New Orleans.

Mr. Kenner, the junior member of the board, is a young man born and reared in the city of New Orleans, intelligent and active, who was for some time in charge of the street commissioner's bureau in the department of improvements.

We will now present such an outline of the proofs as disclose not only such violence and intimidation as prevented a fair election in several parishes and at many polls, but disclose also that these grave offenses were committed in pursuance of a preconcerted and settled plan, formed by democratic leaders to prevent republican voters from attending the polls; and that such unlawful purpose was so effectually accomplished as not only to interfere with the purity and freedom of the election, but materially to change its result.

To illustrate how carefully the political campaign was considered, and the plan mentioned, contrived by the leaders of the democratic party, it is instructive to refer to a circular issued from the rooms of the democratic conservative State central committee at New Orleans, marked "confidential," and signed by I. W. Patton, president, and P. J. Sullivan, secretary, intended for circulation in each parish, and recommending the formation of ward clubs therein. These circulars urged that "in conversation no gloomy forebodings should be indulged in, and that the result of the election should be spoken of as a foregone conclusion, as we have the means of carrying the election and intend to do so. But be careful to say and do nothing that can be construed into a threat or intimidation of any character."

The circular also recommended that there should be frequent meetings of all the clubs to be formed, and that occasionally they form at their several places of meeting and proceed thence on horseback to the central rendezvous, stating that "proceedings of this character would impress the negroes with a sense of your united strength." And it further recommended that on the day of election at each polling place there should "be affidavits prepared to the effect that 'there has been no intimidation and no disturbance on account of any efforts by the democratic-conservative party to prevent any one from voting on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.'"

Thus carefully guided from the central democratic authority, by this secret and confidential circular, urged to impress upon the timid blacks by horseback processions a sense of the united strength of their former masters, and warned to prepare blank affidavits, in advance, that no terrorism had been exercised, the next and not the least important part of the scheme of these leaders was, to select the parishes, where, having "the means to carry the election and intending to use them," as stated in the circular, they could do so with most effect.

There were in the State of Louisiana on the day of election 92,996 white registered voters, and 115,310 colored—a majority of the latter of 22,314. It was well known that if left free to vote, uninfluenced by violence or intimidation, the blacks would be almost unanimously republican, and that with the white republican vote its majority would be about equal to that above indicated. The plan appears to have been to select for purposes of intimidation and violence as few parishes as possible (for in forty of fifty-seven parishes where these were not employed, the republican majority was 6,000,) but to select those in which the colored vote, as compared with the white, would be large unless unlawfully prevented, for in so doing it might be expected that should any majority they could thus obtain in such parishes be rejected, they would nevertheless attain their purpose by the suppression of a large republican vote.

In pursuance of this plan, five of the parishes selected, in which the greatest violence and intimidation were practiced, were East and West Feliciana, which border upon that portion of Mississippi in which murder and outrage so prevailed during and preceding the election as substantially to prevent any republican votes; East Baton Rouge, which borders upon the southern portion of East Feliciana; Morehouse, which adjoins the State of Arkansas, and Ouachita, which adjoins and lies directly south of Morehouse. The geographical position of these five parishes was well suited to the purposes to be attained; for it was easy for members of the clubs to be formed therein, and who usually perpetrated their outrages with masked faces, to pretend that they were committed by border ruffians from Mississippi and Arkansas, where like outrages had been perpetrated. The location of these five parishes was not, however, better suited to the plan to be accomplished than was the great disproportion existing therein between the number of white and colored voters. The former numbered but 5,134; the latter 13,244; a majority of the latter equal to more than one-third of the entire majority of colored voters in the fifty-seven parishes of the State.

The returns of the votes actually cast in these five parishes suggest that the clubs, to whom was assigned the task of securing democratic majorities therein, had performed their work of violence and intimidation effectually, while the proof discloses—brief summaries of portions of which are hereto annexed—that where violence and intimidation were inefficient, murder, maiming, mutilation, and whipping, were resorted to. Instead of a majority of six or seven thousand, which the republicans should have had in these parishes upon a fair election, there was actually returned to the returning board a democratic majority for the parishes of East and West Feliciana, Morehouse, and Ouachita of 3,878, and in East Feliciana, where the registered colored voters number 2,127, not a republican vote for electors was cast. In East Baton Rouge, containing 3,552 colored registered voters, and but 1,801 whites, the democrats claim a majority of 617, which, but for the rejection of several polls by the commissioners and supervisors of election, would have been returned to the returning board as votes actually cast.

If, to the democratic majority from the four parishes as above stated, we add the 617 thus claimed and insisted upon before the returning board, a democratic majority of 4,495 is the result of an election in five parishes containing 13,244 colored republican and but 5,134 white democratic voters.

The conclusion that intimidation and violence alone could have produced this is almost irresistible, and that such influences were employed, and were supplemented by murder, when that was thought necessary, is established by the proofs already referred to.

It but confirms this conclusion, to refer to the vote cast in these five parishes in 1874, when no special motives existed for the use of cruel means to influence the election. The republican majority therein was then 3,979.

A result so suggestive of violence and intimidation was obtained by means the most terrible and revolting. Organized clubs of masked, armed men, formed as recommended by the central democratic committee, rode through the country at night, marking their course by the whipping, shooting, wounding, maiming, mutilation, and murder of women, children, and defenseless men, whose houses were forcibly entered while they slept, and as their inmates fled through fear the pistol, the rifle, the knife, and the rope were employed to do their horrid work. Crimes like these, testified to by scores of witnesses, were the means employed in Louisiana to elect a President of the United States; and when they shall succeed, the glories of the Republic will have departed and shame and horror will supplant in the hearts of our people that love and veneration with which they have hitherto regarded the institutions of their country.

The proof of violence and intimidation and armed disturbance in many other parishes is of the same general character, although more general and decisive as to the five parishes particularly referred to. In others these causes prevailed at particular polling-places, at many of which a republican vote was to a considerable extent prevented.

We hope to be able to furnish full copies of all testimony taken by the board, that the justice of its conclusions may be appreciated. It is a tribunal from which there can be no appeal, and, in view of the possible consequences of its adjudication, we have closely observed its proceedings and have carefully weighed the force of a large mass of the testimony upon which that adjudication has been reached.

The members of the board, acting under oath, were bound by law, if convinced by the testimony that riot, tumult, acts of violence, or armed disturbance did materially interfere with the purity and freedom of the election at any pole or voting-place, or did materially change the result of the election thereat, to reject the votes thus cast and exclude them from their final return. Of the effect of such testimony the board was sole and final judge; and, if in reaching a conclusion it exercised good faith and was guided by an honest desire to do justice, its determination should be respected, even if upon like proof a different conclusion might have been reached by other tribunals or persons.

To guard the purity of the ballot, to protect the citizen in the free and peaceful exercise of his right to vote, to secure him against violence, intimidation, outrage, and especially murder when he attempts to perform this duty, should be the desire of all men and the aim of every representative government. If political success shall be attained by such violent and terrible means as were resorted to in many parishes of Louisiana, complaint should not be made if the votes thus obtained are denounced by judicial tribunals and all honest men as illegal and void.

Mr. SPRINGER obtained the floor and said: I yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD.]

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Mr. Speaker, if I could be surprised at anything occurring in this remarkable epoch in the history of our country, I would be surprised at this communication of the Executive. Conversant as I am from personal participation in the national legislation for a third of a century, this is to me a most extraordinary and unprecedented occurrence. The Constitution of the United States divides the powers and duties of our Government into three departments: the legislative, to make the laws; the judiciary, to construe the laws; and the executive simply to execute the laws. These divisions are well defined, positively expressed, and have never been questioned or doubted until now. But, sir, we live in a marvelous and most extraordinary time. The President of the United States, after nearly eight years of service, in which it is to be presumed he must have necessarily obtained a knowledge not only of the theory but of the practice of the Government and of his office, sees proper to send us a communication unauthorized in its nature, from persons clothed with no official authority, created by his own will, outside of any official duty or power, and not in pursuance of any act of Congress, and thus giving this unauthorized communication from unofficial and unauthorized persons his official sanction, and striving to make this House do likewise, by placing it on our records and sending it forth to the people of the country with congressional sanction. I hesitate to use the language which the gravity of such an attempt manifestly deserves. For the high office which the present Executive represents I have the most exalted opinion, but when from any cause or from any motive the incumbent of it fails to sustain in all respects its dignity and nature, I cannot withhold my condemnation.

It may be that the President finds a justification from a belief that Congress should be informed on all of the antecedent events attending the counting and declaring the election returns in the States of the Union for presidential electors. This is certainly implied from the character of the paper now sent to us. This is an admission on his part that this House is clothed with authority to institute a careful inquiry into the late election for President of the United States. In advance of the presentation of the certificates, in advance of the agitation of that grave question in Congress, in advance of any official action by the House of Representatives and the Senate as to the count of the votes of the electoral colleges, he tells us by this procedure that we are authorized to institute an inquiry as to the correctness and integrity of the certificates of election as they may be presented. Without offering an opinion as to our authority to do this, I am sure that those who believe that one or both Houses of Congress can do so will be glad to find that the President thus places himself so squarely on their side.

But, sir, the exception that I take is to the fact that he transmits here in this unauthorized way an unauthorized document of a merely partisan and ex parte character. My first impulse was to move that the House return this communication to the President. If I had followed the prompting of my heart when this document was presented to us, I should have made such a proposition. But, sir, I shall not do so. As the mildest rebuke I can give to this most atrocious attempt to mislead public opinion, I move that the communication and accompanying paper be laid on the table, and on that motion I call for the previous question. [Applause in the galleries.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that this communication be laid on the table, and on that motion he demands the previous question. Is there a second?

Mr. PAGE, Mr. HOAR, and others, rose. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] will state his question of order.

Mr. HOAR. I make the point that the gentleman from New York had not the floor for the purpose of making the motion stated.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] had the floor and yielded it to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] whom the Chair recognized in his own right.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, this side of the House desires a little time for debate in reply to the gentleman from New York. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BUCKNER. We will give you plenty of time for debate hereafter.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Is not the motion to lay on the table undebatable, and does it not preclude the necessity for the previous question?

The SPEAKER. The calling of the previous question is not necessary; but the Chair understood the gentleman from New York to demand it.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. The demand of the previous question is not necessary, as the motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so rules. The rule is clear on that point.

Mr. CONGER. I demand the yeas and nays upon laying on the table.

Mr. BLACKBURN. And I second that demand.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 153, nays 90, not voting 47; as follows:

Harris, Hathorn, Henderson, Hoar, Hoskins, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyman, Joyce, Kasson, Kimball, King, Lapham, Leavenworth, Magoon, MacDougall, McCrary, Miller, Monroe, Nash, Norton, Oliver, O'Neil', Packer, Page, William A. Phillips, Pierce, Plaisted, Platt, Potter, Pratt, Robinson, Rusk, Sampson, Seelye, Sinnickson, A. Herr Smith, Strait, Martin I. Townsend, Washington Townsend, Tufts, Van Vorhes, Wait, Alexander S. Wallace, John W. Wallace, G. Wiley Wells, White, Willard, Andrew Williams, Charles G. Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, Alan Wood, jr., Woodburn, and Woodworth—90.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Abbott, Banks, Bass, Bell, Bright, Chapin, Cox, Douglas, Eden, Hancock, Hays, Hendee, Hill, Hoge, Hubbell, Kelley, Lane, Lawrence, Lynch, McDill, McMahon, Meade, Morgan, John F. Philips, Purman, Rainey, Miles Ross, Sobieski Ross, Sayler, Schumaker, Smalls, William E. Smith, Stephens, Stowell, Tarbox, Thomas, Thornburgh, Waldron, Gilbert C. Walker, Ward, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Whiting, Whitthorne, Wigginton, Wike, and Wilshire—47.

So the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. LUTTRELL said: I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. WIGGINTON, is detained at home on account of sickness in his family; if here he would vote "ay."

Mr. WOOD, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is unnecessary.

Mr. SPRINGER. We had better do it.

The motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had adopted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Committee on Enrolled Bills shall have power to act concurrently with a similar committee of the House of Representatives in the examination of enrolled bills, and shall carefully compare the enrollment with the engrossed bills as passed in the two Houses and correct any errors that may be discovered in the enrolled bills, make their report to the respective Houses, and shall be as follows: Mr. CONOVER, (chairman,) Mr. ROBERTSON, and Mr. KELLY.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library shall have power, in conjunction with three members appointed by the House of Representatives, to superintend and direct the expenditure of all the moneys appropriated for the Library, and to perform such other duties as are or may be directed by law, and shall be as follows: Mr. HOWE, (chairman,) Mr. EDMUNDS, and Mr. RANSOM.

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing shall have power, in conjunction with the committee on the part of the House of Representatives, to discharge all the duties now or hereafter devolved upon them by law, and shall be as follows: Mr. ANTHONY, (chairman,) Mr. SHERMAN, and Mr. SAULSBURY.

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds shall have power to act concurrently with the same committee of the House of Representatives, and shall be as follows: Mr. MORRILL, (chairman,) Mr. CAMERON of Pennsylvania, Mr. PADDOCK, Mr. COOPER, and Mr. WHYTE.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the House now adjourn.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 26) authorizing an allowance to certain clerks of committees.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri, was granted leave of absence for three days.

Mr. SMALLS and Mr. RAINEY were granted leave of absence for eight days, on account of important business.

The motion of Mr. MORRISON was then agreed to; and accordingly (at three o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. DOBBINS: A paper containing a statement of the service of John De Camp, deceased, late rear-admiral United States Navy, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HOOKER: The petition of Dr. Robert J. Turnbull, late of Mississippi, for compensation for property taken by United States troops during the late war, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. SAMPSON: The petition of Henry Newman, Goddard & Brother, and Meyer & Schwab, of New York City, against the extension of letters-patent to the heirs of Sheldon S. Hartshorn for an improvement in buckles, to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. SCALES: The petition of David T. Garrett, late a private in Company A, Second Infantry, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 7, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A bill (H. R. No. 1611) authorizing the changing of the name of the sloop Addie Parker, of New Bedford, Massachusetts;

A bill (H. R. No. 1824) to change the name of the pleasure-yacht Hiram B. to Iola;

A bill (H. R. No. 3687) to amend section 3117 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relative to entry of goods taken or delivered at intermediate ports; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4116) to change the name of the steamship Whirlwind to that of Arcadia.

The bill (H. R. No. 4112) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to report upon the necessity of a public building at Rochester, New York, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore signed the following enrolled bills, heretofore signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

A bill (S. No. 620) to remove the political disabilities of James Argyle Smith, of Mississippi;

A bill (H. R. No. 648) for the relief of Andrew J. Barrett;

A bill (H. R. No. 1075) directing the Second Auditor to settle the pay and bounty account of John Ammahaie, or Ammahe;

A bill (H. R. No. 1503) for the relief of Sarah F. Albertson, of Boonville, Missouri; and

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE SENATE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the annual report of the Secretary of the Senate, communicating a statement of property belonging to the United States in his possession December 4, 1876; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

MANNER OF COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication in the form of a petition, which will be read, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SAINT LOUIS, MISSOURI, 4th December, 1876.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, citizens of the United States, respectfully represent that it is highly important that the electoral votes be counted and the result of presidential elections be declared by a tribunal which according to the principles of our Government is to stand aloof from the ambitions and conflicts of political parties.

That the meaning of the constitutional provision touching this matter being the subject of different constructions as to the power conferred by the fundamental law upon the President of the Senate and the two Houses of Congress, it is especially desirable in the present excited state of the popular mind to remove the counting of the electoral vote from the very theater of those contentions; and

That the counting of the electoral votes and the declaration of the result by the Supreme Court of the United States would, in our opinion, inspire universal confidence as to its justice and impartiality, and insure ready acquiescence on the part of all citizens without distinction of party.

The undersigned, therefore, respectfully pray that the two Houses of Congress at the earliest possible period propose to the Legislatures of the several States an amendment to the Constitution whereby the duty of counting the electoral votes and declaring the result thereof may be conferred upon the Supreme Court of the United States with such powers and subject to such restrictions and limitations as may in the wisdom of Congress be deemed necessary to secure the object desired. In view of the fact that a large majority of the State Legislatures will be in session during the month of January, and those that are not may be convened for the purpose, a proposition promptly submitted by Congress may be considered and ratified by the requisite number of State Legislatures in time to secure its benefits in the settlement of the pending presidential contest.

C. SCHURZ.
J. B. HENDERSON.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As this very subject has already been reported upon, I move that the communication lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

ELECTORAL VOTE OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a motion to print the message of the President of the United States, transmitting a letter, accompanied by testimony, addressed to him by Hon. JOHN SHERMAN and others, in relation to the canvass of the vote for electors in the State of Louisiana, have instructed me to report favorably to the printing of the testimony submitted with the report. The report has already been ordered to be printed.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to make a statement as a member of the Committee on Printing. The chairman of the committee said that he was instructed by the committee to make the report, without stating that there was dissent. I desire to say that I do not assent to the printing of that testimony. I have no objection to the publication of the message of the President. It seems to me, however, that it is extraordinary, when we receive a message from the President, contained in simply a line or two, transmitting a letter from certain private gentlemen, having no official connection with the affairs to which they refer, together with such proof as they have seen proper to collect, that the whole thing should be printed. It is entirely a one-sided, ex parte statement of what occurred. It seems to me, therefore, to be improper that it should be printed by order of the Senate, and for that reason I withheld my assent to the publication.

I think the question presented to this country is a very grave question, and that nothing ought to go out from the Senate bearing the impress of authority from the Senate, which is calculated to mislead, calculated to excite the public mind, and calculated in any respect to prejudice the honest judgment which the people of this country may form upon the grave subjects now agitating the public mind. Therefore I honestly believe that all these ex parte statements ought not to go out from the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. My colleague on the committee says that I omitted to state that he dissented from the report of the committee. I certainly did nothing unusual in that. It is not customary when committees report by the vote of the majority to state what took place in the committee-room. I certainly would not have made this report in the absence of my dissenting colleague, but noticing him in his seat I presumed that he was able to speak for himself, as he generally is, and I did nothing that was unusual when, in making the report of the committee, I did not state that it was not unanimous.

Mr. McDONALD. I understood, yesterday, that under objection the motion to print went over until to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will correct the Senator. The motion went to the committee and it has been reported upon this morning.

Mr. McDONALD. I do not rise for the purpose of opposing the report of the committee. I shall vote to print all testimony that may be taken or anything that bears the semblance of testimony relating to the late election in the States of Louisiana, Florida, and Mississippi. If the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] yesterday had simply presented his application for the printing of the President's message and the documents which he and his associates had furnished to the President, without any remarks of his own, I should perhaps have said nothing; but in the course of those remarks the distinguished Senator referred to certain other parties who had acted as a committee also and who were present at the count of this vote in Louisiana, and to the fact that that other party or committee had been applied to to furnish such testimony as they had received, that it might go with this also. This statement was supplemented by the opinion of the distinguished Senator as to what this testimony now offered would establish. In view of this I have thought it best to ask that the statement of these other gentlemen, as published in the public prints, be read by the Secretary, so that the Senate may have before it also their views in reference to this transaction and the manner in which this examination has been conducted.

Mr. ANTHONY. If we are going to read from the newspapers, I think I shall call for the reading of the testimony. I am willing that it shall be printed but not that it shall be read.

Mr. McDONALD. This is not testimony. It is simply the statement of these gentlemen.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is not that testimony, or does it lack the quality of testimony altogether?

Mr. McDONALD. If the reading is objected to and if it is in order to do so, I will read it as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee. The Senator from Indiana has the floor and can read what he deems proper as part of his remarks.

Mr. ANTHONY. I shall not object to the reading if it is insisted on, but it is not fair. We did not have read even the report made by the Senator from Ohio and his associates, and we did not have the testimony read; but now some testimony on the other side is offered which is to be read. I think the whole should be offered if any, but the Senator has a perfect right to read what he deems proper.

Mr. EATON. We heard the statement of the honorable Senator from Ohio in regard to this very transaction. Therefore it is proper that what these other gentlemen say should be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that there is no objection to considering the report of the committee at this time. There is no objection, and the question is on concurring in the report.

Mr. McDONALD. I ask the Secretary to read the paper which I send to the desk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, December 1, 1876.

To the people of the United States:

On our arrival here, in casting about for approaches to the officials who control the elections in this State, we discovered that they were all of one political party; that the governor had appointed none but republican supervisors of elections, and that the returning officers constituting the State board were of the same political school. Influenced by these inauspicious surroundings, our thoughts and hopes were turned toward the eminent gentlemen who have been selected by the President to be present and see that the board of canvassers made a fair count of the votes actually cast, and on the 14th of November we invited these gentlemen to meet and confer with us.

This co-operation was declined, but we nevertheless have reason to believe that to this correspondence may be attributed the invitation to us on the 18th ultimo by the returning board to attend and be present at its meetings as spectators and witnesses of its proceedings. Through this courtesy and the services of a competent stenographer, we became possessed of all the essential facts developed on the face of the official papers. We have been furnished with a certified copy of the duplicate statements of votes made by the commissioners of election at each place of voting in the State. From these statements, it appears that the Tilden electors received the following votes, to wit: McEnery, 83,712; Wyckliffe, 83,880; St. Martin, 83,676; Poche, 83,529; De Blanc, 83,667; Seay, 83,842; Cobb, 83,579; Cross, 83,652; and the Hayes electors received the following votes, to wit: Kellogg, 77,152; Burch, 77,144; Joseph, 74,889; Sheldon, 74,844; Marks, 75,227; Levisse, 75,370; Brewster, 75,457; Jeffrion, 75,597. The result of the vote for presidential electors, as disclosed on the face of the returns opened by the returning board in our presence: For the Tilden electors—McEnery, 82,223; Wyckliffe, 82,326; St. Martin, 82,129; Poche, 82,036; De Blanc, 82 065; Seay. 82,242; Cobb, 81,959; Cross, 82,100. For Hayes electors—Kellogg, 77,023; Burch, 76,983; Joseph, 74,642; Sheldon, 74,678; Marks, 75,087; Levisse, 75,157; Brewster, 75,270; Jeffrion. 75,390.

In most cases the returns opened by the returning board corresponded precisely with the certified copies of statements of commissioners of election furnished us. The most material difference arose from failure of the supervisors of East Baton Rouge, Tangipahoa, and of Orleans to forward statements of votes from all voting-places in their respective parishes. In thirty-five out of the thirty-eight States in the Union these figures would be conclusive; no one would claim that Tilden and Hendricks were not entitled to the electoral vote of the State; but in Louisiana a tribunal has been set up which on former occasions had overthrown the will of the people as expressed at the polls, and for which the power is now claimed in its discretion to change the result of the popular vote at the recent election.

In view, however, of the returns and the law and facts which should control the returning board, with which we have made ourselves familiar, we have no hesitation in saying that the result shown by votes actually cast cannot be changed without a palpable abuse of the letter and spirit of the law governing the returning board and a manifest perversion of the facts before it. Irregularities have been committed in some instances by officers conducting elections and making returns, but they are about as much on one side as the other; and as to intimidation and violence or other illegal acts preventing a free and fair election, there is evidence on both sides, but not of such a character as to affect the general result.

In most instances acts of violence proceeded from mere lawlessness, as in the case of Henry and Eliza Pinkston, and had no connection with politics. It is a significant fact that in parishes where it is alleged that voters were kept from the polls by intimidation the total vote of such parishes was as large as at any time heretofore, and in the whole State is 1,500 above any vote heretofore cast. An honest and fair canvass of returns, even under the Louisiana law, cannot materially reduce Tilden's majority as shown on the face of the returns.

JOHN M. PALMER.
LYMAN TRUMBULL.
WILLIAM BIGLER.
GEORGE B. SMITH.
GEORGE W. JULIAN.
P. H. WATSON.

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. President, I do not desire to enter on any discussion of what these papers contain or what the testimony taken establishes. I fully concur in what has been said by the distinguished Senator from Ohio, that it will be time enough to discuss those questions when we have the facts before us. But as something has been said with respect to the high character of this returning board, to whose fiat we are called upon to submit, I desire that the Secretary shall read the preamble to the resolution reported by the majority of the committee of the House of Representatives, February 23, 1875, which I send to the desk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Whereas both branches of the Legislature of Louisiana have requested the special committee of this House to investigate the circumstances attending the election and returns thereof in that State for the year 1874; and whereas said committee have unanimously reported that the returning board of that State, in canvassing and compiling said returns and promulgating the result, wrongfully applied an erroneous rule of law, by reason whereof persons were awarded seats in the house of representatives of Louisiana to which they were not entitled and persons entitled to seats were deprived of them.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have what is said about the personnel of this board in that paper read.

Mr. McDONALD. It is the same now as it was then.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know; but I ask to have read from that document what these gentlemen said as to the personnel of the board and as to the reasons which led them to think their action was erroneous. If the Senator will hand me the document, I will ask that that be read.

Mr. McDONALD. With pleasure; but I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio to explain to me, if he can, what a wrongful application of an erroneous rule of law may be.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have seen that done so often in the Senate that I might be personal if I were to enter into it. I simply desire to have an extract read from the same document.

Mr. McDONALD. I send the document to the desk.

Mr. WEST. It is on page 19 of the report and on page 21.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be read from the same paper as that used by the Senator from Indiana.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 19 of this report appears the following:

It was to declare the result of such an election that the returning board met at New Orleans in 1874. In expressing our dissent from the view they took of their own powers and duties, and our emphatic disapprobation of their proceedings, we desire to state as emphatically our unwillingness to do them any injustice, and our full appreciation of all the considerations which may tend to palliate their conduct. Several of them have held high positions. Governor Wells, the president, had been a large and wealthy planter before the war, had remained loyal through the rebellion, had been true to the flag of his country when driven to the swamps and hunted with dogs. Such a record entitles him to our warmest sympathy and respect.

On page 21 appears the following:

The returning board claims that in this proceeding they acted under an honest belief that they were right in their construction of the law, and that they were giving effect to the true will of a majority of the people of Louisiana, and that in their construction they followed the precedent set by the democratic or fusion returning board of 1872. We believe they did follow such a precedent. We have no doubt that they believed they were defending the people of Louisiana against a fraud on their constitutional rights. But there is no more dangerous form of self-delusion than that which induces men in high places of public trust to violate law to redress or prevent what they deem public wrongs.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I should like to hear the Chair state the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the report of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. MERRIMON. I wish to ask of the Senator from Ohio or the Senator from Indiana, as one or the other may be able to give me the information, what judicial or official sanction has this testimony. Was it taken by any competent authority in a matter that was properly before any tribunal, or was it taken extra-judicially or extra-officially by anybody who would go out and find somebody who would take an affidavit?

Mr. SHERMAN. There are three classes of testimony in that lot of papers: First, the oral testimony taken before the board and the proceedings of the board, testimony taken in strict conformity to law where there was cross-examination of the witnesses; second, statements of the supervisors of election sworn to by them, and affidavits attached to them, in pursuance of the election law of Louisiana which gave this board jurisdiction for further examination. That was clearly legal; but it was only legal to the extent of giving them jurisdiction. Then there is testimony taken according to the laws of Louisiana, a novel proceeding to me, under interrogatories and cross-interrogatories submitted to the witnesses.

Mr. MERRIMON. Do you understand that the law of Louisiana would allow such testimony to be taken in any other than some competent proceeding instituted in a competent court?

Mr. SHERMAN. The law under which these men acted expressly provided that testimony should be taken according to the law of Louisiana, and this testimony was taken in strict accordance with the law of Louisiana by commissioners appointed under the law of that State.

Mr. MERRIMON. So that the affiant, if he swore falsely, would be guilty of perjury?

Mr. SHERMAN. Clearly so. I suppose there is no question about that. This testimony was taken by men learned in the law, one of them a counselor who had been a judge of the supreme court of that State. It was taken before commissioners appointed by the courts under the law.

Mr. BOGY. I would inquire of the Senator from Ohio if this is not the fact also, that the evidence of outrages in different parishes is sustained by affidavits, and affidavits only, and not by depositions.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; my friend is entirely mistaken. The great mass of it was taken by depositions, taken in due form according to law by these commissioners. The order was made by the consent and at the request of both parties, to expedite the matter and to avoid the taking of oral testimony which would have unduly prolonged the examination, that the modes allowed by law should be followed and these depositions, as I understand, were taken in strict conformity to the law of Louisiana, and indeed the commissioners that took them were selected at the request of the democratic electors. I think they furnished the names, as is shown by the official proceedings of the board. This was the only testimony taken except that which I explained yesterday.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I do not propose to discuss this question at this time, or any of the various questions that may arise on testimony of this character; but as I shall not vote to print the mass of stuff which is lying on the Senate's table, I ought to say in one word why.

In the first place, it does not come here by the action of this body at all. As I understand, there will be proper testimony taken either by this body or by the House of Representatives, and perhaps by both, upon all these questions which arise in Louisiana. I am opposed to the printing of partisan matter, to the printing of matter which is brought here, not by the order of the Senate of the United States, but by private citizens. I am aware that the honorable Senator from Ohio was in Louisiana at this time, but he was not there as a Senator of the United States, but as JOHN SHERMAN, of Ohio. As a Senator of the United States, in my judgment, he ought not to have been there. He was there as a private citizen belonging to one party, and for one

I am utterly opposed to the printing of testimony that has been taken in the manner and under the circumstances that this was. I hope that the yeas and nays will be called and that the motion will be rejected.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to make a remark which perhaps I ought not to make. As a matter of course I am not accountable to my friend from Connecticut for what I do as plain JOHN SHERMAN. What I did in Louisiana, I did from a sense of duty, and it was not a pleasant duty. I am happy to say that in performing that duty I had the co-operation of gentlemen on the democratic side as well, among whom were some of my former associates in this body. We went there to perform a very disagreeable duty; and Senators, instead of blaming us for performing that duty, ought really to commend us, because it was an unpleasant and disagreeable task, and two of the members of this body were there for the same purpose on the democratic side, and among the names read to you this morning as signing a paper on the part of a democratic political organization were names of very eminent gentlemen, who did the best they could under the circumstances. We went at the request of the President, and they under no less authority than that of the president of the democratic national committee.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, only a word. I find no fault that the honorable Senator from Ohio chose to go there at his own expense. He said yesterday, I think, that a gentleman from New York, a very respectable lawyer, Mr. Stoughton, went there at his own expense and was to be credited for that. Very well, let him print this at his own expense if he pleases. It is the act of parties. I will not call the President of the United States a partisan; I do not care to do that; but the President of the United States appointed only republicans to go there for a certain purpose, if I recollect aright. If am wrong I may be corrected. It was that a fair count might be made of the votes cast in Louisiana; but nobody was invited by the Chief Executive of the United States to see that fair thing done except members of one political organization; and hereafter it will be determined whether those gentlemen had a fair count of the votes cast, or whether they disfranchised or saw a portion of the people of Louisiana disfranchised.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator from Connecticut be kind enough to answer me a question?

Mr. EATON. I will if I can.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to inquire of him what he understands to be the meaning of the words "votes cast." Do they mean simply pieces of paper found in the ballot-boxes?

Mr. EATON. Well, Mr. President, I do not know how it is up in Massachusetts exactly, but when we poll 10,000 votes in the city of Hartford, where I live, in the State of Connecticut, they are ballots, pieces of paper upon which are written or printed certain names, and when we have a fair count of those ballots we count them all. What way they have of manipulating matters in Massachusetts, I am not able to say; but that is what I understand to be a fair count of ballots that have been cast.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, the Senator does not seem to understand my interrogatory. I asked him what he understands by the term "votes cast;" whether he thinks that a vote cast is simply a piece of paper found in a ballot-box, or whether it is the free, untrammeled expression of the will of a voter as evidenced by a piece of paper put in the ballot-box by authority and according to law.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I understand this, that the entire machinery of the election was in the hands of the republicans in the State of Louisiana. I understand that the supervisors of election were republicans. I understand that the votes cast there were cast by men who had a right to vote. Such is my understanding with regard to Louisiana. All have to be registered as is suggested as they are in my State, and as I suppose they are in Massachusetts—registered under republican officers in the State of Louisiana. What I mean by a fair count is this: that when there are 5,000 ballots or 1,000 ballots put in by registered voters those ballots are to be counted, not to be destroyed, not to be counted out, but to be counted as ballots cast properly for officers. That is what I understand by it.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, I desire to explain how I acted when I was in New Orleans. The Senator from Ohio has alluded to Senators besides himself who were sent to that city for the purpose of obtaining a fair count of the vote given at the late election in the State of Louisiana. As I stated yesterday, I was one of the persons designated to go to New Orleans, and I promptly did go; but when the position was assigned to the members of the committee of five to remain in New Orleans and conduct the investigation we thought it unbecoming to remain because it had passed the point of obtaining a fair count. We left them to represent the counting on the side which was favorable to us. I do not say it to place my friend from Ohio in an awkward position, because he has a right to judge of that himself, but only to explain our position. The two Senators and myself from our side who went there felt it to be wrong to engage in anything beyond going to the city of New Orleans for the purpose of conferring and obtaining a fair count. Beyond that we felt that it would be wrong and improper for us to act. Of course, I have no right to judge of my friend's action; but that was what we felt to be our duty.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I was not in when the report was made by the Committee on Printing with such commendable diligence, and I will ask if it is not very long that it be read, or at least that the resolution be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is that the usual number of copies be printed.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, there is no one more desirous of knowing the facts and all the facts connected with the late election in Louisiana than I am, and I hope that in due time all the facts will be laid before the Congress of the United States and the American people. If, therefore, I have objected to the printing of these papers at this time it is not from any desire to suppress the publication of the facts; but it is because I do not want public opinion or the opinion of members of Congress to be forestalled by the premature printing of only a part of the facts. I understood from an answer made by my colleague to a question I put to him yesterday that there is not in that bundle of papers on the desk all the testimony that was before the returning board of Louisiana. There is all that was offered on the republican side; but there is not, if I apprehend his answer correctly, all that was offered by way of rebuttal to that testimony, or to sustain the allegations made by those who represented the democratic candidates on that occasion. This, then, is only a partial statement of the case, and it is proposed to scatter broadcast over the land and to form conclusions upon this partial and one-sided statement of the case. To that I object. If this matter shall be delayed until the testimony shall be fully produced, as I venture to say it will and that shortly, then I shall have no objection, for, as I said before, I want myself to see and I am sure every Senator and every member of the other House and almost every man in the United States must want to see the testimony upon which, for the third time in that State, the remarkable result has been reached that an apparent majority, heretofore as high as 15,000, this year as high as 7,000, goes for nothing, and that those candidates who upon the return were 7,000 in the minority are returned by the board to be 3,000 in the majority. That is a thing that would startle a man if he heard it for the first time; but it does not startle anybody who hears it in respect to the State of Louisiana, for it is only the third act in the same comedy. But now, when this concerns not alone the State of Louisiana, but when it concerns the whole Republic, when it affects the choice or the declaration of the choice of the Chief Magistrate of the nation, I want myself to see and to scrutinize and to investigate, as well as time and ability will permit me, the testimony upon which this extraordinary result has been effected.

My colleague has stated to us with something of detail the public character of the proceedings of that board. He has stated its open sessions and what were called its executive sessions; but there is one thing he has not stated; there is one thing that he cannot state; there is one thing he does not know to this day, I presume, and that is what were called the secret resolutions after that board had ceased to hold either public or executive sessions. What were the returns that were thrown out; what were the precincts that were thrown out; what was the count by which an apparent majority of over 7,000 for Tilden and Hendricks is thrown into a majority of 3,000 for Hayes and Wheeler,—those were matters done in secret and done in the worst kind of secrecy; for, sir, it cannot be denied that it was the duty of that board to fill the vacancy in the board. There were four republicans on the board already. The law contemplated and in fact required that the board should be constituted of members of different political organizations. Had the vacancy been filled that law would have required a choice of a democrat as the fifth member of that board. And yet that vacancy never was filled; not because it was not the duty of the four members there to fill it, for it was confessedly their duty, but under the miserable pretext that they could not agree upon the man. In all Louisiana they could not find one single democrat or conservative upon whom they could agree! Name whom you please among the 83,000 men who voted for Tilden in that State, name any one of the 83,000, and that board of four was immediately divided, two for and two against the man who was named. Why, Mr. President, on the very face of the thing it shows a predetermined purpose to do wrong. Had there been a democratic member on that board he would have been present at the secret as well as the public and executive sessions of the board; he would have known how it was that whole parishes were thrown out, that precincts were thrown out, that republican majorities were raised or democratic majorities reduced; he would have known all that and he would have been a witness to the actual count which was made, not in the public or in the executive sessions of the returning board, but in its secret sessions, when no eye of a democrat was allowed to see one thing that was done, no ear of a democrat allowed to hear one word that was said.

All the whitewashing in the world cannot wipe out or hide this guilt, for guilt I call it. You may attempt to forestall public opinion by presenting one portion of the testimony without the rest. You may make hot haste to do it; you may print it; you may send it abroad to the people; it will go forth stamped with the stigma that it is only a one-sided statement of the case. It cannot be avoided if this thing is to be done. There is no necessity either for doing it now. There is ample time to wait until the whole matter can be heard. We know very well that it is to be investigated. We know very well that all the testimony on both sides will be laid before the Congress. We know very well that then there will be no ex parte or one-sided statement of the case. All that we know. But now, sir, in advance of legitimate investigation, in advance of an investigation that will present the whole case and the whole testimony before Congress and the American people, we are pressed to publish a defective and one-sided statement of the testimony and the report of one set of political gentlemen, without the report of the others who witnessed those proceedings as well as these gentlemen who now have sent this matter to the President.

I protest against this. I protest against it in the name of fair play. I think I understand it well enough. I impute no motives; it is not becoming or consistent with the rules of the Senate to impute motives to gentlemen; but if a man were disposed to forestall public opinion and to pave the way for sustaining what may be or may not be one of the most flagrant wrongs that were ever committed in this country; wrongs that if tolerated put an end to everything like honest republican government—if that were the object of the man, he could not take a better course than this to attempt to forestall this case by presenting one side of it.

Mr. President, I do not want to speak of this matter in any way that would indicate that I prejudge it. I want to see all the testimony. I want, onerous as the duty may be, to see what is the testimony in each particular case upon which that board rejected this parish or that parish, this precinct or that precinct, and I say to Senators now that mere general declamation about intimidation will not do. I say to them that this is a matter which must be investigated judicially with a judicial mind and with judicial fairness. Mere declamation will not do; mere vague general charges will not do; mere pictures of horror, even where there is a foundation for them in some particular and isolated case, will not do. The action of this board must be investigated and scrutinized as a chancellor would investigate and scrutinize a case before him to see if each point is supported by the law and supported by the testimony. I shall not commit myself to any judgment upon it until I have all the facts before me, and then if I can have the time to do it, then if I can take the time to do it, even to the neglect of other duties, I propose to see for myself, in order that I may vote according to my best judgment, whether or not the testimony supports the various rulings of the board by which an apparent majority upon the returns of 7,000 is turned into a minority of 3,000.

Now, sir, what I desire is that these papers shall lie on the table until the other side is heard and then have all printed. I do not desire that we shall have a mere one-sided statement of this case. I desire further, sir, that we shall know before we proceed what were the particular rulings and judgments of that board in its secret sessions, what parishes it threw out, what precincts it threw out, what majorities were increased, what majorities were reduced, so that we may be able to make a table for ourselves and to apply the testimony to each of the cases decided by the board. That is what I want to see. But you begin in hot haste—I must be permitted to say without disrespect—to present but one side of this case and then ask the American people to take that as the whole.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, we have the singular spectacle here of denunciation of the returning board of Louisiana, denunciation of it for committing fraud, for improperly changing the result of the election in that State, while at the very same time resistance is made to laying before the country the evidence upon which that action was taken. Here is the evidence placed before the board upon the republican side. I understand from the Senator from Ohio that the democrats were invited to present their testimony, to bring it here and have it printed and let it go to the country together. They can do it now; they can do it to-morrow; but they are not willing to do that; they are not willing to have the case go to the country as it was before the board; but they want to wait until they take more testimony, so that they can get a case which was not before the board. When it is charged that that board acted fraudulently, we are willing to have all the evidence upon both sides upon which they acted published. Let it all go to the country together. Our democratic friends declined the invitation; but they want to wait until they get new evidence which was not before the board. They thus confess that they are not satisfied with their case as it was before the board, but must wait till they make a new case by sending a committee down there.

Mr. President, this gratuitous denunciation of that board in advance I think is wholly without authority. If they acted improperly, let those who make that charge bring forward their evidence that was before the board; let it all go to the country together, and the people can judge of it. But they are not willing for that. They must wait until they make a new case, get more evidence, that that board never saw; and then, on the new testimony, that the board never saw, we are to judge whether the board acted correctly or not. From what I have heard, we are not afraid of the new testimony. The more testimony the better. The half has not been told. But when it comes to finding fault with that board and condemning it, we are willing to have all the testimony go together. I understood the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to have urged them to send in or to give copies of their testimony.

Mr. SHERMAN. Here is the letter.

Mr. MORTON. I will send it to the desk and have it read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, November 30, 1876.

DEAR SIR: It is our purpose to communicate to the President copies of the testimony of witnesses taken under the order of the board of returning officers before the commissioners, but we have no means of getting copies of such of the depositions as are taken in behalf of the democratic candidates for electors. If you will secure us copies of such depositions we will, with pleasure, transmit them, with the copies of the depositions taken by the republican candidates, so that if printed hereafter the whole body of the testimony may be read and considered together. No doubt a request by you of the gentlemen taking the depositions will enable you to comply with our wish for a copy of them.

Very respectfully, yours,

JOHN SHERMAN, Chairman.

To Hon. JOHN M. PALMER, Chairman.

Mr. McDONALD rose.

Mr. MORTON. Read the answer.

Mr. McDONALD. That is what I want.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. MORTON. Read the answer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the further reading?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I submit that there is no unfinished business. I submit that the motion I made to take up a certain resolution being a motion that falls if not disposed of at the adjournment, the appeal which is incidental to it falls with it, and so we have nothing before us as unfinished business. I am going to move to take it up again the first chance I get.

Mr. MORTON. I want that read as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, December 1, 1876.

To Hon. JOHN SHERMAN:

DEAR SIR—Your note of yesterday's date was received this morning, and at once laid before the gentlemen with whom I am associated, and they instruct me to answer that they are extremely anxious that all the facts relating to the election of presidential electors in Louisiana shall be known to the people of the United States, but that your note contains no assurance that the evidence collected here will be laid before the country.

They further instruct me to say that though upon that and other grounds they decline to be the medium of communication between the representatives of the President and the citizens who claim to have been chosen by the people of Louisiana at the late election as presidential electors, they would gladly unite and cooperate with you and your associates in collecting and collating for publication such returns, protests, petitions, exceptions, and the evidence taken by all parties, with any other papers which may be necessary to a full understanding of all the questions that relate to the election for presidential electors in this State.

In view of your proposition, and the importance of a proper understanding of all the facts by the country, we must express our regret that you declined the cooperative action proposed by us in the beginning.

Very respectfully, &c.,

JOHN M. PALMER.

Mr. MORTON. There is the invitation and there is the polite declination. They were invited to send their testimony in and let it all go out together, but they declined for certain reasons, and when it is proposed on our side to make the publication they say, "hold on, wait until it all comes in." That means "until we make a new case." That is the whole of it. They will not trust the case they have made, they confess that, but "wait until we get a new committee and we rake these States over and make a new case and then let it all be published." That is the whole of it.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President I cannot help feeling some surprise really, if a man should be surprised at anything in this day, at the bold position the Senator from Indiana takes when he charges that here is an attempt to make a new case which was not before the returning board. Where he gets any authority for saying that, I do not know. He certainly has stated none that will bear him out in any such inference.

But now there is one thing to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate. The Senator's remarks indicate, and very truly so far as the action of the returning board is concerned, that the question is to be determined by the testimony which was before that board, with one qualification, however, which he has not made, but which I make, that the fairness of that board is to be judged of, not simply by its determination upon the testimony which it received, but by its rulings in regard to the reception of testimony as well. If that board, in violation of right and justice, rejected testimony that ought to have been received, or made rules that excluded testimony where testimony was of the greatest importance, then it cannot stand the scrutiny of justice or of the American people; and therefore I do hope that any committee that investigates this matter will see whether the rules established by that board for the reception or the exclusion of testimony were such as were warranted by law and justice, or whether, on the contrary, they were partial in character and calculated to do wrong. Let me mention a single instance.

The case of Eliza Pinkston has become notorious in this country by the statements which have been made of it, often most inaccurate, and by the declamation that has followed about these statements. If the newspapers which I saw were right, that board, after receiving Eliza Pinkston's testimony, made a rule that but two witnesses should be examined to contradict her.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know my colleague does not want to misunderstand this matter. The board, after having allowed two witnesses to be examined in regard to the Eliza Pinkston case, orally, ruled that only two witnesses should be examined orally in reply. I will state to him that any number of witnesses were allowed to be examined by interrogatories on either side, as he will find on the files, but the board were compelled by the apparent necessity of the case, in order to perform their constitutional duty, to exclude further oral testimony, and I can say to my colleague that it is shown by the record that this was done by general consent. The attempt to take oral testimony would have exhausted the whole time to examine into a single parish, and they therefore adopted—and, I think, at the suggestion of gentlemen on that side—the rule of taking testimony by depositions instead of orally.

Mr. THURMAN. I am not here to decide upon a matter in regard to which I have not the facts before me. If they acted fairly and received all the testimony, then they are not to be condemned in respect to the reception of testimony. If they acted unfairly, then they are to be condemned.

But now with respect to this correspondence between my colleague and his associates and Judge Trumbull and his associates, in respect to the latter furnishing the testimony taken on the democratic side, if I understand the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] he says that we are to consider no testimony except that which was before the board, and therefore I presume that my colleague here has produced no testimony but that which was before the board.

Mr. MORTON. I did not say that. I merely said that the proposition was made on the part of the republicans to publish all the testimony that was before the board on both sides and upon which the board acted, but that the democrats declined to do that and were determined to wait until they could make a new case. They were not satisfied with the case as it appeared before the board. That is the point.

Mr. THURMAN. I say there is nothing in the world to warrant that statement; but, Mr. President, I hold the Senator to it. He says the proposition was to furnish copies of that evidence which was before the board. Then it was evidence filed before the board. Now I want to know where was the necessity of my colleague and his associates calling on the democrats to furnish the evidence when there was the evidence before the board and they could get copies of it themselves? Where did they get the copies which they produce here?

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope my colleague will not try to place me in a wrong position. The letter itself shows that the depositions referred to were in the possession of the democratic committee. They were filed on Saturday. They were under their control. We got copies of the depositions taken on the part of the republican electors by having them copied; we could not do that with the depositions taken on the other side; but on the other hand we had assurances that they were copied for them, and their answer practically admits that they had copies of those depositions. They do not take depositions there as is our practice in Ohio, by a series of interrogatories which are filed at once with the answers to them; but the depositions are practically under the control of the party taking them until they are presented as evidence. I would have been glad, and indeed attempted as far as possible, to get copies of those depositions, but I could not do it, and therefore I failed. The answer admits that, while they were not available to us, they were available to them, and they proposed to us at some future time to select out from the mass of testimony those that were proper for publication—a thing that was perfectly impracticable. We regarded their letter simply as a denial of our request and as showing a desire on their part to present their testimony in a different way, and I have no doubt in some form it will come to one or the other House of Congress, and when it comes it ought to be printed and considered with this mass of testimony.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask what is the date of that letter making that request?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it was last Thursday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. November 30, the Chair understands, is the date of the first letter read at the desk.

Mr. THURMAN. That was Thursday. Do I understand my colleague to have left New Orleans on Saturday?

Mr. SHERMAN. When the case was concluded, I think about 2 o'clock on Saturday.

Mr. THURMAN. Now, Mr. President, I have this to say in respect to the reason of those gentlemen for declining. I do not know exactly, further than they have stated, what may have influenced them, but I know what I would have done if I had been one of them, and that is I would have refused the request of my colleague and his associates.

Mr. McDONALD. Allow me to say to the Senator from Ohio that the committee of which his colleague was a member had already refused to co-operate with them in any way.

Mr. THURMAN. I am coming to that matter. I say, sir, I would have refused. What is this? Here are five gentlemen of the republican party who went down there at the request of the President of the United States. Did that constitute them officers of the United States? Did that give them any official function? Did that give them any superiority of position or entitle their judgment to any more weight than that of any other five respectable citizens of the United States? They went down there at the request of the President. They asked these other five gentlemen to furnish the testimony taken on the democratic side. For what reason? That these gentlemen might make up their report and send it to the President, having all the testimony before them, in order that it might be laid before Congress. They do not ask the five independent gentlemen down there who acted for the democratic or conservative party to join with them in making a report to the President. They ask nothing of that kind. They do not ask for a consultation upon the testimony to arrive at conclusions and lay them before the President, but they ask that all the testimony may be put into their hands, that they may send their judgment, the judgment of five republicans, to the President, to be by him communicated to Congress. Sir, a more one-sided thing I never heard of in my life, and I cannot help feeling some surprise that a gentleman whose sense of propriety is so keen as that of my colleague and those who were associated with him should have ever ventured to make such a proposition. If they had said to these five gentlemen—men certainly of as high character as any in this country—"Let us get together; let us take this testimony; let us make a report either to the President or to the people or to Congress; let us see whether we cannot arrive at conclusions that will meet the assent of us all, that will command the approbation of the American people and of the American Government"—if they had proposed that to them, it would have been a fair proposition; but to say "You shall furnish us your proofs, and we, a one-sided party, we, half the jury, will then make up our verdict; we of the one political party will make up that verdict and give it a sort of official sanction, an odor, a flavor by sending it to the President of the United States, to be communicated to Congress," is a little the most modest proposition that ever I heard in all my life!

I say that those gentlemen were perfectly right in refusing such a proposition as that. My colleague and his four associates were not constituted by law or courtesy or fairness the sole judges of this business, to take all the testimony and make a report to the Chief Magistrate of the nation, to be laid before the Congress of the United States. They had no such official functions. They had no such rights as American citizens. It will not do for the Senator from Indiana to talk about confessing that the case was against the democratic party because such a proposition as that was rejected, and properly rejected.

One word more. I say it will be a matter of investigation, not simply what was the testimony before that board, but what was the testimony that was offered and rejected, which ought to have been received and, therefore, was wrongly rejected. It will be an inquiry which fairness, justice, and the common sense and the sense of right of the American people will demand to know, why it was that the vacancy in that board was not filled, why it was that no democratic eye was allowed to see, that no democratic ear was allowed to hear, the secret and final proceedings of that board.

I think it very probable that anything I can say will have no effect upon this pending question. I see a spirit of haste in all this business which augurs to my mind anything but good. I said yesterday, I believe, or if I did not I say it to-day, that there never was a time in the history of this country when republican institutions and our form and structure of government and our Constitution were put to a severer trial than they are at this moment. Under these circumstances everything that is done by Congress should set an example to the people everywhere to act with deliberation, with coolness, and above all with a supreme sense of justice and right. Therefore I do say again that no ex parte presentations, no one side of the case, will satisfy either the conscience of the American people or the demands of justice.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] has discussed the situation down there more or less in his several speeches, has denounced the action that has been taken there, and now talks about an ex parte presentation of the question. All the ingenuity that can be brought to bear upon the other side cannot extricate them from the dilemma into which they are placed. It cannot change the point. The point is this: So far as the republicans are concerned who were there, it was voluntary on their part; they were not officers. So far as the democrats were concerned it was voluntary on their part, they were not officers. They stood upon the same footing upon both sides, so far as that is concerned; but when the republicans offered to lay the whole testimony before the country, that was before the board, and publish what the democrats offered as well as what the republicans offered, the offer was declined; and now when the republicans come forward and give what they have, offer to publish to the world what they have under their control, they are asked not to do it, because the democratic side is not presented. They were invited to let it all go to the country together. They declined that. They wanted to wait until they could get more testimony; and, to come right back to the point, they want to wait until they can make a new case. That is the whole of it.

Mr. McDONALD. I should like to ask my colleague if the democratic committee had made the same request of the republican committee whether he would have advised their consenting to it?

Mr. MORTON. I certainly should. If the democratic party proposed to publish the evidence before that board in their possession, all that they offered, and if they had called upon the republicans to give what they had and let it all go together, I should have said it was the fair thing; and, if the republicans had declined to accept that proposition, it would have been because they had no confidence in their case, did not dare trust it, and wanted to wait until they made a new case.

Mr. McDONALD. That is not an answer to my question. My question is whether my colleague would have regarded it as proper for the democratic committee to have asked the republican committee to give over into their charge the entire testimony they had taken upon their side, and have no part whatever in its presentation?

Mr. MORTON. To have asked the democratic committee to surrender the originals into the hands of the republicans and thus place the entire control of the testimony into the hands of the republicans, might not have been proper; but if the democrats had asked them for copies as the republicans asked the democrats for copies, and the republicans had refused the request, I should say, as I say on the other side, it was because they had no case, and were afraid to trust it, and wanted to wait until they got a new case.

Mr. McDONALD. I will say that it would be the first time in the history of the gentleman that he ever condemned his own party.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say but a word in reply to my colleague on one point he made in regard to presenting this testimony. There was no question made by anybody in New Orleans as to the course of those sent by the President, and who witnessed the count. Our course as a body and as a committee was fair and proper. We sat there and listened; we heard the testimony, such as was given orally; we read such as was furnished to us from time to time that was written. No one called in question the fairness and propriety of our conduct, however different a conclusion he may draw from that testimony.

In regard to carrying the testimony here, I will not go out of the record to repeat the conversations that occurred between us, because I know that is not fair. The other gentlemen are not present, and therefore, I will not repeat a single statement of a verbal character made by them to us; but the correspondence on its face shows this matter. It may be seen from the nature and manner of taking the testimony. Here were two large volumes of testimony. Copies were in the hands of the democratic committee and copies were in our hands. There was no disposition, I think, on either side to withhold from the other an examination of these copies or papers. I have no doubt that at any moment I might have gone to Governor Palmer and received from him a copy of any paper he had in his possession, and I am quite sure, I know very well, that he could have come to us for any paper. I will not go into what was done, but he would come to us for any paper whatever, a copy of a deposition, and it would be freely, frankly, and cordially given. Gentlemen would conduct that kind of intercourse, as a matter of course, between each other. We did decline their proposition as committees to confer with each other to influence the count by the board. We had no such power. The power was in the returning board; and our course in that matter, I think, was justified by the common sense of mankind. We had no business to act there in a joint capacity to influence the conduct of the board. As individuals, as gentlemen, as private citizens, we did confer; we had agreeable intercourse, so that if any testimony was in our possession that was not in theirs it could be freely had at any moment, and that was known by both.

The question of communicating this mass of testimony to Congress did necessarily come up days before the testimony was closed, and that letter of mine, which was only in pursuance of verbal interviews before, was simply to put in a formal way the request that we might know some way to get together these two bodies of testimony and present them here. I do not suppose that Governor Palmer or any of those gentlemen feared to trust the testimony with me in a sealed package or in any form in which it could be put to present it here. I do not believe they thought it would not be presented. And if the democrats had asked me for the mass of these copies and said to me that they would deliver them in Washington at a certain time, as soon as I could get them I would have given them freely, without question or doubt. I have no doubt if Governor Palmer had come this way he would have been glad to do it; but we knew very well that not one of the committee who were there on the part of the democrats was coming to Washington. They were not residents here; they were not members of Congress. Therefore it was that I made the offer to transmit and be a common carrier, if you please to call it so, of the common testimony either in a sealed package or any form so as to get it before the people. Anybody can see that on the face of the papers. They declined because, as they said, they preferred to adopt some other mode of communicating this information to the people of the United States than the mode we proposed, through the President of the United States. There was the difference. We could only communicate this information to the Senate through the President. They preferred to communicate it in some other way. I have no doubt whatever that in a very short time such testimony as they desire to present will be presented to either one of the two Houses, and when presented it ought to be printed without all this complaint, without all this, it seems to me, captious objection. That testimony is the testimony upon which this case is to be decided. It is taken according to law for the use of officers who had judicial as well as ministerial functions to perform. That was the testimony that gave force and power and authority to their decisions. All we can do is, not to reverse their decision, for we have not the power to do that, but to say to the people of the United States whether the proceeding was fairly conducted, whether it was honestly conducted, whether upon the face of the testimony before them they could form and honestly come to the conclusions to which they came. It is rather a question of public opinion and investigation upon which they are on trial. Their judgment is final, and made so by the laws of Louisiana and by the Constitution of the United States. All we desired was to present the whole of the testimony so that every man in the United States may see whether or not these men in the performance of that high, important ministerial and judicial duty acted honestly, like honest men, or whether as rogues they sought to deprive the people of Louisiana of their vote in the election for presidential electors. That is all there is of it.

My colleague talks about having no feeling. He has shown more feeling in this matter than he would consider consistent with the just judicial mind in the examination of a case before him as a judge. I am quite sure that when I expressed in a single sentence my general opinion of the character of this testimony, without saying whether it justified all the acts of this returning board, because I do not know them yet, I did not show as much feeling as, or certainly not any more than, he has now exhibited when he is praying for a judicial, a disinterested, and a dispassionate examination of this testimony. He promises us, if he has the time consistent with his other duties, to read these depositions. I do not believe my colleague will have the time. We had barely the time. It was made our duty, not as officers, not as Senators, but as citizens requested by the President of the United States to look into and investigate and witness this count. It was made our duty to examine this testimony. I know more about it than he does. We may come to a different conclusion on this matter from him even if he would examine it fully; but he has not made that examination. If he had the time and attempted to make that examination he would find things that were startling, things that I think he could not exactly reconcile to his sense of justice and honesty, things that he would not defend before our common constituents.

What I desire to say is that we present you every particle of testimony that we could get; that we tried to get it all, but that a portion of it was not within our power; that it was under the control of another committee who no doubt in due time will present it to one or the other of the two Houses, if they think it will be worth while to do so. If they think it will carry out and sustain their views they will present it. If not, they will not present it. All I can say is that we tried to get all this testimony so that the whole might be printed, and that every man might judge for himself whether or not the judgment of this returning board was sustained by honest testimony, honestly given, and by a weight of testimony sufficient to warrant their finding.

Mr. THURMAN. My colleague has, as I am inclined to think he will on calm consideration agree, made unaware several very important admissions. In the first place, it is apparent from his statement that these papers are laid before us, not for the purpose of any congressional action at all, because he tells us in so many words that whether that testimony supports the rulings of that board or not, whether its rulings were right or whether they were wrong, we have no right to criticise them; that we are conclusively bound by them. If that is the case, then that testimony and this report to the President are not laid before Congress for any practical purpose whatsoever, so far as our action is concerned. But again, for another reason, it appears from the Senator's admission that it is not for the purpose of congressional action at all that these papers are laid before us, for he says to me that he does not believe that I shall have the time to read this testimony. If I do not have it, who will? My colleague has known me a long time; and whatever reputation I may have, I certainly have the reputation of being an industrious, hard-working man; and if I cannot read this testimony, I should like to know what member of the Senate can or will. Then it is not laid before the Senate, to be read by the Senate, for the Senate has not the time to read it. Why then is it laid before the Senate? Not to found any action upon it, for my colleague says we are concluded by the judgment of the returning board. It is not for us to read it during this session, for he says we have no time to read it. Why then lay it before us here to be printed at the public expense, but for the purpose of having it go before the people and creating public opinion? If that is the reason, as it is the only reason that inexorable logic will leave to my colleague, then I ask why is it brought here? Can he not wait a little while until the testimony on the other side comes in, so that it may go to the people who will have time to read, who will have years to read it, if you please; so that it may all go together to the people in order that they may form a correct public opinion on the subject? What is the necessity on this fourth day of the session for putting this evidence in press when in a few days we can have the whole of it, and let it all go together? I cannot, for the life of me, see any logic in this business.

But there was another admission of much more importance, and I wish the attention of my colleague to it. Pointing to that pile of papers, which is called testimony forsooth, he says it was upon that testimony that the decision of the returning board was made.

Mr. SHERMAN. That and the other testimony.

Mr. THURMAN. Ah! But the Senator did not say so. He pointed to that pile of papers and distinctly said that it was upon that testimony that the decisions of the returning board were made.

Mr. SHERMAN. Did my colleague suppose that I said it was upon that testimony alone? He is fishing with a pin-hook.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not want any pin-hook. I never fished with a pin-hook in my life; I always had a good hook. If my colleague says he did not mean that, I refrain from all criticism upon it; but when he was urging that it should be laid before the American people now, without waiting for the other testimony, he said upon that testimony the board decided, I want him to tell me how I can understand him otherwise than that it was upon that testimony, one side of the case, that that board has rendered its decision, and claims to have converted 7,000 majority in the State of Louisiana into a minority of 3,000. I am inclined to think that my colleague has in advertently told the truth. I am inclined to believe that it was upon that testimony, and not upon the testimony which rebutted that proof; nay more, that it was upon that which was not even fair supposition, that those gentlemen rendered their decision. But I withhold my decision upon that until I can see the case and try to find time to read it and to read it fairly. It may not be necessary to read it all. I shall want to take up a particular parish and see what the testimony is in relation to it, and then another and another; and perhaps before I have gone through with a half dozen of them I may be able to form, with a judicial mind, a judgment whether that was an honest count or not. I propose to do it.

One word about the refusal of Governor Palmer and his associates to furnish their testimony to my colleague and his associates. My colleague has said that we cannot have time to read the testimony; that is, we cannot at this time, or before the count of the presidential votes on the second Wednesday of February. That is what he must have meant. Did not Governor Palmer and his associates know that? Did they not know that if you put in the rest of that testimony it would only accumulate it, and make it so much the more impossible to read it? Did they not know then that it is upon the report which shall be made upon the testimony that public opinion is most likely to be formed? It is the report—that is all—that the great mass of the people can read or ever can see. It is the report which will be in every newspaper of one party in the United States. Did they not know that? It was not right and fair to ask them to submit all this testimony to these five republican gentlemen, and allow them to make their report without one single word of a democratic report to the contrary. Is that fairness? Is that fair play? Is that the way to proceed? No, sir. I repeat it, they did perfectly right in refusing.

But my colleague says, "All we could do was to report to the President." Report to the President! Where is the statute that authorizes you to make any report to the President, I should like to know. You were no more than five other citizens of the United States. Any five citizens of the United States had just as much right as you had to make a report to the President; any one of them has just as much right to ask the President to give a sort of official sanctity to the document by sending it to Congress. Palmer and his associates had just as much right to do it as you had. You occupied no superior position in this case, none whatever. If you were official men, if you were sent down there as official men by the President to see that there was a fair count, then I must say that the President took a very strange way of constituting his commission to constitute them all of one political party. If the President acted ex virtute officii, if he acted as President, if he acted in the execution of any duty devolved on him by the Constitution or law, and undertook to send a commission to see that there was a fair count, with what kind of face did he ask nobody to serve on that commission but members of his own political party? No, Mr. President, that will not do. It will not do for my colleague, and I do not suppose that he claims it at all, to assert that he and his associates had any more authority there, any precedence there over Palmer and his associates, than anybody else would have, whether called by the President or not.

I have not yet criticised the action of the President in requesting my colleague and others to go down there. I make no criticism whatsoever upon it. I have not a word of censure to say in respect to any such thing as that. But the attempt to clothe this with an odor of officiality, to put the garments of office upon it, is the thing that I protest against. I say my colleague, highly honorable and respectable and influential as he is, and his honorable colleagues on that committee, highly respectable as they were, were nothing but five private citizens of the United States having no more rights than any other private citizens, and in no way clothed with power to speak by authority.

Now, Mr. President, having it here entirely, clearly, and frankly admitted by my colleague that we can do nothing with these papers as a Senate, that nothing we can do with them, as he says, can influence the declaration of the election to the Presidency, that they can have no possible bearing upon the question who shall be counted in as President on the second Wednesday of next February, and, further, having the admission that there is no time for any Senator to read them at this session, and thus being driven to admit that the whole object of the publication is for effect on the public mind, I once more appeal to the fairness of the Senate to wait until the whole case can be laid before the American people.

I shall vote against the resolution to print not at all because I am opposed to the printing, for when the other testimony shall come in I shall cheerfully vote to print it all. I only vote against printing it now. The moment the whole testimony is in I will vote to print it all readily and freely.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I wish to attain that pitch of virtue that is possessed by my honorable friend from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] and the other opponents of this motion; and to do so, I wish to declare with all the heat of which I am capable that I am perfectly cool, and with all the passion I can possibly feel that I am absolutely dispassionate, and with all the bias that I can fret myself into that I am absolutely impartial and unbiased. And if, by following that method, in humble imitation of my friends on the other side, I can get up to a sufficient pitch of virtue to look at this most momentous question, then I shall discuss it.

I wish to call the attention of my friend from Ohio, in the first place, to the third section of the second article of the Constitution of the United States as it was, none of these spurious thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments, but the real old thing. Speaking of the Executive, it says:

> He shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union.

That is one of the duties that the President of the United States is commanded to perform, and he has bound himself by all the obligations that constitutions and laws and conscience can impose upon a man who accepts an office voluntarily to obey that command, as all his predecessors before him have done. And you will find, Mr. President—I do not know that my friend from Ohio will find it—but you will find, sir, from the administration of George Washington to the administration of President Grant, in the Journals of both Houses of Congress, documents printed with presidential messages containing from first to last every species of information, official and unofficial, letters from private persons to private persons, sometimes confidential and sometimes not, everything that comes to the possession of the President of the United States as "information," in the language of the Constitution, that he believes the public interest requires him, touching the state of the Union, to lay before the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. THURMAN. May I interrupt the Senator for a moment? Have I said one word criticising the conduct of the President in sending this message.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not said that the Senator has.

Mr. THURMAN. I certainly have not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It will be time enough for the Senator to plead not guilty when he is accused. I am only trying to convey to my honorable friend from Ohio a little "information of the state of the Union."

That being the state of the Constitution, and the universal practice under it from first to last, there having occurred on the 7th of November an election for electors of President and Vice-President in the several States, and in some of them there being great disputes and public excitement and charges and counter-charges, that seemed to threaten the peace and good order and constitutional law of those respective States, and possibly of the whole Union, the President, in order to obtain information that he has a right to obtain by any lawful means, invites certain respectable citizens of the United States to endeavor to obtain it and communicate it to him. Nobody has criticised that; nobody will criticise it until he attains a pitch of virtue that is higher even than that assumed by my friends on the other side so far.

Having obtained that information, no matter whether it is information that is trustworthy or untrustworthy, it is of a character that he feels it to be his duty, under the Constitution, to communicate to the two Houses of Congress as affecting the state of the Union, for what it is worth; not proof, not law, but simply, in the language of the Constitution, "information," that may turn out to be entirely a dream, that may turn out to be entirely a fact. And when it is proposed that this communication of the President, with the information that he lays before us, shall be printed for our use, it is gravely objected by Senators that we ought to refuse to print the information; in other words, we ought to refuse to receive the information in the sense of being able to have it communicated to us, as we have not yet, because, forsooth, there lies in the imagination of somebody somewhere a belief that at some time, convenient to some political party, some further and additional and assumably counteracting information may be obtained that the people of the United States and the Congress of the United States ought to know also. Let us suppress, therefore, whatever information we do have until we can hunt around and see if we cannot find some other that will be different information from what we assume this information is! That is the proposition.

Mr. President, I venture to say that in the whole history of the Government, in the hottest times of Adams and Jefferson and Aaron Burr, of John Quincy Adams and Jackson, of Van Buren and Harrison, of Buchanan and Lincoln, there never was yet refused a motion to print papers accompanying a message of the President of the United States, unless it was upon the ground—and I know of no such instance as that even—that the information had been already obtained and that it was of no possible consequence to go to the expense of the ink and paper necessary to print it. And yet here virtue and impartiality and the want of passion and that judicial mind which some people claim that they possess lead us to refuse to avail ourselves of the information that the President under the circumstances has felt it to be his duty to send to us, because we have a suspicion, owing to this entirely unprejudiced state of our minds, that something may be trumped up hereafter in some way or found somewhere that will show another side and a different kind of information from what has been sent us. That is the proposition. If any Senator wants to stand in that attitude and refuse to vote to print this, very well. All I have to say in addition is, that I ask for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the motion to print.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, if it were possible that this testimony could be winnowed by some impartial hands and the chaff taken from the real grain, I should have no objection whatever to the printing of that which was true and proper for consideration. The Senator from Ohio who was in Louisiana during the examination before the returning board [Mr. SHERMAN] has already told us that there were three classes of testimony in this vast batch upon the Secretary's table. He has told us that there was the stenographic report of the proceedings which took place before the board in the presence of the gentlemen who were visiting as spectators, that there was another class of testimony which came with the statements and returns of the supervisors of election in the various parishes, and then there was a third and last class made up of affidavits taken by parties themselves before United States commissioners.

Now for my part I would have no objection to printing the proceedings which took place before the returning board, the oral testimony taken under examination and cross-examination and in the presence of the responsible gentlemen who sat in that room and heard this testimony orally delivered. I would go a step further and consent to the publication of the statements made by the supervisors of election under the law of Louisiana. But, Mr. President, there I would stop. And why? Because we have before us the testimony of respectable witnesses in Louisiana and also of witnesses who have been guilty of acts heretofore which ought to have consigned them to the penitentiary in manufacturing this third class of testimony that we now propose to spread before the country. In this very building, under the examination of the Committee on Privileges and Elections and under the conduct of the former Senator from Wisconsin, we have had the revelation disclosed to the country that an affidavit-mill existed in Louisiana where they ground out affidavits by the bushel, and if they are to go before the country let the country know and understand what kind of affidavits are made in Louisiana, before you undertake to print this third class of the testimony upon which this returning board acted. Now, I propose, for human memory is frail and we often forget the character of testimony laid before the Senate in the various reports that are made from year to year, to read a part of the testimony taken before the committee and returned and reported by Mr. Carpenter at the time he made his report, he having conducted a part of the examination. The testimony is on page 520 of the report and testimony reported to the Senate on the 20th of February, 1873. It is the testimony of Theodore Jaques. On the inquiry as to how many votes he had manufactured this was his reply, and I will read all relating to that branch of the case:

Question. After the election was over you returned to New Orleans?
Answer. Yes, sir.
Q. Then did you return to Plaquemines?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What for?
A. To take affidavits.
Q. How many did you take?
Mr. RAY. If these inquiries are gone into we must go into every parish in the State and inquire in regard to every affidavit taken.
The CHAIRMAN. I understand that this proof is to show how these affidavits, which were before the Lynch board, were gotten up.
Mr. WARMOTH. We can show the same thing existing in every parish.
The CHAIRMAN. The examination may proceed.

By Mr. WARMOTH:

Q. Did you see many of these people yourself?
A. Yes, sir; three hundred and one.
Q. How many affidavits did you take on the spot?
A. To many parties I just read it to them in blank, and told them they were cheated out of the vote. That made them angry. They said they did not vote.
Q. What reasons did they give?
A. Many said they didn't care and many said it was too far to the polls.
Q. You say you read the affidavit to them?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did any of them sign it?
A. No, sir; only one.
Q. Did any of them authorize you to sign it?
A. No, sir, they only said they wanted to vote, and considered that voting—taking their names.
Q. Who was with you?
A. Judge Prescott.
Q. The United States commissioner?
A. Yes, sir; and three others.
Q. You say three hundred and one persons who said they did not vote?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. How many signed the affidavit?

There were thirteen hundred affidavits!

Q. How many signed the paper?
A. One.
Q. Only one?
A. Only one.
Q. How many did Judge Prescott swear?
A. I suppose not over twenty. He merely said, "You swear;" that is all that was about it; I read the affidavit.
Q. After you saw these people where did you go?
A. To New Orleans.
Q. You live there?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. How many votes did you prepare?
A. Thirteen hundred and fourteen.
Q. Did you sign the names of those people to them?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. The three hundred and one?
A. No, sir; three hundred; there was one signed himself.
Q. You signed the other three hundred?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. And then you signed a thousand more?
A. Yes, sir; ten hundred and thirteen.

Then on the next page, 522:

Q. Where did you get the names?
A. From the poll-books of 1870.
Q. How many of these people voted?
A. A great many voted; I cannot answer how many.

Again:

Q. But you signed their names to an affidavit?
A. I was instructed to make them out so.
Q. I did not ask that. Do you swear that you signed the names of a thousand men to a thousand affidavits?
A. Yes, sir; I put a thousand names to a thousand affidavits.
Q. Without any authority from these men?
A. Yes, sir; for many of the men were men of straw.

Now, Mr. President, I find marks all through these papers; not signatures, but marks all through the papers on the table; and if this class of affidavits, made out in the country with no party to cross-examine the witness when being interrogated upon one side, have been imposed upon Congress in the past, they may be imposed upon Congress to-day. Segregate those affidavits and leave the stenographic report of the testimony taken before the board and the returns of the supervisors of elections, and I will vote now to print that and let it go to the country for what it is worth; but as to the rest of it, I will not lend my sanction without knowing whether they are true or false, to circulate such documents throughout this land to produce an improper impression upon honest men who want to do right and who in order to do right must know the actual truth.

Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Vermont justifies the sending of these papers by the President of the United States to the Senate upon the ground that he is bound under the Constitution to give information of the state of the Union to Congress, that it may take action in regard to questions pending before it. I agree with him that the President has a perfect right to send messages based upon actual information to Congress, but it is his duty in advance to ascertain that the information is true, that it comes to him guaranteed by some respectable indorsement before it is sent to Congress; and my learned friend from Vermont ought not to liken the case of President Grant to-day to that of Washington or Jefferson in the past, because Washington and Jefferson never had a returning board to deal with. It is a creation of the latter-day saints. Therefore, sir, while it was proper in the President to send any information to Congress, and I do not complain of his sending this information, though I think he ought to have withdrawn that part of it which is based upon bare affidavits unsupported by the testimony of the Senator from Ohio, but as regards the other part which was not delivered in his presence he ought to have segregated it from that testimony which was taken under the sanction of examination and cross-examination before the returning board. But I do not wish to commit myself to any action of this returning board right or wrong. It is an unlawful institution in Louisiana to-day. It is the creature of the same senate that sent Mr. Pinchback here with his credentials to take a seat in this body. We repudiated him because the Legislature that sent him was an unlawful body, and this returning board is the creation of the same body that sent him here.

I say then, Mr. President, that while I am willing to vote for the printing of that part of this communication which comes as the testimony before the returning board, which comes as the returns of the supervisors of election, I protest, in the name of fair dealing, in the name of justice, against sending out affidavits when we have before our eyes the experience of what was done four years ago in the State of Louisiana and sent to the Congress of the United States.

Mr. WEST. I do not know, Mr. President, that the Senator from Maryland can be induced to leave the somewhat stale subject of the election of 1872, to consider the election that is now under discussion in this body; but I think he is somewhat at fault in stating that there is any analogy between the testimony that is now submitted here and the character of testimony that was submitted in 1872. His reasoning leads to the conclusion that if there be one perjurer in the State of Louisiana its entire population are not entitled to belief. Let him apply that rule and that proposition to his own State, and he has only to acknowledge in his experience of the criminal law there that there have been instances without number which did not affect the general reputation of the State.

But, Mr. President, it is very convenient to bring up that old case; it is very convenient to recur to the iniquities that were presented at that time in connection with it; but the Senator fails to see what was the fact, that the Senate repudiated it at that time, and that testimony did not weigh, and yet he leaves the intimation that there is similar testimony here. Ah, Mr. President, wait until the affidavit-mill of the democratic party down in Louisiana works that we are asked to withhold our hand from at the present time; wait until we see those machine affidavits, printed in form, as I am told, already, sent broadcast throughout that State to be testified to by anybody that they can get, and you will see machine affidavits in connection with this testimony before we get through. I venture to say there is nothing of that kind in the papers now on the table.

Then, again, without waiting to hear the propositions of the returning board, without waiting for their grounds of justification for their action, they are condemned here in advance upon their construction of the law. The republicans of Louisiana are arraigned because in their representation on that board they did not fill a vacancy. Has anything been heard from them in regard to what dictated that conduct? No; but it is taken for granted that they did not desire and would not permit a democrat to see into the proceedings of that board. How was it when the democrats held the power in that State, when they had control of this election machinery in the State? I do not say that two wrongs make a right, but I say there are charges made here which have never been justified. We are waiting for the justification of our men, and I think we shall have it.

How was it in the election of 1872? Not only was no republican to be permitted on any board, but no republican eye was to be permitted behind the ballot-box or to witness the counting of the votes at any insignificant poll throughout the State. It was conducted by the democratic party and the record of it is here in our testimony. Let me refresh the recollection of the Senate and the country in that regard. The instructions to the democratic officers of election in 1872 were as follows:

First. In counting the ballots after election, count first the votes cast for presidential electors and members of Congress, keeping separate tally-lists on the Form No. 1, provided for that purpose, and making up and completing the statement of votes for each poll, upon Form No. 1. Then close the box, reseal it, and proceed in a similar manner, until all the national votes have been counted.

Then proceed with the counting of the State and parish votes, bearing in mind the fact that the United States supervisors of election and deputy marshals have no right whatever to scrutinize, inspect, or be present at the counting of the State and parish votes.

That construction may be strictly legal, but by that proceeding they shut out every republican United States supervisor, and there was no republican witness behind the ballot-boxes throughout the State in 1872.

Furthermore, an additional circular under date of November 2, 1872, addressed to the president of the State republican committee, said:

In reply to your communication of date, I must respectfully decline compliance with your request to appoint one commissioner of election at each polling-place from the republican party.

Not only on the returning board, but all through the State and at every precinct and every poll where the election was held, the republicans were shut out as participants in that election as officers, and after the count not a republican eye should rest on the proceedings of these officers. Now, can any party that has practiced that so generally and so universally arraign us here for what we have done in the present case until they wait for our answer and our justification?

Furthermore, Mr. President, the testimony and the manner of its submission to this returning board has been commented upon at large. It has been argued that the returning board exceeded its authority and transgressed the law in admitting this testimony at certain stages. How was it in 1872? Take the proceedings of the democratic board, and the testimony shows that weeks and even a month after the ballot-boxes were closed in the most remote sections of the State they took testimony in the city of New Orleans that fraud and violence were perpetrated there and they threw out en masse whole republican parishes. If the republican returning board wanted precedent for their conduct they had it in the course established by the democratic board. It can be shown by numerous witnesses over and over again in the Carpenter report that from three weeks to a month after the cessation of the election it was vitiated and rendered void upon the ex parte testimony of men that were not even in the parishes and saw what was going on.

Another proposition, sir. There is testimony in the Carpenter report also that democratic supervisors of election came to the city of New Orleans and framed affidavits to their returns; they came there without even a poll-list, and they sat down taking the republican tickets and the democratic tickets and tallied off enough to give a democratic majority and never saw a ballot!

But, Mr. President, what was the action of members of the Senate in regard to those returns? The election of 1872 has never been claimed by the republicans in this Chamber upon the returns, whether rendered by one board or the other, and yet we are treated to the testimony of one or two perjurers, and perhaps more, and upon that assertion we are to be led to believe that this testimony just taken is an equivalent falsification and no man in the State is to be believed. I think it is a pretty bad case of the pot calling the kettle black so far as the election of 1872 is concerned, but we have never claimed anything from the hue of our kettle.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MITCHELL in the chair.) The question is on the motion to print, on which the yeas and nays have been called for.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, this is not the time, in my judgment, to pass upon the action of the Louisiana returning board. That time will come. Every man in this Chamber and every intelligent man in this country knows that around and centered upon this election in the State of Louisiana hang consequences as grave as any ever presented to the American people. When the time comes I trust we shall discuss such questions in a spirit worthy of the results which lie within their decision. I will not, however, touch upon the merits of these questions of fact or law, and can only express regret that they have in the discussion of my associates in this Chamber been at all touched upon, although it seems to me the discussion was in some respect made necessary by the action of the honorable Senator from Ohio, the envoy of the President at New Orleans, under whose auspices this paper has been prepared and laid before the Senate. But, sir, I feel that now of all times it is especially proper and essential that the prerogatives of the several branches of this Government should be carefully considered and respected. The measure that I give is the measure that I will demand. Therefore it is, that when the President of the United States, an independent branch of this Government, shall in his discretion, in the exercise of his official duty, perform any act, I propose to treat his action with the respect that is due to his office and to accompany it with that obedience which his legal action demands from me as one of his co-ordinates in the Government of this country.

The Constitution of the United States does in plain terms authorize and require the President of the United States "from time to time to give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient." Therefore, it will be observed that the only communications from the President to either House of Congress, or to both Houses of Congress, are official communications; he can have none other; and it is by virtue and by power of his office that he makes his communications to us, and we receive them as he gives them, assuming, of course, that they are orderly and regular and marked with that respect due from one branch of the Government in the comity of civilization to the other. I know of nothing in the present case of that kind to except to in the present communication. Therefore it is, if this communication comes connected with papers which he considers proper to elucidate the subject-matter, ordinarily my disposition would be to let it be printed for the information of the Senate; and the present motion is, as I understand, that there shall be the usual number for the use of the Senate of these voluminous papers printed.

I have nothing to say in regard to the fact of the great haste with which this has been done, and the apparent unwillingness to yield to a reasonable delay in order that the whole case may appear. The message coming yesterday, being only sent to the committee at the very close of the session last night, and reported back the first thing in the morning, there has been no time lost at least. But although the communications of the President of the United States to either House of Congress must in their nature be official, yet we cannot but observe in the present case—and I consider it proper and just that I should comment upon the fact—that the matters referred to in this communication are not official, do not pretend to be official, are without the sanction of law, and are not connected with the presentation of any recommendation or measure for the action of Congress.

In the first place, let it be noted that the letter now submitted to Congress by the President, and the voluminous documents which accompany it are necessarily intended to be of a one-sided and partisan nature. The President of the United States has authority under no law, there is no color of law whatever, for the appointment of any committee for any such object as he has suggested in reference to an election held in one of the States. It is a voluntary action upon his part, and those who acted under his suggestion are necessarily volunteers. I have nothing to say of the impropriety of the motive either of him in appointing or of these gentlemen in accepting his personal and unauthorized appointment. I mean by "unauthorized," unauthorized by any color of office or of law. The office of the President of the United States no more connects him with the election in a State than does the office of a Senator connect that Senator with an election in a State not his residence. The whole action therefore is without warrant of law, and however laudable may have been his private motive or however conducive it may turn out to be to public justice, the action is without warrant of law either on the part of the appointing power or on the part of these gentlemen who accepted his appointment.

If there should be any doubt about that letter, this report to the President by his appointees and of the testimony which they return and which is admitted to be testimony only and solely of one side of this contested transaction, that doubt would be removed by a scrutiny of the composition of that committee of five gentlemen, well-known, ardent champions of the party of which the President of the United States is the chief agent. Therefore, having deliberately excluded those who may be called independent or disinterested men and having selected gentlemen well known for their ardent championship of the party to which he and they belong, necessarily he did not intend to act through official channels and to obtain that species of independent action which is supposed to be inherent in official action, for officials are bound by oath and officials are bound by a sense of duty, if they regard it, to their country, and not to their party. Therefore it is that everywhere official information is held to have more weight and official certification to be more binding than that of mere partisans, however worthy may be the private character of those partisans.

But, Mr. President, this other fact appears on this transaction, that the gentlemen so selected by the President of the United States to form his committee went to the city of New Orleans at his request, at his suggestion, to inspect and scrutinize the action of a certain board of officials in the State of Louisiana, and to return to him as their party chieftain, not as the President of the United States, their information, their results of fact and law as they should ascertain them by personal inspection. When this committee reached that city they found there another body of volunteers, gentlemen of high intelligence and character, well known to them personally and possessing their personal confidence and respect, who, immediately acting on the part of the opposite political party of this country, the democratic, proposed to co-operate with the President's committee in order that there should be the additional force given arising from a mixed commission of differing views, who should if possible come to a common opinion in regard to the facts. But this proposition of the committee on behalf of the democrats was rejected by the President's committee, and not only rejected for reasons which they gave, but it was an absolute rejection, because, had they, to use the common parliamentary phrase, concurred in the proposition with amendments or with qualifications, it may well be that they would have found ready co-operation on the part of the democrats to act with them on their own terms and take from these committees that one-sided and partisan color which necessarily otherwise would be inherent in each.

The proposition of the democratic committee or of the committee on behalf of the democrats, for I do not know that the gentlemen who form that committee would be willing to bear that party name, was not accepted. They were acting with the democratic party. If their proposition had contained anything exceptionable and the substance of it, however, which was co-operation for the purpose of destroying the partisan features of this examination had been acceptable, the President's committee could have suggested "leave out certain features of the propositions you have made and we will accept the substantial proposition, which is, that we shall act together," there would then have been no doubt but that we should have had a combined scrutiny by these two committees and we should have had at least an attempt to agree upon a common conclusion of law and of fact. But that was made impossible by the action of the President's committee who not only rejected the proposition made to them to meet and act in co-operation with the other side, but they never even suggested any terms upon which they would be willing under any circumstances so to meet and act, and so the fact seems to be admitted on both sides that this investigation was made by each separately, one on one side, one on the other side, confessedly. The testimony prepared by the President's committee has been brought speedily into the Senate; the testimony prepared by the committee on the other side is not yet here.

Now the proposition of the President's committee that the other side should subject to them their testimony and leaving them to draw and state only their own conclusions and report upon it, was certainly inequitable, and with all due respect to them, unreasonable and never could have been expected to be acceded to, and the common sense of justice would revolt at it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will my friend allow me?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to interrupt the Senator from Delaware; but if he will allow me, I desire to state, not only on behalf of the republican committee, but on behalf of the democratic committee, that I do not think either committee took depositions. Certainly the gentlemen who went by the President's request took no depositions whatever. To my knowledge there was no affidavits taken by them or suggested by them; and I think that is true of the democratic committee also. They were there rather in the light of spectators, and certainly we took no part in the examination of witnesses in any respect.

Mr. BAYARD. It is a matter for the present quite unimportant in the aspect in which I was discussing this case whether this testimony, so called, was taken by the President's committee or by the opposition committee. The question is whether this testimony was one-sided, and therefore incomplete; and what I mean to say is that, let the testimony have been taken by whom it may, it is here a one-sided presentation of the case, and that I say is what the honorable Senator from Ohio says as a member of the President's committee he sought in some degree to rectify, and how? Not by asking the opposition committee to go with him and sit upon the case and join him and his party friends in the conclusions to which they came, but to give them their facts and let them, the President's appointees, draw their own and the only conclusions! I have been, as you, sir, have been, concerned heretofore in representing parties in litigation, and I never heard that a counsel representing one side of a case would hand over his brief and proofs and be bound by the arguments and conclusions to be drawn by his opponent; and yet that was the refreshingly cool proposition of the President's committee in New Orleans. Therefore it is that I say that as a matter of simple justice in my mind, that will appeal to that sense of fair play which I trust and believe does distinguish the American people, when a case is to be heard both sides shall be heard. That is all that is asked or suggested, as I understand, by the honorable Senator from Ohio who sits nearest to me, [Mr. THURMAN.] He simply asks that there may be a moderate delay in order to permit the facts on both sides to appear, and to appear through the same channel.

As I said before, this report to the President is wholly unofficial. The gentlemen making it have no color of authority or office; they make it under the sanction of no law; they make it under the color of no legality. It is a purely party report of his committee selected by him from his party associates and friends. Its conclusions of law and its conclusions of fact are simply those of five citizens of the country who, at the close of a heated political canvass, in which they have been all actively engaged, are acting under no law, but solely as members of one political party at the call of their political chieftain. The affidavits and the testimony, as I say, are but on one side, and they form at best that most dangerous and delusive of things, a half truth, which proverbially is more delusive than a whole falsehood.

But, Mr. President, there is this official color given to these communications: although the information is not drawn from an official source, nevertheless they are transmitted by an officer of the Government and he the highest and an independent branch of the Government, to the legislative branch. He does take cognizance of the facts attending this election and of the influence of those facts not to that State alone but to the entire Union, and he commits them to both Houses of Congress, not for mere advertisement, not to form (if such a thing is to be imagined) a mere party placard, but he commits them for consideration and invokes to that subject and to those facts the attention of Congress, evidently to submit to their jurisdiction the subject-matter to which this communication relates.

Mr. President, there can be no graver question to fill the hearts and the minds of the American people and of their representatives in these two Houses of Congress than the subjects which are touched upon and the decisions and principles which are involved in the consideration of the transactions referred to in this message. Therefore it is that I shall by my vote exclude no light, exclude no fact that will tend to better inform me of the truth and right of this transaction. At the same time I believe that we should approach its consideration with due regard to all those rules of justice and of law that govern men in their transactions of much less importance. To know the truth of a case you must have before you both sides of the case, both sides must be presented. No matter what the case may be, there never was a case yet that had but one side; and therefore it is that while my vote shall not oppose the printing of these documents, at the same time my vote shall be given, if the measure can be carried, of reasonable delay for the purpose of enabling both sides to come together and through the same channel, touched by the same degree of official recommendation and authority, so that the facts shall not only come to us, to be tried by us as I hope judicially, but shall go before that other and grander court to which all our actions and every vote must finally be submitted; I mean the bar of an upright, honest popular opinion. It is by that, in the end, that the institutions of this country are to stand, or it is for the want of that they are to fall. Therefore it is that I desire upon this subject, with all its gravity, with all its far-reaching importance, to construe fairly and apply strictly every rule of evidence that conduces to the elucidation and establishment of truth.

I hope that the opportunity will be given, especially after the statement of a gentleman so well known and respected as my honorable friend from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] that the papers showing the other side of this story may be speedily presented, that there may be a short delay for the purpose of having that accomplished.

Mr. President, in the face of the events in which we stand, none of us can maintain our positions unless we rest upon our consciences and upon the truth of the law. A man's foot must be planted upon the rock of law and truth. Partisan trick or shuffling or evasion or anything which is unworthy of consideration in the face of such high duty as we have now brought before us will be found sand and not rock. Neither the party nor the man can stand upon the shams of constitutional government from which have been subtracted that common honesty, that honor, that truth, which are the essential elements of American government.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, we have been instructed that no partisan trick, no shuffling, no evasion will be tolerated in this matter by the great jury of the American people. I trust, sir, that this is true and that the public condemnation will light with scathing force upon any party which endeavors to rob government of its honor or discharges the functions submitted to the rulers of States in such manner as to defeat the honest judgment of the American people. I will not refer in this connection to matters to which I alluded briefly yesterday, the crimes of violence committed in the South. Senators have loudly declaimed of their own conscientiousness, and I believe sincerely. They think they accurately describe themselves. I wish to call their attention, and that of the American people, to the gross inconsistencies in democratic treatment in different States of the grave matter of what constitutes a valid elector in the college. Gross inconsistencies are committed in the various States by democratic governors and other officers, the apparent end in each case being to secure votes for Tilden at any sacrifice of justice and consistency. Why talk so loudly of fairness, of impartiality, of respect for the honest judgment of the people, and have no words of condemnation for such things as these, while denouncing with bitter vituperation the efforts of republicans to have an honest count of honest votes?

I wish to call attention to some divergent cases. A case arose in New Jersey where two men were disqualified under the Constitution of the United States to act as electors or to be elected as such. A protest against certificates in favor of these electors was filed before the board of canvassers, considered, and rejected or neglected. A protest was then filed showing these facts before the governor of the State, a democratic governor, (and the majority of the board were democrats,) and he refused to pay any attention to it, to act upon it, to question the right of these persons to receive the certificates, and they constituted a portion of the electoral college to which they were apparently elected, and cast their votes for Tilden.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President——

Mr. SARGENT. I am told——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I should like the Senator from California to tell me precisely where he gets that information.

Mr. SARGENT. I got that information from the same sources that the Senators get it who speak so fluently of the affairs of Louisiana. I got it by the avenues of public information. I have stated my information as I received it through the newspapers and also from intelligent citizens of New Jersey. If I am in error in either of the statements I have made, I shall be very happy to have the Senator correct me.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I can say that the State board of canvassers of New Jersey appointed by the governor of the State is made up of three republicans and three democrats selected from the State senate; that the governor is the presiding officer of that board; that the protest to which the Senator from California alluded was received, was duly acted upon, and by a majority vote laid aside. That is all there is about it.

Mr. SARGENT. What action did the governor take?

Mr. RANDOLPH. The governor acted simply as presiding officer of that board. He voted.

Mr. SARGENT. That made the democratic majority to which I have alluded. Furthermore, the protest was handed to the governor bringing this disqualification to his attention as the executive of that State, the officer who was to sign the certificates of the electors. Has the Senator any knowledge of what action the governor took when the protest was thus transferred to him?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I have no official information on the subject, but I can say that the protest was entered as to a single individual, Ex-Chancellor Williamson of that State; that when the board convened yesterday so informed, the Ex-Chancellor omitted to act as an elector; that a gentleman was placed in his stead, and that that gentleman who was not disqualified, or against whom no protest had been entered, did qualify and did act.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator answer me the question whether the governor of New Jersey held that the republican candidate for elector receiving the highest vote was elected on account of the disqualification of that person, and issued to him a certificate and authorized him to act? I mean the republican elector, the person receiving the highest vote as elector on the republican ticket. Did the governor or this democratic board grant to him a certificate showing his qualification to act in New Jersey?

Mr. RANDOLPH. The Senator has the same means of information that I have. Neither of us has very much just now, as the action of the board took place only twelve or twenty-four hours ago.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator evidently can give me no further information, and he will please excuse me. This is the way in which this matter was treated in democratic New Jersey, treated by a democratic governor and by a democratic board of canvassers. The governor disregarded the protest. He did not recognize any republican as elected. I do not say that the course which he and the board pursued was not exactly right. I am not questioning that for the purpose of this argument. I intend to show that the opposite thing was done in a republican State where a democrat was governor by accident. I intend to show that the people of the State of Oregon have been directly defrauded of their intelligent judgment in the election; that the whole electoral college has been stripped, and that not a republican, though two were elected beyond all question without disqualification of any kind whatever, has been allowed to sit in that college. That governor has been elected as a member of this body. I call the attention of Senators to the fact that a man who has been elected to this body would do that which I propose to state; that is to say, it being alleged that Dr. Watts, one of the three republican electors and elected by eleven hundred majority, on the day of election was a postmaster, which office he resigned the day thereafter, the governor gave to a man by the name of Cronin, who had the highest vote on the democratic ticket and who was defeated by about eleven hundred majority, the certificate of election, and not merely the certificate of election, rejecting Watts, but put into his hands, in violation of the direct statute of Oregon, the certificates of the other two republicans who were elected; and that this man Cronin organized himself into an electoral college of that State, and, excluding the other republican electors duly elected, that he named two democrats to sit with him who cast two votes for Hayes and he himself voted for Tilden, and the governor certifies this nugatory act here to Congress.

I say that here is a "partisan trick," "shuffling," "evasion," in the language of the Senator who preceded me. Is it not? If the governor of New Jersey did right in giving the certificate in that State to the disqualified person and then this person qualified himself by resigning, and being re-elected by the body of electors, or some one else was elected, what shall we say with reference to this action of the governor of Oregon? If the governor of New Jersey did right the governor of Oregon was grossly wrong. We are told that returning boards commit enormities; that two or three years ago one did, which was by inference condemned by a committee of the Senate; and that republicans hesitated to sanction that which they did; therefore the returning board is a bad system and this returning board, which contains not a member of a former one, did something wrong, because returning boards do necessarily wrong. The statutes of Oregon make the secretary of state and the governor of that State the returning board of the State to perform the functions of such a board by determining through the canvass of votes who are the electors, and prescribes that they shall give the electors certificates after so doing. It also carefully provides what shall be done with the certificates. I read from page 578 of the Laws of Oregon, title 9:

> The votes for the electors shall be given, received, returned, and canvassed as the same are given, returned, and canvassed for members of Congress.

I will show how that is:

> The secretary of state shall prepare two lists of the names of the electors elected and affix the seal of the State to the same. Such lists shall be signed by the governor and secretary, and by the latter delivered to the college of electors—

Not to one of these electors—

> at the hour of their meeting on such first Wednesday of December.

On the contrary, the governor gave these certificates and duplicates to this man whom he himself had elected. The people of Oregon had rejected Cronin. The governor gave them to him, and he refused to give the certificates to those whom he claimed to be his colleagues; to other members of the board in which he was intruded by the governor. He kept them in his own possession for fear they would meet as an electoral college, as they had a right to do, and fill any vacancy which might occur therein, and as they were authorized to do under the laws of Oregon.

Mr. MITCHELL. He refused to exhibit them.

Mr. SARGENT. He refused even to exhibit them. The law further provides:

> The county clerk, immediately after making the abstract of the votes given in his county, shall make a copy of each of said abstracts, and transmit it by mail to the secretary of state, at the seat of government, and it shall be the duty of the secretary of state, in the presence of the governor, to proceed within thirty days after the election, and sooner if the returns be all received, to canvass the votes given for secretary and treasurer of state, State printer, justices of the supreme court, members of Congress and district attorneys.

The clause which I have just read provides that the canvass of the electoral vote shall be made in the same manner in order to determine who are electors. This "returning board," viz, the democratic governor and the democratic secretary of state, have disfranchised, so far as in them lay, the people of Oregon. They have robbed a State of its suffrages. They have defied both State law and the Constitution of the United States. They have committed an offense against public order and decency.

I do not know whether it is worth while to discuss, in making the point I do, the question whether the governor had any right to grant a certificate to the person claiming the highest number of votes upon the defeated ticket. The mere fact that he gave to this person, Cronin, the certificates of his alleged colleagues, with the use that person made of them, depriving the legal electors thereof, preventing them from having any evidence whatever to transmit to the officer of the Senate that they were electors and that they had received any vote whatever for that office from the people of Oregon, and especially that they had received a majority, is in itself the highest evidence of what the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] calls a "predetermined purpose to do wrong." The case might be allowed to rest there. Talk about your returning board of Louisiana not having filled a vacancy on the board! What do you say of a democratic governor creating a whole electoral college? That is what he has done, selecting all the members in effect, and then certifying to their acts; first taking a man who was defeated by hundreds of majority by a vote of the people of the State, and giving him the power of selecting his associates from a party defeated before the people of that State; giving to one man the power, and that power exercised by him to select two others of his own, the defeated party, who go through the farce, the shameful wrong, the crime, of casting two votes for Hayes, for that is what it amounted to, they doing that act of hypocrisy to the exclusion of the men who were properly, legally, overwhelmingly elected to that position! There is the great wrong that was done, and it is not qualified by any assumption that he did not know the law as did the governor of New Jersey. He put the whole power to act nefariously in Cronin's hands, and then consummated the conspiracy by certifying the wrong to this body, while refusing to recognize in any way the acts of the legal electors.

But I think it is worth while to show that it was not only done with all the badges of fraud, but also done in violation of every principle of law, every principle of common sense ever applied by judges upon the bench. The court of appeals of New York, and I read from volume 50 of their reports, a court which, as I understand, was then composed of a majority of democrats, passed upon this very question; and there is scarcely an authority in the United States or elsewhere that is not to the same point as that made by the court in this case.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the Senator from California allow me to ask him whether the supreme court of California has not ruled directly the reverse on one occasion?

Mr. SARGENT. I think not.

Mr. WALLACE. Was it not ruled so in 15 California Reports?

Mr. SARGENT. I think not. If the supreme court of California has so decided I am not aware of the fact, and if so it is contrary to the current of decisions.

Mr. MITCHELL. I understand that there has been a very recent decision of the supreme court of California to the contrary.

Mr. SARGENT. That is my impression.

Mr. MORTON. It is the most recent decision that has been made.

Mr. SARGENT. I know of cases that never reached the supreme court where it was decided without objection being made, without an appeal being taken. I know of a number of cases in California which came under my own observation, where a contrary rule was held; where it was held that the ineligibility of a candidate of the prevailing party disqualified him, but his opponent was not elected on account of his disability. The New York case to which I refer is The People ex rel. Furman and others vs. Clute, found on page 452 of the fiftieth volume of the New York court of appeals reports. The court state the facts quite succinctly and briefly, and I will read from their statement:

The first question to be considered on this appeal is whether Clute was eligible to the office of superintendent of the poor.

It was enacted by chapter 352 of the laws of 1829 (laws of 1828 and 1829, page 538) that no supervisor of any town should be appointed to hold the office of superintendent of the poor in any county.

In the compilation statutes, commonly known as the Revised Statutes, fourth edition, the text of this act of 1829 is incorporated as "* section 22, chapter 20, part 1, of the Revised Statutes."

In 1853 it was enacted (laws of 1853, chapter 80, page 115) as follows:

"SECTION 1. Section 22 of chapter 20 of title 1 of the first part of the Revised Statutes, fourth edition, is hereby amended so as to read as follows: Section 22. No supervisor of any town * * * shall be elected or appointed to hold the office of superintendent of the poor * * * in any county."

In 1862 the Legislature amended the charter of the city of Schenectady (Laws of 1862, chapter 385, pages 644-661, section 8) and enacted that the supervisors of wards to be elected thereunder should be subject to all the provisions of law then applicable to those officers in the towns of the State.

As Clute, in April, 1871, was elected a supervisor of the Fifth ward in the city of Schenectady, and held the office at the general election in that year, he is affected by these several statutes, unless for the reasons urged in his behalf they do not apply to him.

The point was whether he, being a supervisor of the town of Schenectady, could be elected to the office of superintendent of the poor of the county. It was conceded that he was such supervisor and at that election ran and received a majority of the votes cast. The point of ineligibility was raised against him, and that point and another went to the court of appeals, whether this ineligibility would apply to the circumstances of that case, and, if it did, whether the person who ran against him for office and receiving a less number of votes was elected. The court of appeals reviewed at very considerable length the authorities on the matter, and say, as I have said, that the current of decision is nearly all one way. One or two unimportant cases were cited and reasoned against them, but they say that they either had no bearing upon the principle or else were not valuable as authority; and they cite the English decisions which are in strict conformity with the rules which they lay down. They hold in the syllabus here, which fairly represents the text:

Where a majority of the electors, through ignorance of the law or the fact, vote for one ineligible to the office, the votes are not nullities; but while they fail to elect the office cannot be given to the qualified person having the next highest number of votes. The election is a failure, and a new election must be had.

In the case in Oregon by this decision and all the authority to which they refer herein, and which was consistent with the whole body of American and English law, in case the ineligibility of Watts was ascertained, the duty then devolved upon the power which had the filling of the vacancy to cause that vacancy to be filled, and by the law of Oregon it is plainly provided that the electors elected shall fill a vacancy occurring from any cause whatever. By both common sense and principle no defeated person at that election had any right whatever to intrude himself or be intruded into the electoral college, and certainly had no right to construct that electoral college, beginning with himself as the foundation and putting stone upon stone until every part of it was his handiwork and none of it that of the people or the legitimate appointing power. Talk about partisan tricks! What more stupendous trick than this was ever played in the face of the American people for partisan ends? It is a well-known fact that Oregon was flooded, as was California while there was any hope of it, with telegrams emanating from New York stating that "we must have that State at all hazards." I saw some of those telegrams myself. They said "a single vote must be had, and it must be had from Oregon."

Mr. CLAYTON. That was after the election?

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir; after the election. They said it must be had from Oregon or it must be had from California, and so they got up this partisan trick. Talk about shuffling! Here is a whole electoral college shuffled out of sight. Evasion! It is well to use phrases like these in the presence of facts like these. These facts cast a flood of light upon the acts and intents of the democratic party. The people of the country can understand just what was done in Louisiana, just what was done in South Carolina, what in Florida, ay, what in Mississippi; what in any of those States which were bull-dozed, by what was done here in the light of day before a community like that of Oregon, where the parties met peaceably, assembled and cast their votes. It was yielded up that the republicans had honestly and fairly carried the State, and then they came in with desperate tricks, shuffling and evasion, in order to cheat them out of their rights, put a false voice in their mouths, to shuffle in by their apparent vote a President whom they repudiated by their vote. Shuffling! Evasion! I thank God that one whole centennial passed, one hundred years in the history of the American people, before its history recorded an incident like this.

The court of appeals of New York say with reference to this case which I cited:

To give the office to the relator—

That is, to the person who claims it, he having a minority of the votes cast—

it is first to be presumed, as a matter of law, that near three hundred of those who voted for Clute—

That is, the ineligible person who received a majority—had knowledge of the fact that he was supervisor; had knowledge of the existence of the act of 1853: and knew that the fact and the law, concurring thus, he was ineligible to receive and avail himself of their votes in his favor, and knew that their votes given to him were wasted, without effect upon the count.

It is to be presumed further, that knowing this, they all, though seemingly desirous of taking an effectual participation in the choice of a person to the office of superintendent, deliberately so acted as that they are assumed to have persisted against knowledge; determined to "do nothing but tender their vote for him."

It is not in accordance with common sense, and we find no rule or authority so stringent as to compel us to that result.

Yet this is just the result that was reached in Oregon; and the highest court in New York, controlled by democratic influences at the time, declares there is no rule of common sense that justifies it. But the case is more extreme in Oregon. The court say that three hundred persons, in order to seat the relator in the case they were discussing, were to be presumed to have done an absurd thing, that is, to have cast their votes intending that they should be blank; but in Oregon it is necessary to presume that 16,000 of them did that very absurd thing, more than one-half of the voting population of the State, eleven hundred more than one-half.

I might refer to the Vance and Abbott case, decided in the Senate, where it was held and so voted, I believe, unanimously by democratic Senators, that the disabilities of Vance did not cause the election of Abbott; that Abbott had no claim because the man who had received a higher vote than he had was ineligible under the Constitution of the United States. The decision of the Senate stands parallel with this case in New York. Senators will find it useful to read this New York decision at length and trace out the authorities therein referred to, both in English and American courts, all going to establish the point that a person defeated at an election cannot on account of the ineligibility of his opponent be elected by any canvassing board, court, or any other declaring power on earth. That is the way the matter stood in Oregon on the day that, acting as a returning board under the laws of that State, these democratic officials smothered the voice of the State, kept away the certificates from those who were elected beyond any question whatever, and gave them to a person no more entitled to cast the vote or vote in that body than one of the pages in this Chamber. That person proceeded then to reconstruct wholly the electoral college. If a President could be made by means like these, then the spirit of our institutions is gone; ay, the very forms of American liberty are lost; we are in chaos and anarchy; and I want now to hear democratic Senators rise in their places, as they are accustomed to do when there is any act of democratic officials in question, and defend it, and give us the grounds on which Governor Grover's action can be defended.

Mr. MERRIMON. I wish to ask the Senator whether as a lawyer he is not familiar with the fact that there are respectable decisions both ways upon this question that he is making before the Senate?

Mr. SARGENT. I was careful to state that I did not base my judgment in this matter simply upon what the law was, whether the governor had a right to give a certificate to Cronin or not, although I believe, as was declared by this democratic court of appeals in New York, that the great current of authorities, both English and American, is in favor of that view of the matter, and as the court of appeals say, common sense compels to that conclusion. But I asked what right had he, even if he recognized Cronin, to give him not only the evidences of his right to sit there but those of his colleagues, and for this man Cronin then to go and make a college and refuse to recognize those unquestionably elected to sit with him, to fill up the places which they should hold, push them from their stools and put dummies there to cast votes, men not known to the people, men not nominated, not elected, men put there simply to carry out "a predetermined wrong" which was designed at the time that this shuffling, this trick, was gone into.

Mr. MERRIMON. If the appointment of Cronin was lawful, and he was a lawful elector, the governor had as much right to deliver this return to him as to the others.

Mr. SARGENT. No, sir.

Mr. MERRIMON. Surely in the one case or the other it does not present a case for charging the governor with corruption, the governor of New Jersey or the governor of Oregon.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator is wrong, in that he misunderstands the law of Oregon, and I read it clearly, which states that it is the duty of the governor "to present to the college at their hour of meeting" the certificates of their election. He did nothing of the kind. He gave them to this man Cronin. This man Cronin kept them in his own pocket, in his own possession, refused even to exhibit them, and carried out this obvious predetermined purpose for wrong. I know of no language that better expresses the conspiracy against the American people which was there hatched by that democratic governor and that democratic secretary of state and those supposititious electors in Oregon.

Mr. MERRIMON. Will my friend allow me to read two sections from the Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies, by Cushing, in order to show the state of the law in this country and in England also?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HITCHCOCK in the chair.) Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator will have an opportunity to make his speech after I get through, and I decline to yield. I have asked Senators if they defend the action of the governor of Oregon in this matter.

Mr. MERRIMON. I shall neither do one thing nor the other. What I want to show is that these officers in one State or the other may have been very honest in the course they pursued, and that there are respectable decisions in England and in this country both ways. Here I understand is a case in California, placed in my hands now, sustaining the course of the governor of Oregon.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator from California yields to me a moment. I desire the attention of the Senator from North Carolina in answer to the question as to whether there were not certain decisions by certain courts to the effect that the minority man was elected in a case of that sort. There may be a sporadic case of that kind, but I say to the Senator that there is no decision in any court in America or any place else to the effect that in a case of that kind a mere ministerial officer, whose plain duty under the law was simply to give the certificate to the person having the highest vote, had a right to go behind that and adjudicate upon the question as to whether the person was eligible or not; and that is just precisely what Governor Grover of Oregon has done in undertaking to set aside the will of the people of that State.

Mr. MERRIMON. The point I want to make is not controverted, that there are decisions both ways; and therefore there is no ground for making a charge of corruption against these officers.

Mr. MORTON. I do not believe one decision can be found to the effect stated.

Mr. LOGAN. I will call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to a case from his State in the Senate, the case of Vance and Abbott.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am willing to say to my friend from Illinois that so far as my opinion goes I think the case of Vance and Abbott was properly decided. That is my view of the law, but others quite as respectable as myself think otherwise. One of the ablest lawyers of the country who occupied a seat on this floor at that time thought otherwise, and he made a long and labored argument to show that his position was the true one.

Mr. LOGAN. What I wished to call attention to was that this precise point was decided in the case between his colleague and Abbott in the Senate of the United States, not by a partisan vote but by a large majority vote of the Senate. I made the report myself from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and it was discussed for days and decided on this very point.

Mr. MERRIMON. I think you decided right, but other lawyers thought otherwise.

Mr. SARGENT. I have not had time to examine the authority which the Senator referred me to, the old authority of fifteenth California. The Senator can examine it, but I can inform him that a recent unreported decision of the supreme court of California decided exactly in accordance with this decision of the court of appeals of New York. That is the law in the opinion of the supreme court of California. I insist that that is the law; that it is so held by the highest and gravest courts in this country, and that there is not a decision worthy of consideration that goes to the contrary, either in this country or in England. But that is not the point I was making. I am willing to leave that part of the discussion to some other occasion. While I hold that the governor had no warrant of law for his action in declaring Cronin an elector, yet if he had, he proceeded in such a manner in doing it as apparently to show a predetermined purpose to exclude the other republican electors from their rights in the electoral college. I want to call attention again to the Oregon statute in that matter and ask what defense there is for this governor, having made this his creature, and putting all the certificates in his hands to enable him to enact a fraud which he proceeded at once to carry out of excluding the duly elected electors of the State from discharging their functions and then putting his official seal to his acts? The statute provides:

> The secretary of state shall prepare two lists of names of the electors elected and affix the seal of the State to the same. Such lists shall be signed by the governor and secretary, and by the latter delivered to the college of electors.

To the college of electors, not to one of the electors. When? On the street or in his own office? Not at all. The statute is ample and explicit:

> At the hour of their meeting on such first Wednesday of December.

If the governor did otherwise he violated the law. A violation of the law carries with it a presumption of fraud. Certainly for an intelligent man as he should be, to be governor of a State and to be a member-elect of this body, he knew this law. It was not left for him to discover it himself. His attention was called to it right then and there by those most interested, by the electors elected, against whom no disqualification was alleged. They claimed their certificates, and the governor would not give them, but he gave them to this man Cronin, whom he elected, as I said before, as a member of the college.

When we hear so much of the attention of the American people, that their eyes are fixed upon Washington, that they are watching our proceedings, that they are jealous lest something shall be done which savors of fraud, and democrats make long exhortations and fill republican ears with assertions of this kind and reflections of this kind, I say to them let them examine the nefarious proceedings of their governor and secretary of state and their assumed electoral college in the State of Oregon. Let them defend that if they can, and when they can clear their skirts of that, then let them, if there is reason for it, denounce returning boards in Louisiana. Here is their returning board, and with a statute guiding its acts, and it so proceeds that, although it is admitted by the very parties acting that men were elected as presidential electors, those men are shuffled out of the electoral college, and it is filled up with dummies in their place who go through the form of an election in order that one vote may be stolen and consummate the election of Samuel J. Tilden.

When I see things like this transpiring in this country under the patronage of such a party and by its eminent men elected to office, men who hereafter we presume will come forward and take the oath in this body, I am prepared to believe those things which I heard in the distant Pacific when I was busy there with my own people, exercising my rights there as a citizen, that New York City and Brooklyn and Jersey City would be overwhelmed by stupendous democratic frauds. I am prepared to believe those things that were alleged to have taken place under democratic auspices in 1868 in New York City, where in some wards the democratic vote was greater than the whole population of the ward. I am prepared to believe that there was some purpose in the effort made at the last session of this Congress to repeal all laws upon the United States statute-books which prohibited fraud at elections and pointed out the methods of detection and punishment. I am prepared to believe that it was an intelligent design which would sweep from the statute-books laws of that character. I am prepared to believe almost any of the allegations made against the democratic party, that it resorts to fraud in order to get control of this Government, when I see a whole electoral college destroyed in what they are so fond of calling a sovereign State, and every member of it cast out in defiance of the will of the people clearly ascertained, the admitted will of the people, ascertained by an election not disputed in its results, and men that the people never heard of in that connection put therein to cast the vote of the State for the highest office of the nation.

No, sir, it does not do to talk about republican frauds. It does not do, when such things as this transpire, to say that we republicans are seeking to control this election by fraudulent votes, by substituting electors by partisan trick, by shuffling, or evasion. We are resisting those things. We have been resisting them for years past, both in the North and in the South. We have been endeavoring to prevent these frauds which defile registrations and corrupt elections. We have been endeavoring to protect every man in the United States who has a right to vote in the right to cast that vote once, and but once. That has been the tendency of republican legislation, that has been the desire of the republican party.

I believe from my own consciousness that the republican party would not secure the control of this country unless they could do it by fair and honorable means; that they would not accept the Government of this country provided they had to wade through such frauds as those to which I have referred in order to do it. I believe the republican party think that there may be even a worse thing than a democratic administration of this Government, and that is that such democratic policy should prevail, and our elections should be poisoned by fraud. The republican party desires and has desired during these past years when we have been engaged in this struggle not only the unity of this country, but purity in elections, the fair, unbiased, unintimidated voice of the people. If I did not believe it I would not associate my life with it; I would not give it my allegiance. I would not adhere to a party that I thought would build itself up by fraud or which would wrongfully seize upon the Government.

[Mr. MITCHELL at this point offered a resolution in regard to the occurrence in Oregon alluded to in the debate, which will be found n a subsequent part of the proceedings.]

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the Senator from California has broached the discussion of a question this afternoon on which I desire to say a word. I had intended to speak to it upon another occasion with more ample preparation than I can have this afternoon, but I desire to say a word now before an adjournment takes place. The question is whether where votes are cast for a person who is ineligible the effect is to elect the minority candidate. I do not think there can be such a case found anywhere. We have settled the question just the other way in this body on three several occasions. It has recently been settled in the House of Representatives in a very conspicuous case well known to all, the case, I believe, of JOHN YOUNG BROWN. The present Senator from Massachusetts farthest from me [Mr. DAWES] was the chairman of the committee of the House, and he made the report to the House upon that occasion, and I believe the report was sustained in the House by a large majority.

Mr. DAWES. I think the record shows that the report was sustained by a vote of 102 to 30.

Mr. MORTON. The furthest any of the authorities have gone is where there was direct notice of the ineligibility of the person to the voters. Where the voter had knowledge at the time he cast his vote that the person voted for was ineligible, it has been held in certain cases in England that the votes were lost and should not be counted; but that is not the American doctrine. The American doctrine is just the reverse; but the English doctrine is not broad enough to cover the case. English authorities have gone to this point:

If, before the election comes on, or a majority has polled, sufficient notice has been publicly given of his ineligibility, the unsuccessful candidate next to him on the poll must ultimately be the sitting member.—Haywood on County Elections, page 535.

Again:

If an election is made of a person or persons ineligible, such election is void, where the ineligibility is clear and pointed out to the electors at the poll.—Male on Elections, page 336.

Again. Clerke on Election Committees, page 156, said:

Whenever a candidate is disqualified from sitting in Parliament, and notice thereof is publicly given to the electors, all votes given to such disqualified candidate will be considered as thrown away.

Roe on Elections, page 256, said:

It will be seen that the latter proposition is that which constitutes the law in cases where misapplication of the franchise by the electors was wilful, and, therefore, made in their own wrong.

In the case of Abbott and Vance, Vance was disqualified under the fourteenth amendment from being elected to a seat in this body. Abbott claimed that he was elected upon the ground of Vance's ineligibility and that the votes thrown for Vance were not to be counted. That was the direct question. The report was signed in the Vance case by Senator THURMAN of Ohio, Senator Hill of Georgia, Senator LOGAN, and one other Senator. It was argued precisely upon the ground that owing to the ineligibility of Vance the votes thrown for him were to be regarded as nullities, and that Abbott was necessarily elected. It was held by the Senate that the votes thrown for Vance were not nullities, that the votes must be counted, that the election was not void so far as he was concerned, but only voidable, and that Abbott was not elected. The same principle was held in the case of Yulee from Florida many years ago.

Mr. LOGAN. And in the case of Shields, of Illinois.

Mr. MORTON. And in the case, as I am informed, of Shields, of Illinois. I am in fact informed that there are a number of cases in both Houses in which this doctrine has been held; that there is no doctrine better settled in the United States upon any question than upon this subject.

Mr. BAYARD. As the honorable Senator is commenting on the case of Abbott and Vance, as I happen to have the report before me, may I draw his attention to the principle stated there, he being the chairman of that committee? The report states:

The number of persons entitled to vote at a popular election is not fixed and definite, and hence it is impossible to have a quorum or anything answering thereto. There is no power to compel attendance. This is and necessarily must be wholly voluntary; therefore it is necessary that those attending should have the right to elect, where the election is free, and are prevented from attending by force, intimidation, or fraud. If a candidate receiving the majority is disqualified, and the votes cast for him are declared nullities, (as claimed by the memorialist,) the remaining votes are as effectual to elect as if every voter of the district had been present; and if those who voted for the candidate receiving the majority had not been present at all, the election nevertheless would have been valid. But the rule is wholly different in legislative bodies.

I do not speak now upon another principle which strikes me as still more robust and important which underlies that question; but so far as the report of that committee was concerned they placed the case of a person voted for in a legislative body with an ascertained quorum or an ascertainable quorum upon wholly different grounds than where a person was voted for at large by the people en masse, because in one case it is ascertainable and in the other case it is not. That was the reason, I think, why the honorable Senator and his colleagues on that committee stated that the rule was wholly different in legislative bodies from what it was in cases before the people.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to say a word?

Mr. MORTON. After Senators all get through I will resume my speech.

Mr. THURMAN. While we are on this question I desire to say a word.

Mr. MORTON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THURMAN. I shall certainly never forget the case of Abbott in the Senate, for circumstances compelled me to take a more conspicuous part in that case than I ever took in any other. It will be seen by the argument in that case, which was mainly conducted by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] and myself on one side and by the late Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Carpenter] on the other, that the case turned on this question more than on any other, whether Vance was eligible to election. It was maintained on our side that there was a distinction between eligibility to election and eligibility to hold the office; that where the disability was only to hold the office a person ineligible to hold the office at the time of his election might become eligible after election, and could take his seat if he became eligible to hold the office at the time when his term of office should commence; but a person ineligible to election could never be elected at all. That was our position, and we illustrated it in various ways. For instance, the Constitution provides that a man shall not be a Senator unless he shall have attained the age of thirty years. A man may be elected Senator in Congress before he is thirty years of age, but he cannot hold the office unless he becomes thirty years of age before the term of office commences.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not what the Constitution says.

Mr. MORTON. I did not give way for the Senator to make an argument.

Mr. THURMAN. I will wait until the Senator gets through.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator from Delaware did not read quite all the extract to show what we meant. In answer to the English authorities that were urged upon the committee at that time, the committee stated that an election by legislative officers differed from an ordinary election; but the question was discussed by the committee upon principles analogous to an ordinary election, as I shall show.

Here is what the committee said:

If a candidate receiving the majority is disqualified and the votes cast for him are declared nullities (as claimed by the memorialist)—

That was Abbott—

the remaining votes are as effectual to elect as if every voter of the district had been present—

That is, if they are to be as dead—and if those who voted for the candidate receiving the majority had not been present at all, the election nevertheless would have been valid. But the rule is wholly different in legislative bodies. The number is fixed and definite, a quorum can be and is required to act, and the presence of a less number is not effectual. Had but the thirty-two who voted for Abbott been present in the House at the time the vote was cast, we do not suppose any one would contend that he had even a shadow to base his claim upon; yet this number would be sufficient to elect in a district of a thousand voters if no other voted. We therefore coincide in the view that there is a difference, and that, even if the English rule was applicable in the case of an election of a member to the House of Representatives, it would by no means follow that it was applicable to the election of a Senator where the number voting, of the votes counted, is less than a quorum.

I suppose nobody will dispute that. Now I come to the general question upon which the committee discussed it; and it is not to be distinguished away. It was discussed on broad principles. The committee say this:

It appears, therefore, that Abbott rests his claim to the seat solely upon what he assumes to be the legal result of the conceded ineligibility of Vance, who, although receiving a majority of votes, is not entitled to take the oath of office or hold the seat. He assumes that it is a conclusion of law that, if the candidate who has received the highest number of votes is ineligible, and ineligibility was known to those who voted for him before casting their votes, the votes so cast for him are void, and should be considered as nullities and as though they never had been cast; and, consequently, the candidate receiving the next highest number of votes is elected.

The case could not be stated any more strongly than that:

In support of this view of the case the memorialist has called the attention of the committee to a large number of English authorities bearing on this question. While the committee make no question as to the general tenor of the decisions to which attention has been called, yet it is evident that these are based upon a very different rule from that adopted in our country. To show that this rule is different, the committee would refer to the following authorities, which are cited in the very able report of Mr. DAWES from the Committee on Elections, in the case of Smith vs. J. Y. Brown, (Report of Committees, No. 11, second session, Fortieth Congress.)

They then refer to the English authorities, and the general purport is that the votes are to be counted as nullities where they are cast for an ineligible person when they knew of the ineligibility. That is the English rule, but it is not the American rule I have just read from different authorities. They then refer to the English law:

The English law in question does not obtain in the United States, as is clearly shown from the following considerations:

First. The judicial decisions are against it, there being but one decision which sustains it, namely, the Indiana case of 14 Indiana, page 927—

Which I shall refer to by and by—

while on the other hand are the decisions in Maine, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, and California, to which your committee would refer, and from which the following quotations are made:

Here comes the case from the New Jersey reports:

Anderson was elected sheriff of Hunterdon. He had not been three years a freeholder, and was therefore absolutely disqualified, the statute of 1788 having declared that no person shall hereafter be eligible to the office of sheriff in any county in this State, unless he shall be and hath been an inhabitant thereof and possessing a freehold estate in his own right in fee-simple, in the same county, for three years previous to his election.—324.

Held by the court:

That Anderson was disqualified, but that his election was not void. The election of an unqualified person as sheriff is not ipso facto void; it is only voidable. (Syllabus, 318.) Still, however, we think the election not ipso facto void.—Opinion, 327.

In first Chandler's Wisconsin Reports, page 112, in the case of State vs. Giles ex rel. Dunning, &c., the court say:

Two questions arose in this case:

1st. Whether the person holding the office of sheriff at the time of the adoption of the constitution was eligible to that office at the next ensuing election.

2d. If the then sheriff was ineligible, whether the person who, at that election, received the next highest number of votes could be considered as entitled to the office.—13

The mere ineligibility of a person to hold a particular office, and who receives the greatest number of votes, such votes are not a mere nullity, but should be counted by the canvassers. A contestant for the same office, and receiving a lesser number of votes, though eligible, cannot be regarded as elected, and does not thereby become invested with the right to the office.—Syllabus, 112.

It is proper to say that we are all of the opinion that the mere ineligibility of a candidate does not, as the law now is, render void the votes cast for him; that such votes should not be rejected, but should be counted by the canvassers, and that in the event of such ineligible person having the highest number of votes, the person having the next highest number is not thereby elected. If any public embarrassment is apprehended from this, such as that an office may remain indefinitely vacant by reason of a majority of the electors obstinately persisting in voting for an ineligible person, it is within the undoubted power of the Legislature to prevent it by enacting that all such votes shall be deemed void and not be counted.—Opinion, 117.

Again, in fourteenth Wisconsin Reports it was said:

The remaining questions are: 1. Whether the defendant, being an alien, and not a qualified elector at the time of his election, was eligible to the office. 2. If he was ineligible, whether the relator, who received the next highest number of votes cast, is entitled to the office.

The last question has been already settled in this State by the case of the State vs. Giles, (1 Chand., 112.) It was there held by the unanimous judgment of the court that in the absence of a statute declaring it so, the mere ineligibility of a candidate does not render void the votes cast for him; that such votes should not be rejected, but should be counted by the canvassers; and that in the event of such ineligible person having the highest number of votes, the person having the next highest number would not be thereby elected.—Opinion, 498.

The committee then cite fifty-sixth Pennsylvania Reports, where the decision was delivered by Judge Strong, now of the Supreme Court of the United States, as follows:

The votes cast at an election for a person who is disqualified from holding an office are not nullities. They cannot be rejected by the inspectors, or thrown out of the count by the return judges. The disqualified person is a person still, and every vote thrown for him is formal. Even in England it has been held that votes for a disqualified person are not lost or thrown away so as to justify the presiding officers in returning as elected another candidate having a less number of votes, and if they do so a quo warranto information will be granted against the person so declared to be elected, on his accepting the office. (See Cole on Quo Warranto, 141-2; Regina vs. Hiorns, 7 Ad. & E., 960; 3 Nev. & Perry, 184; Rex vs. Bridgé, 1 M. & S., 76.)

Here, according to the decision of Judge Strong, the English authorities do not go to that point, and the strongest English authority goes to the point simply that where the elector when he puts in his vote knows that the person voted for is ineligible his vote is a nullity, but it goes only to those who have actual knowledge of the ineligibility. But that is not the doctrine now.

Under institutions such as ours are there is even greater reason for holding that a minority candidate is not entitled to the office if he who received the largest number is disqualified. We are not informed that there has been any decision strictly judicial upon the subject, but in our legislative bodies the question has been determined. It was determined against a minority candidate in the Legislature of Kentucky, in a case in which Mr. Clay made an elaborate report and was sustained. In 1793 Albert Gallatin, elected a Senator from this State, was declared by the Senate of the United States disqualified, because he had not been a citizen of the United States nine years, and his election was declared void for that reason, but the seat was not given to his competitor. Nobody supposed the minority candidate was elected. There have been several other cases of contested elections in which the successful candidates were decided to have been disqualified, and denied their offices. John Bailey's case is one of them. He was elected to Congress from Massachusetts, and refused his seat in 1824. But neither in his case, nor in any other with which we are acquainted, were the votes given to the successful candidate treated as nullities, so as to entitle one who had received a less number of votes to the office. There is a class of cases in England apparently, but not really, asserting otherwise.—Opinion of the court by Strong, J.

As stated here, there has been no case where when a man elected to Congress or to any legislative body or to any office has been held disqualified the minority candidate has been seated or has received the office because the majority candidate was ineligible. In such a case there is simply no election. This is the universal rule in Congress. The committee go on to say:

This able opinion of Judge Strong, now on the supreme bench of the United States, is well worth careful consideration. Your committee would call special attention to that sentence where it is stated that "the disqualified person is a person still, and every vote thrown for him is formal."

I might take up your time longer, Mr. President, but, not being very well, I will refer to but one other authority and pass it by for to-night. There are many other authorities that can be referred to. In the case of JOHN YOUNG BROWN, in the last Congress, which has been referred to, at the time of his election he was disqualified under the fourteenth amendment, and a man by the name of Smith was the minority candidate; and he contested the election upon the ground that the votes cast for BROWN were nullities, and hence that he was elected, the precise point we have here. After discussing the question at great length, going fully into it, and showing that the universal practice in this country has been the other way, the committee of the House reported the two following resolutions:

Resolved, That JOHN YOUNG BROWN, having voluntarily given aid, countenance, counsel, and encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility to the United States, is not entitled to take the oath of office as a Representative in this House from the second congressional district of Kentucky, or to hold a seat therein as such Representative.

Resolved, That Samuel E. Smith, not having received a majority of the votes cast for Representative in this House from the second congressional district of Kentucky, is not entitled to a seat therein as such Representative.

The resolutions were concurred in by a vote of 130 to 30; and I am informed by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] that there is no exception to the rule as is shown by his report that he submitted to the House. I am further informed that every democrat in the House voted for the resolutions.

Now I come to the Indiana decision, the only one that I know of. It is said there is a California decision to the same effect, but I have been informed by Mr. PAGE, a Representative from California, that within two weeks this very question has been decided by the supreme court of California and it has been held that the minority candidate was not elected.

Mr. SARGENT. And the majority of that court are democrats.

Mr. MORTON. The majority of the court, I am informed, are democrats.

Mr. President, I did not design talking so much on this subject because I was not prepared. I am informed that there are very many authorities going to sustain the doctrine as emphatically the American doctrine, and it may be said to be the English doctrine, except in case of direct notice, that where the ineligible man receives the majority the votes are not nullities, they must be counted; the election is not void but voidable, and the minority man is not elected. That is the ascertained rule of this House and of the other House, and it is stated as the general American doctrine.

Mr. DAWES. I would suggest to the Senator from Indiana that so far as there is any English decision to the contrary it should be construed as a decision under an act of the British Parliament. The British Parliament before that act recorded itself against the doctrine. At first, in the case of John Wilkes, in high party times, the British Parliament adopted the doctrine of the governor of Oregon, but very soon after that the British Parliament reversed their own decision and exscinded from their record their action in reference to John Wilkes. Subsequently to that the British Parliament regulated the whole matter by an act of Parliament prescribing just what should be the force of the ballot, so that when a voter put his vote into the box he knew by an act of Parliament what should be the force of it. Under that act of Parliament all the English decisions that have been cited have grown up.

Mr. MORTON. I thank the Senator for his statement. He has examined this question and I have not. But I want to make one further remark.

Mr. DAWES. But the chief element of it all is that it must be shown that the voter when he put his vote in the ballot-box knew that the person for whom he was casting it was ineligible, and the statute enacted that a vote thus put in should be counted as nothing; so that the voter who put it in knew when he put it in that the statute required that it should have no force whatever, and he was held by the courts to have intended thereby that effect of his vote.

Mr. MORTON. I was simply going to remark that I will not allow myself at this time to characterize this transaction in Oregon. I think that all the parties engaged in it will have to live to the age of Methuselah if they ever get clear of it. But I may venture to refer to an illustration in the conduct of the governor of New Jersey, where a democratic elector was disqualified to vote, and under this rule a republican elector should have been certified, but was not, and I am advised, and I believe the information to be true, that there are at least four and perhaps five instances where democratic electors were disqualified at least to the extent of the man in Oregon; but republican electors were not certified in their places as they should have been according to the rule that was adopted in Oregon. I have simply to say that the conduct of the governor of Oregon, in my opinion, can find no justification in law or morals, or in the tolerance of the people of the United States of all parties.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, when I came into the Senate a few minutes ago, after having been out of it for nearly an hour, I found the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] discussing the question upon which he has expressed his views to the Senate. How the question arose on this motion to print the documents, if they can be called documents, the papers accompanying the President's message, I do not know. But as the question has been brought up, I desire to say a very few words upon it. I shall not enter into a discussion of whether the English rule prevails in this country; but I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that that rule is older than the act of Parliament to which he referred.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator what that rule is exactly?

Mr. THURMAN. I will state it. That rule is this, that if an elector votes for a disqualified person, knowing him to be disqualified, he is held to have renounced his right of suffrage for that election and his vote is not to be counted for any person.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that question what is the rule of evidence? Is it to be presumed that he did know or that he did not?

Mr. THURMAN. That is another question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, and that is the question I put.

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, and upon that I will give the Senator the light of what little information I have. If the disqualification of a person is a public fact of which everybody is bound to take notice or ought to take notice, or where the presumption is that he had notice, then he is held to have had notice although he had no actual notice; but if it is not of that public character, then the notice must be brought home to the voter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish the Senator would produce a little English authority to support that thesis.

Mr. THURMAN. I will at the proper time produce authority that will satisfy my friend that that is the English law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator cannot produce it now, for that is not the English law.

Mr. THURMAN. I did not expect this thing to come up to-day, but my friend from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] puts into my hand Cushing's Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies, which says:

175. If an election is made of a person who is ineligible, that is, incapable of being elected, the election of such person is absolutely void, even though he is voted for at the same time with others who are eligible and who are accordingly elected; (see Male on Elections, 336;) and this is equally true whether the disability is known to the electors or not; whether a majority of all the votes or a plurality only is necessary to the election; and whether the votes are given orally or by ballot.

178. In this country it is equally true that the election of a disqualified person is absolutely void; and in those States where a plurality elects, and where the votes are given orally, as in England, votes given for a candidate after notice of his disqualification are thrown away, and the candidate having the next highest number of votes is elected.

179. In reference to elections by ballot, in which secrecy is the distinguishing feature, and in which, consequently, neither the returning officers nor the electors themselves are supposed to know for whom the votes are given until the result is declared, it seems not unreasonable to consider the votes for ineligible candidates to be thrown away in all cases, and the opposing candidate elected, where the electors know, or must be presumed to know, the disability; and in all cases where there is no such actual or presumed knowledge, to hold the whole proceeding merely void.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator think that supports his proposition of what the English law is?

Mr. THURMAN. I want to make very briefly some remarks.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; but I wish to ask the Senator a question if he will allow me.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator read the authority from Cushing?

Mr. THURMAN. I would very much prefer to state just what I have to say, because I did not propose to go into a discussion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I understand the Senator declines to allow me to ask him a question.

Mr. THURMAN. No, sir; I do not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I will ask it. I ask the Senator whether he thinks the book he has just read supports his proposition as to what the state of the English law is?

Mr. THURMAN. I do, and I will produce further authority if the Senator does not ask me to produce it on the spot, for I came into the Senate without any expectation of this question being sprung upon us, and show the Senate that according to the English law there are cases, as stated by Cushing in his Practice of Parliament, where the voters are presumed to know the disqualification although they had not the actual knowledge of the fact. I will satisfy the Senator on that question at the proper time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Can the Senator tell me what those cases are? Can the Senator give an illustration or example of one of those cases where the presumptive knowledge is supposed to exist?

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator from Indiana asks me to give way to him.

Mr. MORTON. I was just going to call the attention of the Senator to the view which he took of the English law in the Vance case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was last year. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORTON. It was longer ago than that. It was three or four years ago.

Mr. EDMUNDS. O, then it is no authority now.

Mr. MORTON. This is the English doctrine as there stated, from which the committee dissented:

Under the English rule, it is the fact that the voters knowingly and purposely throw away their votes that lays the foundation for saying they assent to the election of the minority man.

Where the circumstances show that they knowingly and willfully throw away their votes.

But no such purpose can be predicated of the Legislature of North Carolina. They did not know that their votes for Vance would be thrown away. They did not purposely throw them away, because Congress had, in numerous cases, previously removed disabilities of a similar character from those elected, and allowed them to hold their offices.

Mr. THURMAN. What the Senator from Indiana has read met my approbation then, it meets my approbation now, and I stand by it, by every word and every letter of what he has read.

Mr. President, I shall not argue the question now. The time will come for it to be argued how far the English rule applies in this country. What that English rule is, I said to the Senator from Massachusetts, was established before the act of Parliament to which he referred. It was established by cases as long ago as the case of the King vs. Monday, Cowper's Reports, page 538, which was long before the statute to which the Senator has referred, if I am not mistaken. The same thing was also affirmed in the case of the King vs. Hawkins, 10 East., 217, and the King vs. Parry, 14 East., 560. Later than that, and after the passage of the act to which the Senator has referred, the English rule was laid down by Lord Denman, chief justice, with great clearness in the case of Gosling vs. Veley, 7 Adolphus and Ellis, in these words——

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator what authority he is reading?

Mr. THURMAN. I am reading from Adolphus and Ellis's Reports, new series, volume 7, page 438.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that the book the Senator has in his hand?

Mr. THURMAN. No, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am asking the Senator what the document he is reading from is? I wish to send to the library to get it.

Mr. THURMAN. I have given the Senator the reference, and he can send for the book.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Well, let us get the book. What volume of Adolphus and Ellis is it?

Mr. THURMAN. Seven Adolphus and Ellis, new series, page 438, and to give the Senator another opportunity to get it, it is in the fifty-third volume of English Common Law Reports. He will find it in that compilation. In that case Lord Denman said:

Where an elector, before voting, receives due notice that a particular candidate is disqualified, and yet will do nothing but tender his vote for him, he must be taken voluntarily to abstain from exercising his franchise; and, therefore, however strongly he may in fact dissent, and in however strong terms he may disclose his dissent, he must be taken in law to assent to the election of the opposing and qualified candidate, for he will not take the only course by which it can be resisted; that is, the helping to the election of some other person. He is present as an elector; his presence counting as such to make up the requisite number of electors, where a certain number is necessary; but he attends only as an elector, to perform the duty which is cast on him by the franchise he enjoys as elector; he can speak only in a particular language; he can do only certain acts; any other language means nothing; any other act is null; his duty is to assist in making an election. If he dissents from the choice of A, who is qualified, he must say so by voting for some other also qualified; he has no right to employ his franchise merely in preventing an election, and so defeating the object for which he is empowered and bound to attend. And this is a wise and just rule in the law. It is necessary that an election should be duly made, and at the lawful time; the electoral meeting is held for that purpose only; and but for this rule the interest of the public and the purpose of the meeting might both be defeated by the perverseness or corruption of electors, who may seek some unfair advantage by postponement. If, then, the elector will not oppose the election of A in the only legal way, he throws away his vote, by directing it where it has no legal force; and in so doing he voluntarily leaves unopposed, i. e., assents to, the voices of the other electors.

That is the language of Lord Denman in that case. Again, in 1854, in the Queen's Bench, Lord Campbell, chief-justice, said:

C clearly was elected counsellor in November, 1851, just as much as if B had not then stood at all. B was, in fact, a candidate, but he was an alderman and therefore ineligible, and that fact was known to the electors. Now, it is the law, both the common law and parliamentary law, and it seems also common sense, that if an elector will vote for a man who he knows is ineligible, it is as if he did not vote at all or voted for a non-existent person, as it has been said, as if he gave his vote to the man in the moon. C was duly elected.—(Regina vs. Coaks, 3 Ellis and Blackburn; 77 English Common Law, 253.)

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator kindly give me the page in Adolphus and Ellis from that newspaper he is reading from?

Mr. THURMAN. Page 438, 7th Adolphus and Ellis, new series.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is that newspaper the Senator is reading from?

Mr. THURMAN. I do not know and I do not care. [Laughter.] The Senator might as well ask me if I had made a brief in my own handwriting as whether or not that was the original book of reports.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is it the case of Gosling vs. Veley?

Mr. THURMAN. Precisely that case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Well, I thought so.

Mr. THURMAN. I am not going to argue the question whether that English law prevails in the United States. That question it will be time enough to argue when it shall come before us in a proper way. What I rose to do was to call the attention of the Senate to it, and especially to it in connection with the case of Abbott, which was before the Senate. There are two kinds of ineligibility. One is ineligibility to hold the office, the other is ineligibility to be elected or appointed to office; and they are very different in their consequences. A man who is simply ineligible to hold the office may be elected to that office, and if he become eligible to hold the office before the term of office commences he may take his seat. A familiar illustration of that is in the case of Senators and Representatives. No man can hold the office of Senator until he is thirty years of age, but he may be elected or appointed before he is thirty years of age, as Mr. Clay was, and if he becomes thirty years of age before his term of office commences he has a right to be sworn in and to take his seat. No man can be a Representative in Congress until he is twenty-five years of age, but he may be elected before he is twenty-five years of age, as John Randolph was, as JOHN YOUNG BROWN, of Kentucky was, and if he become of the requisite age before his term of office commences he may take his seat. Indeed, in the case of BROWN the House of Representatives went further, and I am not certain that they decided right for they allowed him to take his seat, although a large period of the time of the Congress to which he was elected had expired before he became twenty-five years of age. But there can be no question that if a man be elected a Senator before he is thirty years of age and becomes thirty years of age before his term of office commences, he has a right to his seat. If he is elected a Representative before he is twenty-five years of age and becomes twenty-five years of age before his term of office commences he may be sworn in; he has a right to his seat. It was precisely upon that principle that Abbott was held not to be entitled to the seat he claims. Vance received the majority of the votes of the Legislature of North Carolina for Senator. He was then under disability, but the Constitution did not declare him to be ineligible to election; it only declared him ineligible to be Senator, and therefore if his disabilities were removed before his term of office commenced he would be entitled to take his seat, and that had been the universal interpretation of the Constitution both in the House of Representatives and in the Senate. Those who opposed the admission of Abbott put it upon that ground, that Vance was not ineligible to election but only ineligible to be Senator; that he might lawfully be elected, and if his disabilities were removed before the senatorial term commenced he would be entitled to take his seat, and we said in the extract read by the Senator from Indiana, that the Legislature of North Carolina could not have intended to have thrown away their votes, because they knew that again and again men had been appointed to office by the President, men had been elected to office by the people, men had been elected to office by Legislatures who were under disabilities, but their disabilities being removed before their terms of office commenced they were entitled to hold the offices, and were allowed to hold them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. THURMAN. I hope the Senator will not interrupt me. I do not want to make a long speech here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; but I am sure the Senator could answer my question easily enough.

Mr. THURMAN. I hope the Senator will not break the thread of my argument by an interruption.

That was the ground. Now, sir, that there is this distinction is perfectly apparent upon the Constitution itself. Let us see. First, take the case of a Representative:

No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained the age of twenty-five years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States.

A man may be elected a Representative who has not attained the age of twenty-five years and who has not been seven years a citizen of the United States; but if by the time his term commences he is twenty-five years of age and has been for seven years a citizen of the United States, he is entitled to his seat. There the disability is to hold the office; it is not ineligibility to election, but ineligibility to hold the office.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator read the clause of the Constitution?

Mr. THURMAN. I am going to read the next clause if the Senator will not interrupt me. Under the very next clause in the same paragraph the ineligibility is to election:

And who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

There is ineligibility to election. If he is not an inhabitant of the State in which he is chosen, he is ineligible to election, and that is an ineligibility that cannot be cured, though he should the next day move into the State and become an inhabitant thereof. There the ineligibility is to election; in the other case it is only ineligibility to hold the office and not ineligibility to election. Now take the case of Senators:

No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of thirty years, and been nine years a citizen of the United States.

A man may be elected Senator before he is thirty years of age, he may be elected before he has been nine years a citizen of the United States, but if when his term of office commences he has attained the age of thirty years and has been nine years a citizen of the United States, he has a right to take his seat, because there the ineligibility is not to election, but it is to hold the office. But hear the next clause, which is ineligiblity to election:

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President——

Mr. THURMAN. I decline to be interrupted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will not the Senator allow me to ask him about the case of Shields, a democratic authority?

Mr. THURMAN. I will notice it, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is right; do.

Mr. THURMAN. "And who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen." There the ineligibility is to election. If he is not an inhabitant of the State at the time when elected he is ineligible to election and the defect in his title cannot be cured at all. It was upon precisely that ground that, if I am not mistaken, the Senator from Vermont agreed with me and voted with me and I think the whole Judiciary Committee voted with me—I beg pardon for the presumption of saying they voted with me; I voted with them—that General Ames was not entitled to be Senator from Mississippi because he had not been an inhabitant of that State at the time he was elected. It is very true the Senate overruled us. The Senate was in the habit of overruling at that session everything that the Judiciary Committee recommended; so much so that I believe that I facetiously once asked them to abolish the committee, for whatever we recommended was sure to be defeated and whatever we opposed was sure to be adopted. I think my friend from Vermont agreed with me, and he made a very excellent argument, if I am not mistaken, against General Ames taking his seat. Why? Because General Ames was not an inhabitant of Mississippi at the time he came here and claimed his seat? At the time his term of office commenced? Not at all, for he was, but because at the time of his election he was not an inhabitant of that State, and therefore was ineligible to election.

Now, sir, what was the Shields case? Shields was elected a Senator from Illinois, but he had not been nine years a citizen of the United States at the time he was elected and he had not been nine years a citizen when his term of office commenced, and it was upon that ground distinctly that he was rejected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How was it in the case of Albert Gallatin, let me ask my honorable friend, who was naturalized in 1785 and the question arose in 1794? He had been nine years a citizen of the United States.

Mr. THURMAN. Ah! but the Senate decided that he had not been. The Senator is mistaken in his history. It was decided that Gallatin had not been a citizen for nine years. He thought he had been. He relied upon certain acts which he referred to and which he claimed made him a citizen of the United States. The decision was against him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The decision was against him; but the Senator is mistaken, I think, in his recollection. I say it with great deference, as he is so much wiser than I am. I think he will find if he will look at the history—he can take time to do that—that while Mr. Gallatin had not been nine years a citizen of the United States when the Legislature appointed him in Pennsylvania, yet, when his credentials were presented in 1794, and the question was decided, he had been nine years a citizen, and yet the Senate declined to receive him.

Mr. THURMAN. I beg pardon of the Senator. My recollection is precisely the contrary. But if that had been the decision, (and if so it has been overruled again and again since,) it would only go to show that a man could not be a Senator unless he had been nine years a citizen of the United States at the time of his election and thirty years of age at the time of his election; but we know the decisions are contrary to that. We know that Mr. Clay was appointed Senator before he was thirty years of age. We know that Mr. Randolph and JOHN YOUNG BROWN were both elected to the House of Representatives before they were twenty-five.

But, sir, let us proceed further in this matter. I have shown by these two cases of Senator and Representative the difference between ineligibility to election and ineligibility to hold office. Where the ineligibility to election exists, then that man is not chosen, whether the electors knew of his disqualification or not.

If an election is made of a person who is ineligible, that is, incapable of being elected, the election of such person is absolutely void, even though he is voted for at the same time with others who are eligible and who are accordingly elected, (see Male on Elections, 336;) and this is equally true, whether the disability is known to the electors or not.

That is the doctrine laid down by Cushing, and there cannot be any doubt about it. Let me illustrate by the constitution of my own State. It provides that no person holding a judicial office shall be eligible to election to any other office but a judicial one. Now suppose that the people of Ohio should elect the chief justice of the supreme court governor of the State. The vote is absolutely void, although not ten men in the State should know he was chief justice, because the constitution makes him ineligible to election for governor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Would that elect the man running against him, who had only one vote?

Mr. THURMAN. That is another question. I am not going to discuss that. If the Senator from Vermont will only possess his soul in peace for a little while and allow me to proceed, I will give him the whole of the rest of this session to answer.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, my friend from Ohio is so good that I will take him at his word.

Mr. THURMAN. Well, I am delighted to know that the Senator will, because I do not want to be a burden on the Senate by much talking. Let me read the provisions of the Constitution that applied to Vance's or Abbott's case:

No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice-President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may, by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability.

There plainly the disqualification is to hold the office; plainly it is not a disqualification to be elected or appointed to the office, but simply a disqualification to hold the office; and therefore it was properly decided in Abbott's case that Vance was not disqualified to be appointed or elected a Senator of the United States, and that if his disabilities had been removed before his term of office commenced he would have been entitled to his seat. But now let us take the case of electors of President and Vice-President of the United States and see how that stands:

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress: but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

It does not say that no such person shall hold the office of elector, but no such person shall be appointed an elector, thus, by the clearest language, disqualifying him from appointment. I need not say to the Senate that, under the language of the Constitution, an election by the people of an elector of President and Vice-President is an appointment. Here the disqualification is plain that he shall not be appointed, and therefore what I have read from Cushing is true that, whether the voters knew of his disqualification or not, such a man is not appointed. Whether that creates a vacancy, or whether the man who was qualified and who received the next highest number of votes is elected, is another question which I shall not go into now; but, so far as the disqualified person is concerned, there is nothing clearer than that that man is not appointed at all, for he is ineligible to appointment.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask the Senator from Ohio a question?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would inquire of the Senator from Ohio whether, in his judgment, the disability imposed by section 3 of the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution applies to the appointment to or the holding of the office; in other words, whether there is any distinction between the two disabilities?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly there is. Section 3 of article 14 is that upon which Abbott's case was decided, and it only goes to holding the office.

No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice-President, &c.

It does not say "shall not be appointed," but he shall not be an elector. Hence if a man were elected an elector of President and

Vice-President who was under the disability of the fourteenth amendment and his disabilities were removed before he was called upon to act as an elector, he would have a perfect right to act as an elector.

Now, sir, I have said all that I desired to say. All that I wished to do was to call the attention of the Senate to the broad distinction between ineligibility to hold the office and ineligibility to be elected or appointed to the office. In the case of ineligibility to be elected or appointed, it matters not at all whether the elective or appointing power knew of the disqualification or not, because the Constitution has distinctly declared that that person shall not be appointed. No matter what are the circumstances he shall not be appointed. Under no circumstances of knowledge or of ignorance shall he be appointed. That is clear enough. But in the case of ineligibility to hold the office, a person may be appointed who at the time of his appointment or election cannot hold the office, but who, if qualified before his term of office commences to hold the office, is rightfully entitled to possess it. This other question of whether or not in the particular case which has elicited these remarks the person who was qualified and who received the next highest number of votes is elected or not, I shall not now consider. It will be time enough to consider it when that question arises.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio has a peculiarly happy way, in the interest of that judicial impartiality which belongs to him, of taking pains to discuss and dispose of all questions that he thinks are in his favor and to be very careful to omit any reference to or disposition of those that are a little troublesome. He has spent half an hour here in endeavoring to demonstrate that when the Constitution says a particular class of persons shall not be appointed to an office they cannot be appointed to it; but when it comes to the next question, which is the only question that interests anybody, whether somebody else, whom the electors did not intend to appoint to an office and in respect to whom there is not a particle of pretense to-day—but there may be to-morrow—that anybody knew that the party elected was disqualified, can pick up the commission through a governor, he says he wishes to hold himself up for that, because if he were to speak to-day, as I suppose he would say, he would be rather against the baseness of a performance of that character.

Now, the Senator is a little out in his reading of the Constitution. He interpolates certain words. The Constitution says that no person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained the age of thirty years, but it does not read as he stated it; it does not say that no person shall hold or exercise the office of Senator who shall not have attained the age of thirty years; the Constitution says that "no person shall be a Senator," &c. Yet, I take it, it would trouble the Senator from Ohio a little—although he is not to speak again this session, according to his promise—it would trouble him a little at the next session of Congress to show how a man can be appointed a Senator and not be one when he is appointed. The other clause of the Constitution says no person shall be appointed an elector under certain circumstances. If a person is appointed an elector I take it it would rather follow that being appointed an elector he is an elector.

Mr. THURMAN. If my friend——

Mr. EDMUNDS. O, no! O, no, Mr. President, I really cannot. My friend must not forget his promise so soon. [Laughter.] Now, Mr. President, I will hear my friend with great pleasure. He may interrupt me as often as he likes, although he will not give me that privilege when he himself is on the floor.

Mr. THURMAN. The remark of the Senator imports that a man is a Senator as soon as he is appointed. I say he is not. I was appointed nearly two years before I was entitled to take my seat. My colleague was appointed nearly two years before he was entitled to take his. If we were Senators from the time we were appointed then Ohio had three Senators, and not two.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is entirely mistaken about that, he will allow me to suggest. It is totally impossible for anybody who understands human language to say that a being is created and not created at the same time. The sophism of my honorable friend is that, although a man may be appointed or elected a Senator, there may yet be the necessity for something to occur before he shall exercise the function of the office to which he is appointed. The Constitution says in explicit terms, that are as plain as language can make them, that on the day fixed by law for the counting of the votes, which is the second Wednesday in February, the person elected President shall be declared so and so. Very well. Then are there two Presidents between the second Wednesday in February, which happens to be the day fixed, and the 4th of March who are exercising functions? Not at all. There is one President who holds his office for the constitutional term and exercises its functions. There is the other President, who has become to all intents and purposes a President of the United States, waiting the time when he, being President, shall begin to perform the functions that the Constitution imposes upon him. The Senator therefore cannot escape in that way. When anybody is appointed to an office he then is the officer. Whether the scheme of law allows him to exercise the duties of office that day before he is sworn, although his term may have begun, six months may have gone by, (although he cannot do a thing yet he is the officer,) or whether some other person must finish his term before he begins, makes no difference. No man can exercise the office of President of the United States constitutionally until he takes the oath to protect and defend the Constitution of the United States; and yet I take it, if it should happen at any time that a President, elected by the unanimous voice of the people and the electors and the two Houses of Congress and the President of the Senate and everybody else that can be conceived as having anything to do with it, should, through sickness or neglect or any other cause for six months after the 4th of March following the election, not take the oath that the Constitution provides, he would be President of the United States though he could not exercise a single power that belonged to that office. We all know that. The Senator from Ohio, I take it, would agree to that. Therefore I submit to my honorable friend, whose mind is very acute indeed in seeing difficulties in other people's transactions, whatever may be said of his own or those of his friends, it does not follow that, when the Constitution says no man shall be a Senator until he is thirty years of age, a man may be appointed by the Legislature of his State and wait for one year or two or three or five years until he gets to be thirty years of age. There is no logic in that; so that does not help my friend out at all. It comes right back to the point whether when a person is entitled to an office he is or is not appointed to the office. If he is appointed to the office he is the officer. Whether he can do any of the duties depends upon other provisions. My friend's notion is to interpolate the word "hold;" he bases his argument upon the idea that as to electors the Constitution says "appointed" and as to Senators it says "shall be" without saying "appointed." If he will turn right over on the same subject to the next page of the book that we usually refer to, he will see an argument which will entirely overthrow that notion of his:

> No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office.

There the constitution makers intended to say, as they did clearly, that in respect of these affairs the test should be that he should not exercise the two functions at the same time; and yet to turn back one page it says he shall not be it at all, and then when you turn over to the other phraseology it says he shall not be appointed, which is exactly the same thing. In the case of Mr. Vance, therefore, in my opinion, and I had it then, acting not as the Senator says on his view of it, but on my own, and I do not think it was his view then—he is a little mistaken about his own notions; the point was that Mr. Vance was incapable of being elected to the place at all, and it did not depend on the contingency, elected or not elected, as to the will of an independent body whether his disqualifications could be removed or not.

But as I have said, Mr. President, this is entirely apart from anything that is before the Senate, or that was legitimately introduced into the discussion. The question is, as was stated by the Senator from Ohio himself when he began, whether a person who is not elected by a majority of voices, or by a plurality of voices, is to take up the office because the other party who had the most votes was incapable of being elected or having the office in any form at all. That is the question. The governor of Oregon has taken certain action, it is said in the newspapers—I do not believe it yet, it cannot be so. That State is composed of ninety-five thousand square miles of territory. The citizens of that State scattered all over it having by a majority that everybody concedes to be a fair and straight one, voted for a postmaster for one of their electors of President; he it is said resigned the next day, but of course I know nothing about that. Now the governor of the State of Oregon, as it is said—I do not say that he has done it, and I do not believe it is possible that he could have done it, without any proof of notice to the citizens of that State scattered over ninety-five thousand square miles of territory that this man held the office of deputy postmaster in some hamlet in the woods, has undertaken to say that the man whom the people said should not be an elector is one; and the Senator from Ohio in order to hint that way, although he says he reserves his opinion upon it, and to make as much of a case as he can for that side without putting his own foot in it, says that the English rule is that in some cases, which he declines to enumerate, there is a presumption that the electors knew of the disqualification. He refers to 7th Adolphus and Ellis, the case of Gosling vs. Veley. Now without taking up your time, sir, because this is all entirely extrinsic to what we have in hand, just let me read you—my honorable friend read from a newspaper; I read from the book itself what the case was.

Certain church wardens, a corporation of a definite number of persons, assembled together to impose a church rate upon the inhabitants of the parish. When they had met they proceeded to enforce or to endeavor to enforce against a certain party that had not paid his rates the next step that the English law requires, which I will not take up or waste your time by stating. Thereupon some of the wardens moved an amendment to the proposition for imposing this rate upon this man, which was entirely foreign to the subject for which they had met, and then having failed in that, being present, they declined to take any further step in the performance. Now, what does the court say?

> Held, that the persons voting for the amendment must be considered as having declined to join in the proceedings of the meeting—
> It was not called for any such purpose—
> the amendment having no reference to the object for which the vestry was summoned under monition, that the persons so voting therefore left the question in the hands of the remainder; and that the rate was legally made.

That was the decision. The simple case was, therefore, not that some person having a minority of votes either with notice or without it had been elected to some office or to the exercise of some duty, but that certain members of a corporation being present and having undertaken to divert the meeting, against the law, to another purpose than that for which it was called, the other members present had the right to go on, whether the rest participated or not, and do the duties which the meeting was called to perform. In the course of that discussion the judge who delivers the opinion says this, upon which I suppose my honorable friend relied in his newspaper, which did not state it at all as it is stated by the judge himself:

Where the majority of electors vote for a disqualified person in ignorance of he fact of disqualification, the election may be void or voidable, or, in the latter case, may be capable of being made good, according to the nature of the disqualification; the objection may require ulterior proceedings to be taken before some competent tribunal, in order to be made available; or it may be such as to place the elected candidate on the same footing as if he never had existed and the votes for him were a nullity. But in no such case are the electors who vote for him deprived of their votes if the fact becomes known and is declared while the election is still incomplete. They may instantly proceed to another nomination and vote for another candidate. If it be disclosed afterward, the party elected may be ousted and the election declared void; but the candidate in the minority will not be deemed ipso facto elected.

According to the statement from Oregon, which, as I say, I cannot believe; but where an elector before voting receives due notice that a particular candidate is disqualified, "and yet will do nothing but tender his vote for him, he must be taken voluntarily to abstain from exercising his franchise." That I agree to; it is perfectly sound law; it is a rule of common sense and justice; and yet the point here that has been foisted into this debate is that the governor of Oregon, as it is said, has undertaken without any proof to declare, against everybody's common sense of the truth, that over these 95,000 square miles of the territory of that State every one of its electors is taken in his judgment to have had due notice and therefore intended to throw away his vote; and that is democratic virtue in Oregon, it is said!

Mr. ANTHONY. And "reform!"

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, reform and judicial fairness; something that can be carried to the intelligent conscience of the American people as the action of "the just made perfect" to elect a President of the United States. I do not wonder that the honorable Senator from Ohio says that he will hold up a little, or that after having furnished all the ammunition he can to gloss it over he will hold up before he goes in for the full figure himself. He has got to be stimulated two or three days more, he will come to it, you may be sure, Mr. President.

Sir, we ought to have the question. All this is outside of what we have before us. I should not have said a word upon the subject except for the fact that the observations of my honorable friend are calculated, of course not designed, to manufacture public opinion to that infinite baseness that is imputed, as I hope wrongfully, to the governor of Oregon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to print.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not desire to debate this question at present——

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator from Illinois give way for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. LOGAN. Not just now. I will in a moment. I will not occupy the time of the Senate long.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do not give way for a motion to adjourn. I hope we are going to finish something to-day.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to call the attention of the Senate, in view of the remarks that have been made in reference to the authority for the election of the minority candidate in the case stated, to the opinion of the Senator from Ohio some three years ago on that very point. In commenting on the English decisions in similar cases to the one read by the Senator from Vermont, the document in my hand quotes from a case decided by Chief-Justice Abbott, as follows:

I am of opinion, therefore, that he (the infant) was ineligible, and due notice of his incapacity having been given to the electors at the time of his election, their votes were thrown away, and consequently there must be judgment for the plaintiff.

Then again Clarke on Elections, page 156, is quoted as saying:

Whenever a candidate is disqualified from sitting in Parliament, and notice thereof is publicly given to the electors, all the votes given for such disqualified candidate will be considered as thrown away.

In answer to that theory of the English decisions, the following remarks are made and agreed to by the Senator from Ohio himself:

This notice, in order to bring the case within the rule, was required to be strictly formal, and was generally given at the polls. And the reason for this is apparent, as by their theory a voter who, after due notice of the ineligibility of a candidate, persisted in voting for him, was deemed guilty of a crime. Therefore, as all crimes are committed with an intention to commit the offense, it was necessary that the knowledge of the fact by the voter should be clear.

Roe on Elections, 256:

"It will be seen that the latter proposition is that which constitutes the law in cases where misapplication of the franchise by the electors was willful, and therefore made in their own wrong."

In answering that further, the Senator said:

But is such a principle applicable in a government based upon the theory that the power emanates from the people? In the British government the case is exactly the reverse, as there the theory is that the power originates with the monarch, and the privileges allowed the people to select representatives are, under that theory, considered as conceded and not as inherent rights. But this Government rests upon an entirely different basis. Here the power originates with the people, and that which the Government is authorized to exercise is conceded by the people. The right to designate who shall exercise this power has never been delegated. The method by which this choice shall be made known consistent with this theory can never be otherwise than by giving the majority or plurality the right to decide. Any attempt to restrict the right of the voter is an attempt to invade that right; therefore the theory that casting a vote knowingly for an ineligible candidate is in the nature of a crime which may be punished by ignoring the act of the majority and recognizing the act of the minority is in direct conflict with that most sacred right which the people of this Government have always guarded with jealous care. Such a rule is consistent with the theory of the British government, as it affords one means of preventing the power from passing into the hands of the people, but it is directly at variance with the theory of our Government, as it affords one means by which that right which the people have of selecting their representatives may be abridged.

That was the language of the Senator from Ohio three years ago and of the majority of the committee.

Mr. THURMAN. I beg the Senator's pardon. I do not say whether that is good law or not good law; but when he says that is my language he does great injustice to himself. That report, which I admit is an extremely able one, was drawn by the Senator from Illinois himself and the language was his.

Mr. LOGAN. When I referred to this language I said it was that of the committee. I did not say who drew the report, but this was the language of the committee, and therefore the language of the Senator because his name is signed to it. The names of Messrs. MORTON, LOGAN, THURMAN, and Joshua Hill are signed to it. The report was read and agreed to by all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do I understand the Senator from Illinois to say that the Senator from Ohio signed a paper containing that statement?

Mr. LOGAN. I say he did sign that report. His name is to it. He read it carefully, examined it, and agreed to it. I wrote the report, it is true.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that the same Senator from Ohio. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOGAN. The same Senator; yes, sir. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the report of the Committee on Printing in favor of the motion to print, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SHERMAN, (when Mr. CONKLING'S name was called.) I am requested to announce that the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] is paired with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. EATON.] Mr. CONKLING, if present, would vote "yea," and Mr. EATON "nay."

Mr. DAVIS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from California, [Mr. SARGENT.] If he were present he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE.] If present he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 40, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Blaine, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Chaffee, Christiancy, Clayton, Cockrell, Cragin, Dawes, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Kernan, Key, Logan, McDonald, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Randolph, Sherman, Teller, Wadleigh, Wallace, West, and Wright—40.

NAYS—Messrs. Bogy, Cooper, Dennis, Johnston, Jones of Florida, McCreery, Maxey, Merrimon, Norwood, Saulsbury, Thurman, Whyte, and Withers—13.

ABSENT—Messrs. Barnum, Bayard, Conkling, Conover, Davis, Dorsey, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Kelly, Morton, Price, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Sharon, Spencer, Stevenson, and Windom—22.

So the report was concurred in.

ELECTORAL VOTE OF OREGON

Mr. MITCHELL submitted the following resolution; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

Whereas, at the late presidential election in the State of Oregon, the people, by a majority of over eleven hundred, chose electors who were pledged to vote for Rutherford B. Hayes for President and William A. Wheeler for Vice President;

And whereas the governor of that State, upon the pretext that J. W. Watts, an elector thus chosen, was at the time of his election a deputy postmaster, certified to one E. A. Cronin, who had been a candidate upon the democratic electoral ticket, that he, Cronin, was chosen an elector, in the face of the notorious and undisputed fact that he had been defeated by the majority before stated;

And whereas the governor placed in the hands of the said E. A. Cronin the certificates of the other two electors chosen to vote for Hayes and Wheeler, instead of putting them into their own hands, as the law required, who retained them in his possession, and refused to exhibit them;

And whereas this E. A. Cronin assumed to appoint two electors and with them pretended to cast the electoral vote of the State and certified it up to the President of the Senate;

And whereas the action of the said governor in issuing a certificate of election to said Cronin was wholly unauthorized, illegal, and fraudulent, and a gross violation of the rights of the people of Oregon; and the action of said Cronin in assuming to act as an elector and to appoint two others was wholly fraudulent and wicked: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections is hereby instructed to investigate the facts attending the appointment of said electors and pretended electors, their action as electors and pretended electors, and the action of the governor and secretary of state in respect to them, and report the same to the Senate; and for this purpose may employ a stenographer, send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and examine witnesses.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 3163) to authorize the Ocean City Bridge Company to maintain and operate a bridge heretofore erected over and across Synepuxent Bay in Worcester County, Maryland;

A bill (H. R. No. 3693) changing the name of the First National Bank of Amesbury to the First National Bank of Merrimac;

A bill (H. R. No. 4117) for the relief of Colonel Frank L. Woolford, late of the First Kentucky Cavalry Volunteers, of certain disabilities; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4121) to provide for the expenses of certain special committees.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (S. R. No. 26) authorizing an allowance to certain clerks of committees.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred a petition of 55 citizens of Texas, praying to have refunded to them out of the Treasury the proceeds of the sales of certain cotton alleged to have been illegally seized and taken possession of by United States officials in that State, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and moved that the petitioners have leave to withdraw their petition; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3373) for the relief of Susan E. Willard, widow of Sylvester D. Willard, of New York, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HOWE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1053) to restrain unauthorized persons from assuming to act as electors of President and Vice-President; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McMILLAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1054) to establish a mail route between Deadwood City, in the Black Hills and Bismark, both in Dakota Territory; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PADDOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1055) to provide for the free distribution of public documents already printed or ordered to be printed; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, (by request,) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1056) concerning commerce and navigation and the regulation of steam-vessels and sailing-vessels; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

BILL RECOMMITTED.

Mr. WRIGHT. In regard to the bill (S. No. 723) for the relief of Nannie Hall, reported adversely by the Committee on Claims at the last session, a motion has been entered for the reconsideration of the vote indefinitely postponing the bill. That is now pending. I ask that the order postponing the bill indefinitely may be reconsidered by common consent, and the papers recommitted to the Committee on Claims, with some additional testimony that I present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is so late now that I hardly expect the Senate would be willing to stay to take up the constitutional amendment which was reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, and as a point of order is to be raised upon it, of course an adjournment before it was disposed of would make it all fall again. I shall hope to-morrow, as soon as I can get the floor, to have that matter taken up and disposed of. I now move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 7, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of Wednesday was read.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. REAGAN. I rise to a correction of the Journal. On yesterday I asked that the bill in relation to the bridges on the Ohio River (I do not now recollect the number) be considered on the first Tuesday after the recess.

The SPEAKER. That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. REAGAN. The Journal reads that it is to be considered in Committee of the Whole. I did not so ask and the House did not so order. It is a bill that contains no appropriation of money, and I wish it to be considered in the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk informs the Chair that the Journal correctly records the statement made and that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD corresponds with the Journal in that respect.

Mr. REAGAN. It was a statement that was never made by me.

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4120) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1878; which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask that the bill be made the special order for to-morrow, immediately after the reading of the Journal, and from day to day until disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that it ought to be made a special order after the morning hour.

Mr. CONGER. Will it be printed so that we can have it to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. It will be printed.

Mr. ATKINS. I have no objection to the suggestion of the Chair.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Is it to be considered in the House or in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. In Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ATKINS. In the Committee of the Whole, of course. And I give notice that I will call it up immediately after the morning hour to-morrow.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to reserve all points of order on the bill.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole, and made the special order for to-morrow after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of.

MINNESOTA RAILROAD LAND GRANT.

Mr. DUNNELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4121) to amend an act entitled "An act making an additional grant of lands to the State of Minnesota, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of railroads in said State, approved July 4, 1866;" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state to the House that a number of gentlemen who are about to leave the city in the discharge of a public duty ask unanimous consent to refer certain bills and to transact other business, and with the permission of the House the Chair will hear them in the first instance. The Chair hears no objection.

QUIETING LAND TITLES, CALIFORNIA.

Mr. LUTTRELL (by request) introduced, by unanimous consent, a bill (H. R. No. 4122) to quiet land titles in the State of California; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

RIGHT OF PRE-EMPTION IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. LUTTRELL also (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4123) to confer the right of pre-emption to lands in California in certain cases; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

JOINT RULES.

Mr. MONROE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 980, which is a pension bill, in order to move its reference to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain that motion, even by unanimous consent, as it is in conflict with the joint rule.

Mr. MONROE. I should like to have a talk with the Chair on the subject of that joint rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can talk with the Chair on the subject at any time.

COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. McCRARY. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution for consideration at this time.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Let us first hear what it is.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have the resolution read, then ask for any objection if there be any.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas there are differences of opinion as to the proper mode of counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President and as to the manner of determining questions that may arise as to the legality and validity of returns made of such votes by the several States;

And whereas it is of the utmost importance that all differences of opinion and all doubt and uncertainty upon these questions should be removed, to the end that the votes may be counted and the result declared by a tribunal whose authority none can question and whose decision all will accept as final: Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of five members of this House be appointed by the Speaker, to act in conjunction with any similar committee that may be appointed by the Senate, to prepare and report without delay such a measure, either legislative or constitutional, as may in their judgment be best calculated to accomplish the desired end, and that said committee have leave to report at any time.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. It appears to me, Mr. Speaker, that a subject of so much importance should be first considered by one of the standing committees of this House, and I therefore hope my friend from Iowa will consent to its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary, of which he himself is a member.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will further suggest that the resolution be printed.

Mr. HALE. Let me make the suggestion that, in case of the reference of this resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary, that committee shall have leave to report at any time.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Yes; there will be no objection to granting the committee leave to report at any time.

Mr. McCRARY. As gentlemen desire that course to be taken, of course I shall acquiesce in it, although we all understand how important prompt action is.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Certainly; we appreciate that.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, the resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with leave to report at any time, and ordered to be printed.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. McCRARY moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COLORADO.

Mr. FRYE. I rise to a question of privilege. I have here a resolution of the State of Colorado in relation to the contested seat of their Representative in the Congress of the United States, which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The Clerk read as follows:

DENVER, COLORADO, December 6, 1876.

To the Congress of the United States:

Whereas, by act of Congress approved March 3, 1875, it was provided that the people of Colorado should be permitted to form and organize a State government, under which act a constitution duly framed and presented was on the 1st day of July, 1876, ratified and adopted by the legal voters of Colorado by an almost unanimous vote, said constitution being conformable to the Constitution and laws of the United States;

And whereas, on the 1st day of August, 1876, under and by virtue of the provision of said act of Congress, the President of the United States did issue his proclamation admitting the State of Colorado into the Union on an equal footing with the original States;

And whereas we have learned with profound surprise that the House of Representatives in Congress has refused, and still does refuse, our duly elected member, Hon. James B. Belford, a seat and vote in said House, and believing as we do that he was legally elected, and that our State is justly entitled to full representation in Congress: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Colorado, (the Senate concurring herein,) That we, as the representatives of the people of this State, do hereby most earnestly protest against this injustice and wrong in depriving our people of a voice in the Congress of the nation and do request that our said representative be received and recognized as a member of Congress from the State of Colorado.

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded at once by telegraph to our Senators in Congress and that an enrolled copy be also sent by mail with a request that the same be presented to the House.

Adopted at Denver, December 6, 1876.

WEBSTER D. ANTHONY,
Speaker of the House.

WM. W. WEBSTER,
President pro tempore of Senate.

Attest:

WM. B. PELTON,
Clerk of the House.

GEO. T. CLARK,
Secretary of the Senate.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PATIENTS IN PROVIDENCE HOSPITAL.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from the Surgeon-General, recommending an appropriation for the support of certain paupers and surgical patients in Providence Hospital, Washington, District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SUSPENDED ENTRIES OF PUBLIC LANDS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in pursuance of law, a list of suspended entries of public lands for the year ending June 30, 1876; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

LOUISIANA COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. LYNDE, asks to be excused from service on the committee to go to the State of Louisiana. Is there objection to the gentleman being excused? The Chair hears none; and the Chair appoints Mr. GEORGE M. BEEBE, of New York, in his place.

OMISSIONS IN REVISED STATUTES.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at thirty-five minutes past twelve o'clock and the House resumes consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday's morning hour, being the bill (H. R. No. 2825) to correct errors and supply omissions in the Revised Statutes of the United States, reported by the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] has the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. DURHAM.]

Mr. DURHAM. I do not know that it is necessary to say anything further except this: that the Committee on the Revision of the Laws have taken a great deal of pains with the bill now under consideration, in order to correct these errors and omissions as far as the District of Columbia is concerned, and believe the bill is correct; and I see no necessity of referring the bill back with the view of incorporating the whole of the sections, the amendments being very few. I believe my friend from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] and also my distinguished friend from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] when they come to look into the matter, will concur with the committee that the amendments proposed for the correction of errors and the supplying of omissions are strictly correct.

Mr. CONGER. I will ask the gentleman so to amend the title as to show that these amendments apply only to the District of Columbia, and not to the Revised Statutes at large.

Mr. DURHAM. That is unquestionably the fact; and certainly there can be no objection to amending the title of the bill, for that is all that it does. It shows that on its face.

Mr. CONGER. I certainly feel that this is a very wrong precedent. It would be very inconvenient for the legal profession, and for all the persons interested in these laws, to be compelled to hunt through a bill for amending words, which would be the case when there is not printed a recital of the section as amended. By passing the bill in this way, when these laws are printed, the amendments cannot be incorporated in them. The original Revised Statutes would be printed and the amendments would have to be looked for in another bill printed separately from the statutes themselves. This is an evil which has been remedied in many of the States by constitutional provisions requiring that the amendment of any section shall be accompanied by a reprint of the section as amended. I still think that the committee had better take the time to revise their work and report the sections as they will be when amended. It is desirable that they should do so, even as a matter of precedent.

Mr. DURHAM. I will state to the gentleman from Michigan that in preparing the bill to correct errors and supply omissions in the general Revised Statutes we adopted the method he has suggested. But this is a very short bill, and my colleague on the committee supposed this was all that was necessary, as it is simply a local bill. I admit the general proposition laid down by my friend from Michigan, and, as I have said, we acted in accordance with it in the general bill adopted by the last House. But I hope the gentleman will not insist on the point with reference to this local bill. I am sure no practical difficulty can arise under it.

Mr. CONGER. It will remove part of my objection if the gentleman consents that the title shall be so changed as to show that it is merely a local bill.

Mr. DURHAM. My colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ROBINSON,] will make that motion at the proper stage.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROBINSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] will indicate the amendment he desires to have made in the title of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. Let the title be amended by adding the words "relating to the District of Columbia."

There was no objection, and the title was amended accordingly.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] who was absent when the Committee on the Pacific Railroad was called, and who now asks unanimous consent to be allowed to make a report from that committee. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAMAR. The Committee on the Pacific Railroad have instructed me to report back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. No. 14) to extend the time for the construction and completion of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and to ask that it be made the special order for Wednesday, December 20, after the reading of the Journal, to be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole from day to day until disposed of; not to interfere with the consideration of appropriation bills.

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not hear the request made by the gentleman from Mississippi in regard to the bill. I reserve the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The point of order will be reserved. The request of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] is in writing, and will be read by the Clerk.

The request was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order that this is a bill appropriating public property to a private use and should be considered in Committee of the Whole. I have no objection to its being made an order subject to the consideration of other bills in Committee of the Whole; but I make the point of order for the present that the bill must go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LAMAR. That is the language of the request.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LAMAR. I will strike out the words "in the House as," so that the bill may be considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HURLBUT. Will the Chair state what is the present condition of this bill; whether it is upon the Speaker's table or not?

Mr. LAMAR. It is, sir.

Mr. HURLBUT. Then I object to taking it up.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand that the bill was on the Speaker's table. The Chair understood the gentleman from Mississippi made it as a report from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. LAMAR. I recollect that I attempted to make the report from the committee, and that it was objected to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would have ruled it out of order if he had known it was a bill upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. LAMAR. I attempted to make the report, but failed to get it before the House.

Mr. LANE. I recollect very distinctly that the bill was in the hands of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] had sought to suspend the rules; but the House refused to agree to his motion, and therefore the bill is now in his hands.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The bill is then on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not controvert that position. The Chair states, however, that it is an important fact to know whether the bill is on the Speaker's table or in committee. The Clerk will read the record in regard to it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LAMAR moved that the rules be suspended so as to enable him to report from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad and the House to consider the bill of the Senate, (S. No. 14,) "An act to extend the time for the construction and completion of the Northern Pacific Railroad."

And the question being put, "Shall the rules be suspended?" it was decided in the negative—yeas 42, nays 149, not voting 93.

The SPEAKER. The Chair therefore rules that the gentleman from Mississippi has the right to make the report as a bill from the committee, but the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] makes the point of order that the bill must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOLMAN. Was this bill ever referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad?

Mr. LAMAR. It was; but in view of the circumstances I withdraw the report.

CHANGE OF THE NAME OF A NATIONAL BANK.

Mr. HAYMOND, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported, with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 3693) changing the name of the First National Bank of Amesbury to the First National Bank of Merrimac.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAYMOND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HORACE GLOVER.

Mr. TARBOX, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1592) to re-imburse Horace Glover for property unlawfully seized and sold by the United States Government, with the amendments of the Senate thereto.

Mr. TARBOX. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. The amendments of the Senate are merely verbal and formal. I ask that they be concurred in.

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TARBOX moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF THE REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. HURD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with amendments the bill (S. No. 155) to amend sections 533, 556, and 572 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 533 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 533. The State of Arkansas is divided into two districts, which shall be called the eastern and western districts of Arkansas. The western district includes the counties of Benton, Washington, Crawford, Sebastian, Scott, Polk, Sevier, Little River, Howard, Montgomery, Yell, Logan, Franklin, Johnson, Madison, Newton, Carroll, Boone, and Marion, and the country lying west of Missouri and Arkansas known as the Indian Territory. The eastern district includes the residue of said State."

That section 556 be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 556. In the eastern district of Arkansas there shall be appointed two clerks of the district court thereof, one of whom shall reside and keep his office at Little Rock, and the other shall reside and keep his office at Helena."

That section 572 be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 572. In the eastern district of Arkansas, at Little Rock, on the second Monday in April and October, and at Helena on the second Monday in March and September.

"In the western district of Arkansas, at Fort Smith the first Monday in February, May, August, and November."

The amendments proposed by the committee were read, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred Senate bill No. 155, recommends the adoption of the following amendments to the bill: In section 571 strike out the words "the eastern district of Arkansas, at Helena," and add to the section the following words: "and the eastern district of Arkansas, the terms of the circuit court shall be held at Helena at the same time as the terms of the district court."

Mr. FORT. I desire to inquire whether the bill involves an additional outlay of public money. It seems to me that it necessarily would, as it provides for the holding of courts in new places. It must necessarily, therefore, cause some increase of expenditure; and, if so, I wish to make a point of order upon the bill.

Mr. WILSHIRE. I desire to state for the information of the gentleman from Illinois that this bill does not involve any additional outlay at all. The districts as they now exist require the courts to be held at Helena just as this bill does. It only changes the territorial districts and causes the court to be held at Helena.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hold that this bill involves no additional expenditure, involves no expenditure except what is already authorized by existing law, and therefore a point of order would not stand against the bill.

The amendments reported from the committee were agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HURD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BURLINGTON AND MISSOURI RIVER RAILROAD.

Mr. McCRARY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with a favorable recommendation House bill No. 4075, to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862," approved July 2, 1864.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862," approved July 2, 1864, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to make and constitute the railroad in Nebraska authorized to be constructed by the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company, and which is now completed and known as the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad in Nebraska, a branch of the Union Pacific Railroad, and entitled to all the rights and privileges, and subject to all the duties and requirements, provided by sections 9 and 15 of said last-mentioned act: Provided, That no Government bonds shall ever be issued to said Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company in Nebraska to aid in its construction: And provided further, That this act shall in no wise affect the extent or conditions of the land grant made to said company by the act of July 2, 1864.

SEC. 2. That in order to secure to the Government and the public equal advantages and facilities as to rates, and to prevent discrimination, it is hereby provided that the said Union Pacific Railroad Company shall operate its line in connection with the said Burlington and Missouri River Railroad in Nebraska; and for carrying freight and passengers received from or to be delivered to said Burlington and Missouri River Railroad, the said Union Pacific Railroad Company shall charge at the same rate per mile for the distance between Kearney Junction and Cheyenne that is charged by it for like services in carrying freight and passengers over its own line for the distance between Omaha and Cheyenne; and for carrying all such passengers and freight from Cheyenne to points west of that place on the Union or Central Pacific Railroad, the charges shall be at such fair and reasonable rates, to be based upon a fair proportion of its charges upon its own line, as may be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, who shall, after due inquiry and investigation, fix and establish such proportion, and notify all the companies interested; and he may, for the purpose of fixing such proportion, employ not more than three competent experts to ascertain and report to him such facts as may be necessary to enable him to discharge his duty under this act, together with such opinions and recommendations thereon as they may deem proper. And the reasonable compensation of such experts, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, shall be paid by such railroad company or companies interested as he may designate and in the proportion fixed by him. The proper circuit court of the United States shall have power to compel the observance of the provisions of this act, for which purpose said court shall have jurisdiction to hear, try, and determine any suit in equity or action of mandamus instituted for that purpose.

Mr. FRYE. I make the point of order against this bill that it involves legislation affecting one of the land-grant roads.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to make the point of order that this bill involves a grant of public lands to a private corporation.

Mr. McCRARY. That, I think, is not the fact.

The SPEAKER. As this bill refers to acts which the Speaker has not at hand, will the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] please indicate wherein the fact is set forth in this bill by which land is given not already appropriated by law?

Mr. FRYE. I do not understand that there is anything in the bill which gives lands not hitherto given; but there is legislation in the bill affecting a land-grant road. I understand the rule to be this: Suppose, for instance, that the time in which a road was to be built is about expiring, but has not expired, by six months. The ruling of the Chair has been that a bill to extend that time must be first considered in Committee of the Whole, because it is a land-grant road, and the bill would affect the interest of the United States or of the land-grant. The land-grant has not expired and it would not be a new gift of land. I make the point of order that this bill affects a land-grant road in which the United States has an interest; it does not extend any land-grant or give any land.

The SPEAKER. Does it extend the time?

Mr. FRYE. It does not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be glad to hear from the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCRARY] who reported the bill. The Chair understood the gentleman from Iowa to state that the point of order was made upon a certain condition of facts that did not exist.

Mr. McCRARY. There is no appropriation of any public land, nor any appropriation of bonds or other property of the United States, as the Chair will see by reference to the two provisions at the end of the first section.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will read Rule 112.

All proceedings touching appropriations of money and all bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriations to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, shall be first discussed in a Committee of the Whole House.

If the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] will indicate to the Chair any provision in this bill touching appropriations of money, or making appropriations of money or property, then the Chair will be better informed as to how he should render his decision upon the point of order.

Mr. FRYE. Remotely, if the Chair pleases, in this way; this bill has reference to two acts creating or incorporating the Union Pacific Railroad Company. It requires that company with all its branches to make this Burlington and Missouri River Railroad in Nebraska one of its branches, and to prorate its charges for freight and passengers. Thus, it affects appropriations hitherto made by the United States to the Union Pacific Railroad Company, and affects to a certain extent, remotely, I admit, but to a certain extent, the bonds now held by the United States of the Union Pacific Railroad Company. I admit that it is remote.

The SPEAKER. Allow the Chair to ask the gentleman from Maine to explain whether this bill does not in fact give additional protection to the Government—and additional advantages to the Government—of the United States?

Mr. FRYE. It does not. It gives additional advantages to this Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company, but it gives no additional advantages to the United States. On the contrary, in my opinion, it detracts from the securities held by the United States of the Union Pacific Railroad.

Mr. CROUNSE. That is an assumption which may or may not be warranted by the facts. The fact may be that prorating and running in connection with the other branches may inure to the benefit of the Union Pacific Railroad. At all events it is quite clear that there is nothing on the face of the bill from which the Speaker can conclude that it falls under the rule, or that could justify him in sending it to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FRYE. I have but one desire in this matter, and it is that time shall be given for the discussion of the bill, which is very important in its principles, and for the offering of certain amendments. If the gentleman from Iowa will have some future day assigned for its consideration and leave it open to certain amendments which are desirable, I have no wish to insist on the point of order.

Mr. CROUNSE. I would like to say by permission of the gentleman from Iowa that I most earnestly object to any postponement. This matter was brought to the attention of the House early last session. It went to the committee and by their indulgence arguments upon it were postponed from time to time to await the pleasure of those opposed to the bill, so that it was not until the closing days of the session that it was reported back to the House. If action on it is now further delayed, it is not unlikely that it may not be reached again this Congress.

Postponing consideration of bills is one of the ways of defeating them. I trust it will not be tolerated in this instance.

Mr. W. B. WILLIAMS. It occurs to me that a point of order is directly presented by this bill; in other words, it directly affects the revenues of the Government from the Union Pacific Railroad. While I approve of the principles of this bill in reference to prorating, it must at once occur to the Chair that when a system of prorating is adopted it will affect the net earnings of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, and in doing this will directly affect the percentage to be yearly paid to the Government upon the sinking fund under the law as it now exists. The bill directly affects that question; and I fully agree with the gentleman from Maine that we should have an opportunity to discuss the measure fully upon its merits. It strikes me that, while in some points of view it may have merit, in others it may have demerit. Hence we cannot pass upon the bill properly in this method of discussion, and I hope it will go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The Chair has read the rule under which a point of order may be raised against bills appropriating lands, money, property, or anything else belonging to the United States. Now, while it may be a question whether it suits the convenience of members to consider this bill at the present time, the Chair, I think, can have no difficulty in ruling that the point of order founded upon Rule 112 has no application to this bill. It does not propose to give away anything belonging to the Government. The question involved in this bill is whether the United States will exercise a certain authority over that railroad or not. That is all I see in the point. I think the Chair will have no difficulty in deciding that the bill proposes to give away nothing belonging to the United States. Whether it may impair the revenues of that railroad or not is a disputed question. A great many of us think that it would have a salutary effect to require that company to do what is reasonable. That, as I understand, is what this bill proposes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair coincides with the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] that the application of the point of order is very remote. The Chair does not see upon the face of the bill that the Government of the United States is affected by this legislation. He does see, however, that there may be a controversy between two corporations as to the effect of the bill. In the opinion of the Chair Rule 112 does not operate against this bill. The point of order is therefore overruled.

Mr. FRYE. I will ask the Chair whether the morning hour has not expired.

The SPEAKER. There are fifteen minutes of the morning hour remaining.

Mr. McCRARY. Before I proceed to discuss the bill the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. W. B. WILLIAMS] desires, I understand, that the bill be again reported. I have no objection to that.

The bill was again read.

Mr. McCRARY. Mr. Speaker, I will make a brief explanation of the provisions of this bill. The original Union Pacific Railroad act provided for the main line and for a number of branches. The amendatory act of 1864, which largely increased the subsidy, among other things, provided that the main road and branches are not only required to be operated as a connected continuous line, as demanded by section 12 of the original act, but "in such operation to afford and secure to each equal advantages and facilities, as to rates, time, and transportation, without discrimination," &c. (Section 15.) As to the branches provided for in the first part of the original act, there is no question that the law as it now stands requires the main line to prorate with them. But in the fifteenth section of the act, perhaps by a clerical error, the words "the aforesaid roads," were inserted, which would literally refer only to such branches as were provided for in the previous sections of the act. The branch that is now asking to be allowed to prorate with the Union Pacific Railroad Company is provided for by a subsequent section; and hence the company refuses to recognize this branch as one of the branches contemplated by the act, and declines to make terms with it for prorating.

The purpose and object of the bill is to make this Burlington branch a branch of the Union Pacific Railroad to all intents and purposes, and to give it the same rights that other branches have, and to give to those persons who are compelled to use it as a means of transportation and travel the same rights that persons using the main line or other branches have under the law.

There can be no question as to the justice and the reasonableness of the provisions of this bill. The only point which any gentleman can make is that Congress has no authority to require the Union Pacific Railroad Company to prorate with this particular branch, and that was the question considered by the Committee on the Judiciary of this House at great length at the last session, and which was discussed by several gentlemen before the committee.

On two grounds, Mr. Speaker, I claim Congress has the clear right to pass this bill. The first is under the general power to alter or amend the charter of the Union Pacific Railroad Company. The language of that provision is as follows:

And the better to accomplish the object of this act, namely, to promote the public interest and welfare by the construction of said railroad and telegraph line, * * * Congress may at any time—having due regard for the rights of said companies named herein—add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act.

The power conferred upon Congress under that provision is certainly broad enough to authorize an amendment which shall require that company to prorate with this branch. It is clearly such an amendment as Congress may make even upon the theory that we cannot affect any vested rights conferred by the original act.

But, sir, there is another ground upon which I claim we have a clear right to pass the bill. Section 15 of the original Pacific Railroad act provides as follows: "That any other railroad company now incorporated, or hereafter to be incorporated, shall have the right to connect their road with the road and branches provided for by this act, at such places, and upon such just and equitable terms, as the President of the United States may prescribe." It follows that under the law, then, as it now stands, the President of the United States might exercise the prerogative of fixing the terms and conditions upon which the Burlington branch shall connect with the Union Pacific Railroad Company at Kearney.

Now, it is entirely clear that Congress may, under the general power to alter and amend this charter, so far alter and amend it as to provide another mode of exercising this power and this discretion which by the original act is placed in the hands of the President of the United States. That is all that this bill does.

As the matter now stands, I understand the people who live along the line of this branch are completely at the mercy of the Union Pacific Railroad Company. They are compelled to pay the same price for traveling and transportation from Kearney Junction westward that they have to pay from Omaha. No reduction of rates whatever, as I understand, is made for the whole distance from Plattsmouth to Kearney, which is about two hundred miles. There is a large population, and a constantly increasing population, in the State of Nebraska living along this line of railroad which is compelled to travel on this branch to Kearney Junction, and there to take the Union Pacific Railroad for travel or transportation westward. And they are compelled after they reach Kearney Junction to pay the same price from there west that persons who come over the main line pay from Omaha to the same point. If you use the Burlington branch, you must now pay for two hundred miles of the main line which you do not use; that is, you pay double rates for the first two hundred miles. Of course every gentleman will see this is a great wrong upon these people, and if it is within the power of Congress to remedy it, we ought not to hesitate to do it. Being entirely clear myself as to our right to pass the bill, I hope the House will pass it without delay.

I do not know whether any gentleman desires to discuss this bill further. If no gentleman desires to be heard, I shall feel it to be my duty to demand the previous question.

Mr. HURD. Has not the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. HURD. Then I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business being demanded, the bill goes over until the morning hour to-morrow.

Mr. CROUNSE. Does the morning hour expire by its own limitation?

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent the morning hour is sometimes allowed to continue beyond the hour, but the gentleman from Ohio has now called the attention of the Chair to the fact that the morning hour has expired, and has further demanded the regular order of business.

EXPENSES OF INVESTIGATING COMMITTEES.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4124) to provide for the expenses of certain special committees; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides that the sum of $21,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is thereby, appropriated from any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expenses of the three special committees charged, respectively, with the investigation of the recent elections in the States of Louisiana, South Carolina, and Florida; said appropriation to be added to the contingent fund of the House, and to be disbursed upon vouchers approved by the chairmen of the respective committees.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SERVICE OF THE ARMY IN SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution, calling on the Executive for information:

Resolved, That the President be requested to transmit to this House copies of any and all orders or directions emanating from him or from either of the Executive Departments of the Government to any military commander or civil officer, with reference to the service of the Army, or any portion thereof, in the States of Virginia, South Carolina, Louisiana, and Florida, since the 1st of August last, together with reports by telegraph or otherwise, from either or any of said military commanders or civil officers.

Mr. KASSON. Let that lie over a day, that we may have an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. The Senate has unanimously passed a similar resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be again read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be considered at this time.

Mr. KASSON. I object to its being considered now.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Will the gentleman object to its being referred to the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. KASSON. Let it lie over for a day. There may be no objection to its passing when it is again considered.

The resolution was accordingly laid over under the rule.

REMOVAL OF SIOUX INDIANS.

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution, calling on the Secretary of the Interior for information:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to inform this House whether any, and what, negotiations have been or are being made with the Sioux Indians for their removal to the Indian Territory, and under what authority the same has been or is being done.

Mr. CONGER. I think that inquiry should be addressed to the President.

Mr. MILLS. The Secretary of the Interior has the negotiations conducted in his Department. I think it is not necessary to call on the President for the information; but it does not make any difference whether the inquiry be addressed to the President or the Secretary of the Interior.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] desire that the change he has indicated be made?

Mr. CONGER. I object to the consideration of the resolution today unless the change be made.

Mr. MILLS. I accept the gentleman's suggestion, and will add the words "if not incompatible with the public service."

Mr. CONGER. Then the word "directed" should be changed to "requested."

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. MILLS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. HOLMAN, (at one o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. SEELYE: The petition of Thomas P. Madden, assignee of R. K. Dodge, for compensation for supplies furnished the Mendicino Indians in 1859 and 1860, to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. TUCKER: The petition of A. C. Myers, of Baltimore, Maryland, for the removal of his political disabilities, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WAIT: The petition of Henry E. Rhodes, for a correction in the Navy Register of the date of his original entry into the naval service, to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, December 8, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills, yesterday received from the House of Representatives, were severally read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

The bill (H. R. No. 3163) to authorize the Ocean City Bridge Company to maintain and operate a bridge heretofore erected over and across Synepuxent Bay, in Worcester County, Maryland—to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. No. 3693) changing the name of the First National Bank of Amesbury to the First National Bank of Merrimac—to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. No. 4117) for the relief of Colonel Frank L. Woolford, late of the First Kentucky Cavalry Volunteers, of certain disabilities—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. No. 4121) to provide for the expenses of certain special committees—to the Committee on Appropriations.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore signed the enrolled joint resolution (S. R. No. 26) authorizing an allowance to certain clerks of committees, heretofore signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented the petition of John J. Orton, of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, praying for the passage of an act providing for the redemption of the greenback currency; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

PORTRAIT OF HON. HENRY H. STARKWEATHER.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask leave to introduce a bill, and I think if it is read there will be no necessity for a reference. Let it be read and I will explain it; and if there be any objection of course it will take the usual course.

Leave was granted, by unanimous consent, to introduce a bill (S. No. 1057) to provide for engraving and printing the portrait of the late Hon. Henry H. Starkweather, of Connecticut; and it was read twice and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It appropriates such sum as may be necessary to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to have engraved and printed a portrait of Hon. Henry H. Starkweather, of Connecticut, deceased, late a member of the House of Representatives, as authorized by the resolution of the House of Representatives of May 5, 1876, and concurred in by the Senate May 20, 1876, the portrait to accompany the eulogies ordered to be printed by the same resolution.

Mr. ANTHONY. It has been customary latterly to print a portrait with the eulogies of deceased members of the Senate and House of Representatives, and the order was made in this case. I think the order was made positively, but the Bureau of Engraving and Printing say that they have no money appropriated for that purpose and the Congressional Printer has no money appropriated for that purpose. Therefore, it is necessary, in order to carry out the order of Congress, that there should be an appropriation made. The practice of engraving portraits and of publishing additional numbers of eulogies delivered is, in the opinion of the committee, an injudicious one, and the committee have intended to introduce a resolution to discontinue it in the future; but the propriety of passing such a resolution at a time when there is no pending case will be apparent to any one. We should not introduce a resolution to that effect now, because in the course of the next week we have notice that eulogies will be delivered upon a very distinguished member of the House of Representatives, who has been its presiding officer, and neither the Senate nor the House would like to make that the occasion of discontinuing any honor that it has been the custom to pay to our departed associates. After that, and when there is no case pending, it will be proper to pass a law or to express an opinion which will enable us to discontinue this practice without any invidiousness. I hope, therefore, that what has been done in other cases will be done in this, and that this bill, which merely provides for carrying out what I think was the order of Congress, (it certainly was the intention,) will be agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. By way of information I should like to hear from the Senator from Rhode Island something as to the cost. I want to know the general cost. I have no doubt he has the information.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will first verify what I supposed was the case. The resolution of the House of Representatives, the Senate concurring, was—

That the Secretary of the Treasury have printed the portrait of Mr. Starkweather to accompany the same.

It is therefore an order of Congress. The cost in this case will be about $680. There have been cases where a portrait is already in existence in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and then the cost is very small. It costs $16 a thousand to print them; the great cost is in the engraving, which of course is done in high style, in a manner creditable to the Government. The cost will be about $680.

Mr. DAVIS. And that is about the usual cost, I understand. There is nothing unusual provided for in this case?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is the usual cost except in certain cases, as I think in the case of Mr. Douglas, where there was a portrait at hand; and of course then the cost of engraving, which is the great cost, is saved and there is only the cost of printing. No; there is nothing intended in the bill except to make this portrait precisely like the others. I am under the impression, although I am not quite sure, that some of the portraits have been engraved at less cost. This estimate, I believe, is the estimate of the style in which they would like to do it, and like all the engraving in that bureau, being intended originally for currency and for protection against counterfeiting, it would be done in the very highest style of art. There is nothing better that I know of than the engraving done there.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WEST asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1058) for the relief of W. W. Handlin, former judge of the third district court of New Orleans; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COOPER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1059) for the relief of R. G. P. White, Peter Hanger, and L. T. Green; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WITHERS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1060) for the relief of owners and purchasers of land sold for direct taxes in insurrectionary States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. COCKRELL, it was Ordered, That Frank A. Page have leave to withdraw his petition and accompanying papers from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. MITCHELL, it was Ordered, That the memorial and papers of Ben Holladay be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PATTERSON. I ask for an order to withdraw the petition and papers of Miss R. L. Wright from the files of the Senate. There has been no adverse report. It is an old case.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to say one thing in connection with this order. Very frequently applications are made for orders to withdraw papers where there has been an adverse report. I understand the rule, without anything being said about it, to be that in every case where an adverse report has been made copies have to be left, and it is not necessary to mention it in each particular case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the rule and it is observed in every case. The order asked by the Senator from South Carolina will be made, if there be no objection.

SIOUX INDIANS.

Mr. INGALLS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to report immediately to the Senate what efforts have been made to remove the Sioux Indians from their treaty reservation to the Indian Territory, and what negotiations are now pending between the Government and said Indians, together with the object and purpose thereof.

CIVIL-SERVICE COMMITTEE.

Mr. HARVEY. I offer the following resolution and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the select committee appointed to examine the several branches of the civil service be authorized to employ a stenographer, to administer oaths, and to send for persons and papers.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no need to have in the resolution the power to administer oaths. That is conferred by statute, and cannot be conferred properly by a Senate resolution. Of course it does not do any harm; but it would seem to look as if the law did not already provide for it.

Mr. HARVEY. If the Senator will permit me, I will state that this is an exact copy of the original resolution offered by the committee at the session before the last. Such a resolution was passed then. It is the usual resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not object to the proposition, except that part of it which authorizes the committee to administer oaths. My objection is not to their having the power; but the statutes declare in explicit terms that any special committee as well as a standing one may administer oaths.

Mr. HARVEY. Then the resolution may be modified in that particular.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like some information from the chairman of the committee as to the purpose of the resolution. I should like to know what is to be investigated. A stenographer, which is rather an expensive luxury, is to be employed, which implies that testimony will be taken. I have no objection, of course, to any proper examination, or to the examination of any subject, whatever, under legislative cognizance; but I should like to know what is proposed to be done, and what expenses are to be incurreed.

Mr. HARVEY. I will state in answer to the Senator from California that this resolution is exactly a copy of the resolution passed at the session before the last, with the exception that it does not provide that the committee shall sit during the recess of the Senate. So far as I am concerned I am willing that the resolution shall be modified so as to provide for the employment of a clerk instead of a stenographer.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is all right—a clerk during the session.

Mr. SARGENT. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas modifies the resolution so as to read "clerk" instead of "stenographer."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to strike out the clause relating to oaths as being entirely unnecessary, in order to keep within the statutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas accept that modification?

Mr. HARVEY. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be so modified.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to ask whether this is an addition to the usual clerk, or is it intended to give a clerk to this committee as is ordinarily done?

Mr. HARVEY. It is intended to allow a clerk. There has been no provision made for a clerk to this committee at the present session.

Mr. DAVIS. Then of course it ought to read "a clerk" instead of "a stenographer."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is so modified. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS.

Mr. MORTON. I move that there be three more members added to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The duties imposed upon that committee are so arduous and extended that the present number is hardly equal to the task. I move, therefore, that there be three members added to the Committee on Privileges and Elections temporarily, for the purpose of discharging the duties imposed by the resolutions adopted the day before yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana, that three members be added to the Committee on Privileges and Elections charged with a special inquiry under the resolutions introduced by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the additional members of the committee; and Messrs. CHRISTIANCY, TELLER, and MCDONALD were appointed.

ELECTORAL VOTE OF OREGON.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yesterday I introduced a resolution in reference to the electoral vote of Oregon. I now move to take it up simply for the purpose of reference. I do not desire to have it considered by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to taking up the resolution for reference?

Mr. DAVIS. For reference only?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is so stated—for reference only. The Chair hears no objection, and the resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

SILVER COIN.

Mr. LOGAN. There is on the Calendar the bill (S. No. 1026) for the issue of silver coin and to make the silver dollar a legal tender, which was introduced by me at the last session and ordered to lie on the table without a reference. I desire now that it shall be referred to the Committee on Finance, and I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 155) to amend sections 533, 556, 571, and 572 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to courts in Arkansas and other States, with an amendment in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1592) to re-imburse Horace Glover for property unlawfully seized and sold by the United States Government.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 2825) to correct errors and supply omissions in the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia.

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES—JOINT RULES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 10, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; the one to which the Senator from North Carolina made objection the other day. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to the motion I have just made.

Mr. MERRIMON. I object to taking it up because of the twenty-first joint rule. I raise the point of order that under the twenty-first joint rule it is not competent to take up any unfinished business of the last session until after the lapse of six days from the opening of this session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina makes the point of order that the motion is not in order under what he denominates the twenty-first joint rule. The Chair overrules the point of order. The joint rules are not in force. The question is controlled by Senate Rule No. 52.

Mr. MERRIMON. With all due respect to the Chair, I pray an appeal to the Senate, and on sustaining the ruling of the Chair I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina appeals from the ruling of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate? on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COOPER. Will the Chair have Rule 52 read? I understood the Chair to refer to that rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair holds that Senate Rule No. 52 controls this question. The rule will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

52. At the second, or any subsequent, session of a Congress, the legislative business of the Senate which remains undetermined at the close of the next preceding session of that Congress shall be resumed and proceeded with in the same manner as if no adjournment of the Senate had taken place; and all subjects referred to committees, and not reported upon at the close of a session of Congress, shall be returned to the office of the Secretary of the Senate, and be by him retained until the next succeeding session of that Congress, when they shall be returned to the several committees to which they had been previously referred.—Senate Manual, page 149.

Mr. MERRIMON. I now ask the twenty-first joint rule may be read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no such rule, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT, pro tempore. There is no such rule in force; there is what has been denominated the twenty-first joint rule.

Mr. MERRIMON. I ask that what I call the twenty-first joint rule may be read.

The PRESIDENT, pro tempore. What the Senator from North Carolina denominates as the twenty-first joint rule will now be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

21. After six days from the commencement of a second or subsequent session of Congress, all bills, resolutions, or reports which originated in either House, and at the close of the next preceding session remained undetermined in either House, shall be resumed and acted on in the same manner as if an adjournment had not taken place.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I have no objection to the immediate consideration of the joint resolution which it is proposed to take up, if it can be done properly; but the twenty-first joint rule contains a wholesome provision, and if it is in force it ought to be observed. Indeed, I may say that the Senate is bound to observe it, because even unanimous consent is not sufficient to suspend it without the concurrence of the House of Representatives. I know that it has been contended in the past that this rule is subject to the fifty-second rule of the Senate, which was read by the Clerk a minute ago. It seems to me plain upon the face of the rule that I am commenting upon, that its purpose was to prevent the consideration of any unfinished business at the beginning of a session of Congress until after the lapse of six days. Manifestly that was the spirit of the resolution, and if that were not so, it has been again and again determined by the rulings of the presiding officer of this body, and I believe such rulings have once or twice had the express sanction of the Senate, that such is the proper construction to give it. As the matter is one of some importance it may not be out of place to cite one or two rulings on that subject, and I beg leave to do so.

On the 5th of December, 1870—I read from page 3, part I, Congressional Globe, third session, forty-first Congress—this occurred:

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to take up House bill No. 2414, ceding jurisdiction to the State of Ohio.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Before putting the question on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, the Chair will call the attention of the Senate to the twenty-first joint rule. That rule, which the Chair understands has been construed twice by the Senate, reads as follows:

I omit the reading of the rule.

The Chair understands that upon two occasions the Senate of the United States decided, and on one of them, at least, on appeal, that this rule barred action by the Senate, during the first six days of the session of a Congress after the first, upon any House business. The Chair will state that in the House of Representatives the effect of this joint rule has been decided to be precisely the reverse—that it does not bar that action; but the Senate have heretofore decided upon appeal, in the case of a Pacific railroad bill sought to be taken up on motion of a then Senator from California, Mr. Gwin, which was objected to by Senator Pearce, of Maryland, that this joint rule, adopted by both Houses, prohibited action within the first six days of a second or subsequent session of a Congress upon business pending at the close of the preceding session.

I read that to show that the ruling on the part of the Senate has been uniform and that the effect of this joint rule when it is operative is to postpone the consideration of all business until after the lapse of six days.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator will allow me to suggest that I am quite willing to admit for the purposes of this case that the Senator is perfectly correct, and I hope the Senate will pass upon the question as the Chair stated it the other day and this morning as a question whether the twenty-first joint rule or any other of the joint rules, as they are called, is in force; in other words, whether the rule upon which the Senator claims to rely is one of the present laws of this body. That presents the very question. I think the Senator need not take any time upon the first point, that the twenty-first joint rule bars my motion, if there is now such a rule.

Mr. MERRIMON. As that point is conceded I will not detain the Senate further upon it, taking it for granted.

There are what have been termed joint rules of the Senate and House of Representatives. The most of them are coeval with the existence of the Government, and have always been in force and practiced under. They never were questioned nor were they ever abolished as a whole, nor was it ever suggested before the last session of Congress that there was any period of time when they were not in force and binding upon both Houses of Congress. At the late session the Senator from Vermont introduced a resolution which I will now read to the Senate. I read from the Journal of the last session, at page 56:

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That the joint rules of the Senate and House of Representatives in force at the close of the last session of Congress be, and the same are hereby, adopted as the joint rules of the two Houses for the present session.

The Senate will observe this fact and a material one in the course of my argument, that this resolutiond oes not purport to abolish the joint rules. Its simple province and effect is to re-adopt them, and that seemed to be the purpose of the mover. That resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules and there considered. That committee, on January 10, 1876, reported the same back as follows. I read from the Journal, page 87:

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Rules, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. EDMUNDS on the 15th of December last, adopting as the joint rules of the present session the joint rules of the Senate and House of Representatives in force at the close of the last session of Congress, reported it with an amendment.

The Senate proceeded, by unanimous consent, to consider the said resolution; and the amendment reported by the Committee on Rules, viz.: after the word "Resolved," insert "By the Senate, the House of Representatives concurring," having been agreed to, and

A further amendment having been proposed by Mr. MORTON,

Pending debate,

Ordered, That the further consideration of the said resolution be postponed to to-morrow.

On the 18th of January, the resolution was further considered; the proceedings will be found on page 112 of the Journal of last session, as follows:

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. EDMUNDS, adopting the joint rules of the two Houses in force at the close of the last session of Congress; and

The question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. MORTON, to except the twenty-second rule.

On motion by Mr. BAYARD to postpone the further consideration of the resolution to Monday next,

Pending debate,

On motion by Mr. HAMLIN,

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

I read now from the Journal of January 20 last, when the resolution was further considered, at page 125:

On motion by Mr. EDMUNDS,

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by him, adopting the joint rules of the two Houses in force at the close of the last session of Congress; and

The question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. MORTON, to except the twenty-second rule,

After debate,

It was determined in the affirmative.

On motion by Mr. BAYARD to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "that," and inserting "the Committee on Rules of the Senate and House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, instructed to examine, and after conference to report what amendments, if any, should be made in the present joint rules of the two Houses; and also whether any, and what, legislation is expedient in regard to the matters considered in the present twenty-second joint rule,"

After debate,

It was determined in the negative.

No further amendment being made to the resolution,

The resolution as amended was then agreed to, as follows:

I read now the resolution as it passed:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the joint rules of the Senate and House of Representatives in force at the close of the last session of Congress, excepting the twenty-second joint rule, be, and the same are hereby, adopted as the joint rules of the two Houses for the present session.

That resolution as it passed the Senate was sent to the House of Representatives. If the House ever took any action upon it the Senate has not been notified of it. So that the question is, whether or not the joint rules of the two Houses, which have prevailed from the beginning of the Government down to that time, at all events, are in force to-day; and also the other question is presented, Is it competent for the Senate to abolish the joint rules without the concurrence of the House of Representatives?

I beg to say before I proceed further in what I am about to submit, that I was on the Committee on Rules to which the resolution I have read was referred, and I concurred in the report the committee made recommending its passage with the amendment reported. I did so without a very great deal of consideration, deferring greatly to the large experience of the other members of the committee; and I did not trouble myself to go into an examination of the subject at all, for I could not see at the time that it was very material one way or another, as it was proposed simply to re-adopt the joint rules. The debate, however, on the occasion of the adoption of the resolution as it finally passed the Senate was a very interesting one and impressed me very much. I was particularly impressed by the arguments delivered by the Senator from Ohio who sat nearest me, [Mr. THURMAN,] and the Senator from New York who sits before me, [Mr. CONKLING,] which went largely to show that the House is a continuous and perpetual body. Their arguments induced me to modify my opinions very much at the time.

Mr. MORTON. What resolution is the Senator referring to?

Mr. MERRIMON. The resolution re-adopting the joint rules, passed at the late session. Since that debate I have given the subject very considerable reflection, and I am satisfied, with all due submission, that the committee were in error in reporting, and the Senate were in error in adopting, this resolution; or rather, I am satisfied that there was no necessity for adopting it, because the joint rules were in force and had been from the beginning almost of the Government down to that time and are in force to-day. And I wish now, as briefly as I can, to submit some considerations upon which I base this judgment; I believe they are correct and will stand the test of legal criticism.

Now, Mr. President, what are the joint rules? They are no more nor less than the embodiment of certain provisions adopted by the Senate and House of Representatives for the purpose of regulating the intercourse and intercommunication between these two bodies. Without them, we should be in utter confusion; it would be impossible to proceed easily and conveniently with business. They are as essential as the existence of each branch of Congress, for unless there is some means by which they can intercommunicate they had as well not exist, for the Senate cannot pass a law by itself nor can the House pass a law by itself. There must be some means of communication between the two Houses, and unless this is regulated by some rule there will be dissention, uncertainty, and utter confusion. All legislative bodies have such joint rules. They are absolutely essential.

It is said that there is no provision in the Constitution which authorizes these joint rules and which, when they are provided, sanctions their existence in such way as to give them such force as that they must be observed. With all respect, I deny that suggestion. It is provided in the Constitution that each House may determine its own rules. I read from section 5, of article 1, which is in these words:

Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member.

The word "determine" there implies more than to put an end to the rules. It means to devise them, to adopt them, to change them, to modify them, to abolish them, to put an end to them in the discretion of either branch of Congress, as they may be the rules of the one or the other. But it will be noted—and this is material—that this provision refers to the two Houses in their separate capacity. It refers to those matters in which each House is absolutely independent of the other, which concern them severally, and has no bearing whatever upon the intercommunication which is as essential as that each House should be governed by rules. There is no express provision in the Constitution, I concede, conferring upon Congress power to pass joint rules; but when we come to consider the nature of Congress we shall see that by necessary—essential—implication, the power does exist.

What is Congress? It is provided by the Constitution as one of the three co-ordinate Departments of the Government. In one sense it is a whole. It forms the Legislative Department of the Government. It is a whole existing without intermission, perpetual in its nature. The Congress is forever in existence in contemplation of the Constitution and laws. In this general sense it is one, an artificial being of oneness. When you come to consider it, however, in its details, it has a dual nature. It consists of two parts, separate, and independent, in many respects; but co-ordinate parts, one called the Senate and the other called the House of Representatives. But from its very nature, from its purposes as defined in the Constitution, and as we understand them to exist in the nature of government and under all parliamentary law, these two Houses are not in all respects independent of each other. In certain respects they are independent of each other, and in those respects they have rules for their separate government, and those are the rules which are allowed and provided for in the section of the Constitution I have just read. But they are dependent upon each other in many respects; they are affected by each other in many respects; and neither can proceed far, as I said a while ago, in the discharge of duty, neither can pass any law, and neither can take any action other than such as affects each House separately, without the concurrence and co-operation of the other House. And because they must concur, because they have these relations to each other, they must have some means to intercommunicate, and that intercommunication must be regulated by some rule; there must be some method about it; and that regulation is not inaptly styled joint rules. I cannot conceive how the two Houses would proceed successfully, regularly, efficiently, without some regulation of their intercourse with each other.

But how is such regulation, which is so essential and because of its essentiality the power must be implied by the Constitution—how is it to be made? Is it done by the independent action of either body? Can the Senate pass a class of joint rules and say that they shall have effect and that the House shall be governed by them? Can the House devise and adopt in that branch of Congress a class of joint rules and insist that the Senate shall observe them? Neither one House can do it any more than the other. Joint rules are proposed on the part of one House and are accepted upon the part of the other House. Each House must concur in adopting them. There is concurrence in the adoption of these rules for the purpose of regulating the intercommunication between the two Houses. I put it to anybody, if each House must concur in the adoption of these rules, if in the nature of Congress and the relation between these two Houses these rules are essential, and if they must be concurred in on the part of both Houses, can it be pretended for one moment that either House can withdraw its assent at pleasure or without the concurrence of the other House? It seems to me that such a proposition is absurd. It involves a destruction of the honor, the faith, and the virtue of each House, it seems to me. These rules stand upon a very different ground from the rules of each House taken separately. Those latter rules are framed under the express provision of the Constitution. The power to frame the joint rules exists in the Constitution by necessary implication; and when that power is exercised they have the same force and effect and are binding to the same extent upon each House as the rules of the two Houses respectively are binding upon each of them separately. If it were otherwise all confidence, all courtesy between the two Houses would be abrogated, destroyed, and we should be in a state of conflict and utter confusion. It would destroy the purpose for which the Congress was created, and nothing could be done except at the whim and caprice of one body or the other. There would be no permanent order or regularity. What would be the effect? Suppose to-day when the Clerk of the House shall come to the bar of the Senate with a message some Senator shall object, the message cannot be received unless a special resolution or order shall be passed for that purpose; and when the messenger from the Senate shall go down to the House with a message, there the messenger cannot be received unless there is a special order or resolution to that effect or some action of that sort shall be taken. Such a course as that in my judgment would involve a failure to exercise a plain implied power in the Constitution and would contravene all the laws of parliamentary bodies in all civilized countries.

I say, then, that this power exists by necessary implication, that it appears from the nature of our Congress and of the two Houses composing it, and because of the necessity for intercommunication between them, and that each branch of Congress, without any express provision, has the constitutional power and the right to adopt joint rules, and because they are adopted by the concurrence of both Houses, neither House can withdraw its assent to them without the concurrence of the other. The faith, the honor, the interest of each are pledged to the other for the observance of them, until by their concurrent action they shall be abolished.

But, sir, I know that it is said further that, if this be conceded, if all that I have contended for be admitted and these rules have existed as I have stated, yet they are not binding upon the various Congresses that assemble from time to time, until they shall be adopted by each succeeding Congress; and that is said because in the other branch of Congress its organization is divided into what are for convenience called Congresses. It is said that the House is not a perpetual body like the Senate, that it exists for two years, and then another House comes in, a different body entirely, and the Congresses are numbered consecutively beginning at number one and going on until now we are in the Forty-fourth Congress, and it is insisted further that an engagement of the kind I have described, denominated joint rules, with the Forty-third Congress is not an engagement with the Forty-fourth Congress, that these joint rules when adopted by one Congress are only binding while that Congress lasts, and that before they can have any binding effect on a subsequent Congress they must have the sanction of that subsequent Congress, must, in other words, be re-adopted. It is insisted that at the beginning of the late session of the Forty-fourth Congress there were no joint rules, that there could not be any, that there are none to-day, because since the beginning of the present Congress the House did not propose on its part to the Senate the adoption of the joint rules that have governed the Congresses in the past and the Senate have not adopted any that have been concurred in by the House, and therefore we are without them. I think this is a false view; it might indeed in some contingency be a fatal view of this subject. The Senate is a perpetual body. It exists without intermission of time, and it exists perpetually in contemplation of law. The House exists, in my judgment, in the same way. Can anybody doubt that the Congress, itself a co-ordinate branch of the Government, is a perpetual artificial body, that the Congress of the United States to-day is the same in the contemplation of law as it was the first day that the Constitution went into operation, that it always exists in contemplation of law, and that it may always be assembled under the Constitution for proper purposes? I take it not. In the very nature of things it is so. It is an artificial being intended to have this perpetual nature and this continuous existence without intermission. It is so with the House of Representatives, and it is more plainly so with the Senate because the Senate is never without an organization, while the House is at some times without an organization. Every two years it is without an organization for some months. But because it is without an organization it does not follow that the House of Representatives is not in existence. There is never a moment when it is not in existence; there is never a moment when it does not continue to exist; there is never a moment when it may not be assembled. That is not only so with our system of government but it is so with every other system of government, and this is one of the natural elements of government; every legislative body has a similar existence in this respect.

But it is said in reply to that that the practice has been to recognize the House of Representatives otherwise, and that practice has a great deal to do with this question of parliamentary rule. I concede the last fact and I insist upon it and shall bring it more in point after a while. The practice of the House has been at the beginning of each succeeding Congress to adopt new rules, or rather to adopt the rules of the preceding Congress. Although that is the practice it does not follow that it was necessary to do so. It seems to me—I can see no reason to the contrary, and I should be glad to be informed if there were or can be any reason to the contrary—that the rules adopted by the First Congress might well have been binding on the Second Congress and the Third Congress, and so on all the way down to the Forty-fourth Congress. That is the ordinary parliamentary rule; the parliamentary rule in England is that the rules of a preceding house bind a subsequent house. The rule—the practice—with us as to the House of Representatives is different. It seems to me that it would have been well if the rule that prevails in Parliament of England had prevailed in our House of Representatives. I see no reason why it might not have been done so; but still the practice was as I have stated until in 1868, I believe it was, when a rule was adopted providing in terms that the rules then existing should be binding upon all subsequent Houses until the rules should be modified or changed or abolished by the House of Representatives. That rule received the solemn sanction of the House, thereby indicating the opinion of the House of Representatives at that time that it was competent to make a rule of the House, adopted for its separate government, binding upon subsequent Congresses. I do not doubt that such power exists; there is nothing in the Constitution that forbids it, and general parliamentary usage sanctions such practice.

But, Mr. President, the joint rules stand upon entirely different ground. These joint rules have the sanction of the implied power in the Constitution which I have adverted to. They have not only that, but, inasmuch as it is an implied power, not limited by express terms, the exercise of it is governed in great measure by the ordinary parliamentary law affecting joint rules governing legislative bodies. The ordinary parliamentary law applies to and limits the exercise of this implied power to the making of all needful rules and regulations touching intercommunication between the two Houses of Congress. Now, what is the ordinary parliamentary law on this subject? The ordinary parliamentary law, unrestrained by any provision in our Constitution, is that the standing orders and rules of a preceding Parliament or a preceding session of Parliament bind the subsequent Parliament or session; and I beg to cite one or two authorities on this subject.

In the British Parliament—

I read now from Cushing on the Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies, section 248—

In the British Parliament, according to the ancient and invariable usage of the two houses, as evidenced by their rules, three is the number necessary to constitute a quorum of the Lords and forty a quorum of the Commons. These numbers, respectively, although established by and dependent upon usage merely, and within the power of each house to abrogate or change at any time, have nevertheless the force of standing orders, that is, they are equally binding upon every succeeding Parliament until abrogated, and do not require to be specially adopted in order to be in force.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now will the Senator read note 4 to the same paragraph?

Mr. MERRIMON. I will read another section, and then I will pay attention to my friend. I now read section 497 of the same work:

In Parliament it is customary for both branches, at the commencement of each session, to agree to or adopt certain orders, which have been found necessary in the transaction of business, and which last during the session only. These orders are very nearly or quite the same from one session to another. The sessional orders, which are some of them merely in affirmance of the common parliamentary law, have but very little to do with the ordinary proceedings of the house; which are governed and regulated, for the most part—

Now I read the material part of this section to the purpose I have in view—by a system of procedure which constitutes the law of the house, without any previous adoption or sanction by the house itself. This system consists, in part, of customs and usages, which have been handed down in the practice of both houses, from time to immemorial, and, in part, of positive regulations, which have been made, from time to time, by the two houses, respectively, and declared to be standing orders, and which consequently are binding upon every succeeding house, by the law and custom of Parliament, until they are vacated or rescinded. The consequence is, that each house of Parliament, as soon as it assembles, is provided with a code of rules for the government and regulation of its proceedings.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now will the Senator read section 498 bearing on the one he has just read?

Mr. MERRIMON. It is not material to my argument and will come more properly from my friend on the other side, but to gratify him I will read it and then comment upon it as I might have to do after he should have read it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish the Senator, however, would read note 4 to the first section he read.

Mr. MERRIMON. I know the point at which the Senator is aiming, and I intend to comment upon it. I shall evade nothing. I want to get at the truth.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But I submit to my honorable friend that if he is reading an authority he should not read half the lines and then stop.

Mr. MERRIMON. No, sir; I have read the whole section.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator has read section 497. Section 498 is really a part of it.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am going for your gratification, now, to read section 498, and going to comment on it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But I ask the Senator to read note 4 to the first section which he read, which is referred to as the author's part of the section, and then I ask him to read section 498 so that Senators can see the whole of what the author says upon the subject and not half of it.

Mr. MERRIMON. I will read for the Senator's gratification what he says and then make my comments upon it. I do not think he will be able to throw me off my line of argument.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly I do not wish to do that. I hope the Senator does not think I wish to disturb him.

Mr. MERRIMON. It will suit me to make comments on it now, as I might have to do it at another time. I read now the note to which the Senator refers:

By the system of standing orders, which is in use in England, it is in the power of the House of Commons, at any time, by simply declaring one of its orders a standing order, to make it binding on or in force in a succeeding House of Commons, as much as if it was an order of that house itself. This system does not prevail in this country. It is not in the power of a legislative assembly here to make any rules to bind its successors. That can only be done by constitutional provision or by law. Each assembly indeed usually adopts the rules and orders of its predecessors, in express terms, and until this is done they are not in force at all. There is an interval, therefore, of more or less duration, at the commencement of each assembly in this country, when the only rules in force in it are those of the common parliamentary law.

That is the note. Now I will read the other section the Senator desired me to read.

But in this country every one of the constitutions—

That is material now to my purpose, and I beg every one to remember it—

But in this country every one of the constitutions contains a provision that each legislative assembly thereby established may determine the rules of its proceeding. Hence, probably, in consequence of this constitutional provision, the system of standing orders has never been established in this country; and no legislative assembly is here governed or its proceedings regulated by any other rules and orders than those to which it gives its own consent. One of the proceedings, therefore, which take place at the commencement of the first session of legislative bodies in this country is the adoption of rules and orders for the regulation of its proceedings; and as this adoption of rules would expire with the session, unless otherwise specified, it would require to be renewed at the commencement of each succeeding session.

Now is there any other section that the honorable Senator wishes me to read?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly not. I only asked my friend to read those remarks that were in connection with those that he was reading and as a part of what the author was treating on that particular point. There are other sections to which I may call attention by and by.

Mr. MERRIMON. I believe it is usual to allow each Senator to conduct his own argument according to his own notions of propriety.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly, and I hope the Senator did not suppose that I did not intend to let him do what he pleased. I only asked him, according to the custom of the Senate, to do a particular thing. He was not bound to do it, I admit.

Mr. MERRIMON. It does not put me out of the way; it gives me an opportunity to comment on these clauses which, I take it, the Senator himself would have read by and by. It is material to consider that the note and the last section I read are founded entirely on constitutional provisions in this country. The power that I contend for is a constitutional provision existing by implication, necessary implication, and unlimited, and it is a power that is governed by the ordinary parliamentary law, and therefore these two sections do not apply.

I have shown, and I think it must be admitted by every reasonable man, that some means of intercommunication between the two branches of Congress is absolutely essential. We should have anarchy in Congress without it. Further, the power to make these rules exists by implication, and that power, as there is no express provision of the Constitution, is not governed like the powers exercised by the two Houses here separately and by the respective houses in the Legislatures of the several States under constitutional limitation. It is an implied power that is limited and governed by the general parliamentary law and governed by that only. Then what is the ordinary parliamentary law? It is that which I have called attention to. It is that the standing orders or rules of a parliamentary body are binding upon subsequent sessions, binding upon subsequent parliaments, binding upon Congress—all succeeding Congresses—from the beginning of the Government down to this day, without re-adoption at any time. The constitutional barrier is not interposed here as to joint rules and it cannot be, because there is no express provision in the Constitution defining it and limiting it. The power is an implied power and it is limited only by the general parliamentary law, as I have said, and that general parliamentary law is this: that wherever there are rules, whether for the government of one branch of a legislative body or another or whether they be joint rules for the government of both bodies, these rules are as binding upon subsequent sessions and upon subsequent Congresses and subsequent Parliaments as they were upon the Parliament or the Congress that adopted them until they shall be modified or abolished. That is the ground I occupy, and it seems to me that it is entirely consistent with reason.

I said a moment ago that practice had a great deal to do with this subject, and I invoke practice in support of the view that I have been submitting. What has been the practice in Congress on this subject? Let us see. Most of these joint rules came into existence shortly after the Constitution and the Government went into operation, three-fourths of them at least, and they have been acted upon by Congress from that day to this without intermission or question that they were binding on all subsequent Congresses. There never has been a time since the beginning of the Government when they did not exist and were not in force and acted under, and there was never a time until the late session of Congress when either branch of Congress deemed it necessary at all to re-adopt them or supposed they were not in existence and binding. That is the fact; that is the history of this matter; and if anybody can show to the contrary I will thank him to do so. This practice, ancient in its character in this country, must have great force in determining the question under discussion, and I take it that this practice, which has been tolerated, shows that, whether the view that I have submitted here of the power that authorized it was directly in the eye of Congress or not, it rests upon that power. It rests upon the grounds of this implied power, and this continuous practice has been governed by the ordinary parliamentary law which makes these rules as binding upon the present Congress as they were upon the first Congress that adopted them; and there is no escape, it seems to me, from that conclusion.

Not only have these joint rules existed and been binding on subsequent Congresses without re-adoption or re-affirmation in any way, but whenever questions have been raised involving their validity, sometimes under circumstances of great excitement, both branches of Congress have held that they were binding on both Houses, without any re-affirmation; and now I want to call attention to the rulings on that subject. There have been various rulings on this question which it is interesting to refer to at this moment. I refer now to the proceeding that was had in Congress in the Senate on December 8, 1870, which will be found in the Congressional Globe, part 1, third session, Forty-first Congress. A question on the order of business was before the Senate, and these among other proceedings were had; I read from the Globe:

Mr. ABBOTT. Is it proper to make a report from a committee?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair does not call for reports of committees yet; but if there is a committee in existence, of course it can make a report.

Mr. ABBOTT. I desire to make a report to accompany Senate bill No. 717.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. From what committee?

Mr. ABBOTT. The Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That cannot be done. There is no Committee on Military Affairs now in existence. There is one committee in existence, the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and the Chair does not remember any other.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, am I correct in understanding the ruling of the Chair the other day to be that it is not competent, even by unanimous consent, to take up a bill pending before the Senate during the first six days of the session?

Mr. POMEROY. We can do anything by unanimous consent.

Mr. DRAKE. We cannot violate a joint rule by unanimous consent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks a joint rule cannot be violated by unanimous consent.

Mr. DRAKE. The question I ask, sir, is whether it is now in order, by unanimous consent, to take up a bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. By the ruling of the predecessors of the present occupant of the chair it would not be in order. They have ruled that by the joint rule adopted by the two Houses this cannot be done during the first six days of any session of a Congress subsequent to the first; and being a joint rule, it can only be dispensed with as the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules are at the close of the session, by the consent of both Houses. But the Chair stated before that he had examined the record for some years back and found that at almost every session this rule had been waived, apparently by unanimous consent; motions made to take up bills, no dissent made, no ruling required, and they have been entertained.

Mr. DRAKE. I would inquire, then, sir, of the Chair how it was that a bill was passed just now from the Committee on Contingent Expenses?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That does not come within the rule. The rule applies to business from a preceding session, not to original bills introduced at this session. It therefore gives original bills a priority over bills of a previous session during these six days. They can be introduced and acted on.

Mr. DRAKE. I would inquire of the Chair further, whether the rule found by the Chair applies to Senate bills pending here from the last session as well as to bills from the House of Representatives?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It applies to bills of each House; and the ruling made on the two occasions to which the Chair has already referred was in regard to Senate bills, prohibiting action on Senate bills that remained over.

That is the first ruling on the subject to which I direct attention. I wish now to refer to a ruling on the same subject on another very interesting occasion. It was February 12, 1873, on the occasion of the counting of the electoral votes for President and Vice-President. The proceedings I refer to were as follows:

Mr. TRUMBULL. I object to this debate—

Some one had offered a statute which he wanted read on the occasion of counting the electoral votes:

Mr. TRUMBULL. I object to this debate. If the statute cannot be read, certainly Senators should not be allowed to indulge in debate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois insists on the enforcement of the rule. The Chair has ruled that this is in the nature of debate. The Secretary has read the official paper from Arkansas, and attempted to describe the seal——

Mr. CONKLING. I beg pardon of the Chair if I interrupt him.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Not at all.

Mr. CONKLING. My purpose is to ask unanimous consent that we may hear the statute read, if there be a statute bearing on the subject.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island objected.

Mr. ANTHONY. I withdraw the objection; but I ask the Chair if the Senate, by unanimous consent, can dispense with a joint rule of the two Houses of Congress? I make no objection, however.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate, by unanimous consent, cannot dispense with a joint rule; and if there is no protest against a statute being read, that not being language spoken by any Senator, the Chair himself would not check the reading of that statute; but he would if any Senator commented on it, which would be in the nature of debate. The Chair does not know where the statute is; but if no Senator objects, the statute will be reported. [A pause.] It does not appear to be in the Chamber.

Now I want to cite the opinion of the Senator from Vermont himself on this very subject. [Examining a Globe.] I had it marked here if I have not lost it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I can give it to the Senator again if he would like to have it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MERRIMON. I may have to avail myself of your courtesy, sir. [Laughter.] I will thank the Senator to look at the page.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think I can refer to it in a moment, because I am not in the habit of reading my own speeches very often.

Mr. MERRIMON. It would be better if the Senator would read them more often.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I dare say. I should learn more than I should by reading others, I admit.

Mr. MERRIMON. I think I can turn to it now without difficulty.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not happen to have the index of the volume before me.

Mr. MERRIMON. I have it now, and will read what the Senator said:

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was about to say that the rule of the Senate last read, which speaks generally of taking up business at subsequent sessions, was understood by the Committee on Rules, as I think it must be by the Senate, to be in perfect harmony with the joint rule, over which, of course, we have no control. One provides generally for what shall be done at a session; the other provides at what particular period in the session, when it arrives, a particular class of business shall be acted upon; so that both rules stand in harmony.

I have cited these proceedings, important as they are, for the purpose of showing, in the first place, that each House has not control over the joint rules at its will and pleasure as was contended here during the last session. A joint rule cannot be determined by one branch of Congress without the consent of the other branch for reasons that I have already submitted. And then I insist that these joint rules are in force to-day as much as they were at the first Congress when they were adopted; that by the general parliamentary law, there being no constitutional provision except the implied power I have contended for, existing rules that governed preceding Congresses are binding on subsequent Congresses. I have supported that position further by calling the attention of the Senate to the fact that these joint rules, or most of them, are almost coeval with the Government; that they existed from the beginning of the Government down to this time and have been practiced under by every subsequent Congress. They never were questioned, they never were re-adopted, and never was it suggested that it was necessary to re-adopt them until the last session.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to ask the Senator, with his permission, if all he has read does not go simply to this point, that while a joint rule is accepted as being the rule and in force the Senate cannot by unanimous consent dispense with it in a particular case? That is a very different thing from abrogating a rule. While it is acknowledged to be a rule it must be applied to all cases, and we cannot by general consent dispense with it in a particular case. But that does not at all go to the point that the rule may be abrogated or declared not to exist. While we accept the rule as being in existence we cannot dispense with it in a particular case, because that makes it no rule at all. To abrogate a rule or to say it is not a rule at all is one thing; but to admit it to be a rule and to propose to dispense with it in a particular case is a very different thing. That is all it goes to.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am glad that the Senator has interrupted me. Let us see now what that proposition leads to. What is a joint rule? It is a rule proposed by one House to the other and concurred in by both. It is a solemn and essential engagement, which has the sanction of the Constitution in the way I have described and it is done by an implied power, one that is essential to the free and convenient operation of Congress in the exercise of all its powers. The Senate proposes to the House a joint rule; the House agrees to it. Then I say by no rule of reason, no rule of honor, no rule of virtue, no rule of sound policy, can either party be relieved from that contract without the consent of the other. It seems to me that it would be the basest dishonor to insist upon such a view as that. Sir, these joint rules are no more nor less than a solemn engagement by both Houses to do certain things, and binding upon the consciences and honor of both. If anybody can show the contrary I should be glad to have him do it. These joint rules are no more nor less than a contract, an engagement between the two Houses that has the sanction of the Constitution in the way I have undertaken to describe.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How can the Senator prove that? He says he should like somebody to prove the contrary. That may be a good way to establish an affirmative proposition by saying "I say a thing is not so; and now if anybody can prove that it is so, I should like to have him do it."

Mr. MERRIMON. A proposition agreed to by A and B, made on the part of A and accepted by B, is binding; it requires the concurrence of both parties; but the Senator seems to contend for the doctrine that A can recede from it at will without the concurrence of B. I have not heard of such justice in this world before.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not contended for anything of the kind. What I ask the Senator to prove is not his logic, but his premises. He says a joint rule is a contract. I should like to have him show that.

Mr. MERRIMON. It is not a contract in the technical sense, but an engagement between the two branches of Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to see my friend prove that, if he can.

Mr. MERRIMON. It is a proposition by the one accepted by the other; and each spreads it upon its book of rules, and here all the joint rules are spread out upon our book of rules the same as upon the book of rules of the House. There is not only this solemn engagement, as the record of the journals and debates here show, but here in the proper, legal, logical form is the immemorial evidence of this engagement; it exists and has existed from the foundation of the Government until now, and yet it is contended that one House can recede from this engagement, honorably, virtuously, and honestly; that one party can recede from it without the consent of the other. I do not believe in any such doctrine. It certainly cannot receive the sanction of justice; it is rank injustice; and it seems to me it would be rank dishonor for either branch of Congress to exercise such a power. It has the physical power to do it. Either branch has the physical power to do it, but it has no right to do it. That is the view I take of the whole matter.

Mr. President, if I have made myself understood, the case I have made is this: By the practice of each House of Congress with the sanction of the Constitution, each House makes its own rules determinable at the will of each. By the practice of the House of Representatives its rules last only from Congress to Congress, and in each subsequent Congress the practice has been to re-adopt the rules of the House; but I apprehend I think I have shown that it was competent for the lower branch of Congress to adopt another practice, which probably would have been sounder, and I have called attention to the fact that the House of Representatives passed an order at one time that the rules should be binding on subsequent Congresses. I have endeavored to show further that the joint rules stand on entirely different ground and that they are not governed by this provision of the Constitution upon which I have commented, to-wit, that "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings," but that they are authorized by an implied power which is limited by the general parliamentary law.

I have shown that the very nature of Congress requires that there shall be intercommunication between the two branches; that business between the two branches cannot be conducted unless there is some regulated mode of doing it; that the power is therefore necessarily implied to make joint rules or joint orders for such regulation, the conduct of business, between the two Houses; that joint rules were adopted at the beginning of the Government; that they have existed from that day to this, and Congress has used them, every Congress until the present Congress recognizing them all the time as binding and having every binding provision that was necessary to facilitate the purpose of intercommunication between the two Houses. They have existed without intermission, and they have always been recognized as binding, and they vest upon the implied power in the Constitution, governed only by the general parliamentary law which is in effect that the general standing rules and orders bind not only the Parliament which adopts them, but bind all subsequent Parliaments and Congresses until they shall be abolished, not by one branch, but by the concurrence of both branches. These rules have never been abolished by the concurrence of both branches. The Senate did not purport to abolish them at all at the last session; it simply proposed, with the concurrence of the House, to re-adopt them—a superfluous work. It was not necessary that it should be done. And therefore I insist that the joint rules are in full force to-day, and that we are as much bound by them as the Congress has ever been at any past period of the Government.

I want to repeat a word as to myself before I take my seat. I did concur in the report from the Committee on Rules at the last session. I did not give the matter serious consideration in committee, deferring greatly to the large experience of the other members. When the discussion took place it was a very interesting one. I was very much impressed with the able arguments delivered by the Senator from New York and the Senator from Ohio, and since that time I have given the subject serious reflection and I do not now entertain the slightest doubt that the position I occupy is the true and lawful one.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, at the last session the twenty-second joint rule, the one under which the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States have been counted by Congress, was under consideration, and this House took action in regard to it. This House decided that it, so far as it could do so, would rescind that joint rule. At the same time that they took this action this House proceeded to re-enact or to re-affirm the other joint rules of the two bodies, and notified the House of Representatives of that fact. The other House referred the action of the Senate to a committee, but no report was made upon it and no action taken by the House. At the close of the session in the House the usual action was taken, suspending for the time being the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules. A message was sent to the Senate by the House notifying the Senate that the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules had been suspended for the remainder of the session; and to that message from the House the Senate, on motion of the Senator from Vermont, replied that there were no joint rules in force. That is the attitude of the case.

Now, Mr. President, the question arises whether there are any joint rules in force. Without undertaking to go into the legal or constitutional merits of this question, I desire to say only a few words in regard to the practical operation of the matter. I insist that, although at the beginning of the last session of the Senate it was claimed that the joint rules were not in force, yet the Senate and House both acted every day of the session, and many times every day of the session, under the joint rules, and that the business of Congress could not be carried on for one day without the joint rules. Let me illustrate that now, sir, by reference to the joint rules, and to what was done during the whole of the last session and what has been done during this session up to this time, and what was just a few moments ago done in receiving a message from the other House. The first joint rule is in regard to conferences; it provides:

> In every case of an amendment of a bill agreed to in one House and dissented to in the other, if either House shall request a conference, and appoint a committee for that purpose, and the other House shall also appoint a committee to confer, such committee shall, at a convenient hour, to be agreed on by their chairmen, meet in the conference chamber, and state to each other, verbally or in writing, as either shall choose, the reasons of their respective Houses for and against the amendment, and confer freely thereon.

During the last session of this Congress there were more committees of conference appointed, I suppose, than there ever had been in the whole history of the Government. There was no authority to appoint any committee of conference except that joint rule.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there not a general parliamentary law that provides for committees of conference?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I do not know if there is any such.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator ought to know that there is.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Perhaps that may be so, but I took it for granted that we were acting under this joint rule. We could not appoint a committee of conference except under it or the general parliamentary law.

The second joint rule provides for the sending of messages, for communicating from one House to the other. Without this joint rule, by what authority would you have a right to receive a message from the other House? You do it simply because you have a joint rule providing for transmitting messages from House to House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suppose when the Constitution of 1787 was adopted and we had the first Senate, the Senators must have been sworn in and taken their seats before they made any joint rules. I should like to ask the Senator how he supposes the two Houses communicated on the first day of their meeting?

Mr. JOHNSTON. That was the organization of the Government, and I suppose some means were taken for organization.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator think it was unconstitutional?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Every government has to be started by some means or other, by some special order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Cannot the government that starts keep going by the same means?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I think not. I think, after the government is regularly organized and put into operation by legitimate means, then its branches proceed to adopt rules for their future government, guidance, and direction. The means adopted after the Government was started and went into operation was the establishment of joint rules. The bulk of the joint rules were adopted in the year 1789. The first joint rule, in regard to committees of conference, was adopted on the 15th of April, 1789, and has been practiced under from that day to this. When the government is originated and organized of course there must be some power to put it into operation, but once organized then it provides the means for carrying itself on, and the means provided in the beginning for the mere starting of the machinery of the government are discharged when the government gets fairly under way and then new means are adopted, other means; and whatever might have been the original way in which the two Houses of Congress when they first assembled under the Constitution proceeded, it was not intended to regulate the subsequent action of the bodies, but was only intended to put the Government into operation. They then proceeded to provide for the carrying on of the Government and for intercourse between the two bodies. Here is this first joint rule, in regard to committees of conference, adopted on the 15th of April, 1789, which has been in force ever since and acted upon at every session of Congress from that day to the present time and acted upon to the very last hour of the last session of Congress. The same is the case in regard to the transmitting of messages. We transmit messages from House to House and do it under the joint rules. Why, only a few moments ago this very day a message was received from the House. By what authority was that received unless it was under authority of the joint rules? We could not carry on business for one day without these joint rules, we could not transmit a message to the House, we could not receive a message from the House, we could not have a conference committee without them.

Mr. MORTON. I ask the Senator if a conference committee requires a joint rule to authorize it? The Senate appoints a committee to confer with a like committee on the part of the House. That requires no joint rule if the House responds to it. Suppose the Senate appoints a committee to confer with the merchants of New York in regard to a particular matter in which that city is interested, does that require a joint rule? The sending of messages from one House to the other requires no joint rule.

Mr. JOHNSTON. These two Houses are regulated either by their respective rules or by the joint rules of the two bodies. They have no other guide of action except their separate, distinct rules and the joint rules. The Senate has rules which regulate its action; the House of Representatives has rules which regulate its action; and the joint rules regulate the joint action of the two Houses and the joint intercourse of the two bodies. Neither House can do anything except under its own rules or the joint rules. They were passed for the purpose of regulating and controlling the action of each body and the action of the two bodies. That has been the course practiced from the beginning of the Government to the present time, and there has been no other practice. It has not been under parliamentary law. We have not appointed conference committees under the parliamentary law; we have appointed them under the joint rule adopted in 1789 and in force to this day, and upon no other rule. I do not believe that without the adoption of some rule the House could habitually receive messages from the Senate and the Senate messages from the House, as we do every day of the session.

We have a standing rule of the Senate providing for the appointment of certain standing committees. The joint rule provides for the appointment of certain other committees. One of the committees provided for by the joint rules is a Committee of Engrossed Bills and another is a Committee on Enrolled Bills, and a joint rule provides for the examination of enrolled bills and another for signing enrolled bills by the presiding officer. Another joint rule is for the presentation of enrolled bills to the President. Each and every one of these things is done by virtue of a joint rule, and not of a standing rule of the Senate. Here we have committees appointed; we have a certain number of committees which are provided for by the rules of the Senate. The Senate, of course, have the right to appoint them and have appointed them; but at this very session we have appointed committees that have no existence under the rules of the Senate, and only under the joint rules. We have appointed a Committee on Engrossed Bills.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator if we did not, and with his concurrence, appoint all those committees by unanimous resolution adopted by the Senate, defining their powers and providing that they should be created?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Just as you always have done.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg the Senator's pardon, just as we never have done while acting under what you call joint rules.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I ask the Senator by what right we appointed a joint committee by the unanimous consent of this body.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We do not appoint a joint committee by unanimous consent of this body; and we never have appointed a joint committee and probably never shall.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Where do you find authority for appointing a Committee on the Library except under one of the joint rules?

Mr. EDMUNDS. We have a right to appoit a Committee on the Library and have a right to appoint a committee on the moon, if we like.

Mr. JOHNSTON. There has been from time immemorial a Joint Committee on the Library, existing by the joint rules of the two Houses, and we have appointed that same committee at this very session, exactly as we had done on previous occasions.

Mr. SARGENT. If the Senator will look at the order made he will find that it was not the same as that made on previous occasions. He will find that, recognizing the fact that there was no joint rule, the Senate by its resolution provided for a Committee on the Library, which when appointed should have the power to act concurrently with the committee of the House in certain matters which, before that time, came within the province of the joint committee.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask the Senator from California whether the Committee on the Library was not appointed at the last session in a different mode and whether it did not continue in existence until the present session of Congress, expending the money appropriated by Congress; and, if the joint rules were not in existence at that time, whether there was any authority in the Committee on the Library to have expended one dollar whatever?

Mr. SARGENT. There may have been no authority or they may have exceeded any authority which they did have. That question I am not to decide upon. I simply say that the Senate without dissent at this session has recognized the non-existence of the joint rule in reference to the Committee on the Library, and has passed a resolution of the Senate to cover that point.

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg to make this remark: The very provision incorporated into the order adopting the report of the committee on committees shows the importance of joint rules, indeed the absolute necessity of them; for if there are no joint rules there can be no communication between the two Houses except by a special order in every case, and then it depends on the whim of either branch of Congress whether that special order will be recognized. The House is not bound by any obligation to recognize the appointment of the Senate branch of that joint committee if we have no joint rules.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSTON. I believe I have the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SARGENT. Unquestionably it is an inconvenience to have no joint rules between the two Houses. I suppose no one will doubt that. The fact that it is inconvenient to have no joint rules does not of itself create joint rules. I should like to ask the Senator who speaks of an analogy between a contract made between private parties and joint rules, what party there is in existence to be bound by joint rules after Congress adjourns. Even if it were conceded that joint rules adopted at the commencement of a Congress would bind both sessions or any sessions of that Congress until its expiration unless both Houses assented to their being rescinded, I ask how, after that Congress has finally adjourned and there is no House of Representatives in existence and none meeting for months, any action of the previous House can bind the subsequent House, or how the Senate in spite of itself can be bound in favor of a House which has not yet assembled?

Mr. MERRIMON. I will answer the Senator with pleasure. Congress itself is an artificial body; each branch of Congress is an artificial body. The engagement embodied in the joint rules between the two Houses of Congress is not between A B and C D of the Senate, and E F and G H of the House. It is an engagement between the Senate on the one part in its corporate or artificial capacity, and the House of Representatives in its corporate or artificial capacity. These joint rules are binding upon each subsequent Congress, just as the by-laws of a corporation that are adopted by one board are binding upon another board which comes in after it. They are binding upon that creation that exists by virtue of the Constitution and in contemplation of the Constitution and laws.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator then inform me what becomes of the qualification he makes that Congress shall have power to make joint rules, if the first Congress that assembled had power to make joint rules, and did make them, to bind every subsequent Congress, and neither House of any subsequent Congress has power to divest itself of them? What becomes of the continuing implication, which he says exists, that there is power to make joint rules?

Mr. MERRIMON. My friend inadvertently assigns me a position that I do not occupy. I said these joint rules, adopted at the first session of Congress, are binding upon every subsequent session of Congress and every subsequent Congress, until some Congress shall modify them, alter them, or abolish them; and I say that one branch of Congress cannot abolish or modify any of them without the concurrence of the other.

Mr. SARGENT. My friend, I think, still does not appreciate my point. The Constitution, from which this implication arises, provides that each House shall have the power to make rules for its own government, independent of the other House. That is the constitutional provision, and from that he implies the power to make joint rules. It is only by implication that the power can exist, as confessed by the Senator. Now, if each Congress has the power by the Constitution to make joint rules, then the Senate has the right at the commencement of Congress to decide that the rules which the previous Senate had it will not be bound by, and more especially it must be the case where there is no necessary connection between the members of the former House and those that are assembled, as is the case in the other branch at the opening of every Congress.

Mr. MERRIMON. If my friend had done me the honor to listen to my argument awhile ago he would not have made this point. The provision of the Constitution that each House may determine its own rules applies to the two Houses as separate bodies, and it applies only to those matters in which each House is absolutely independent of the other. That is the way that that provision of the Constitution applies, and it does not apply to the two Houses in their joint capacity and in the capacity in which they are interested in each other and in intercommunication. The implied power that I contend for, and that must exist of necessity, bears upon both of them; it exists in the House and it exists in the Senate; and it is a power, regulated and limited only by the general parliamentary law, on the part of each House to contract or to engage with the other in the matter of regulation of their intercommunication. That is the way it acts.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the Senator from Virginia to yield to me for a moment to make an inquiry.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I will.

Mr. DAVIS. I should be glad to have the attention of the Senator from Iowa, who reported the list of committees a day or two ago. I understand from the Senator from California that there was something unusual, something different from what had occurred heretofore, in the adoption of the resolutions in regard to the committees a day or two ago at this session. The Senator from Iowa and the Senate, I think, will recollect that I made the inquiry at the time of the adoption by unanimous consent of the report of the Senator from Iowa in regard to the committees, whether there was anything unusual or whether all was as usual in the appointment of the committees, and the answer was that there was nothing unusual. I understood from the Senator from Iowa that there was no unusual resolution accompanying the list of committees, but that they were appointed in the usual way.

Mr. WRIGHT. When I presented the resolution under which the committees were appointed for the present session of Congress, I remember the Senator from West Virginia asking me a question about it. I see that from what he says now I did not understand his inquiry. My understanding was that he asked whether there was any change or anything unusual in the mode of the appointment of committees. My answer was on that supposition; but when I made answer I did not understand the question as he puts it now. At the time the inquiry was made of me I was engaged in conversation with some person and my understanding of the inquiry was whether there was any change made, any departure from the ordinary manner of appointing committees, and my reply was in answer to that inquiry.

Mr. DAVIS. Then, Mr. President, there was a misunderstanding at the time of the question propounded by myself to my friend from Iowa. The question was intended to cover the ground whether or not there were unusual resolutions of any kind accompanying the appointment of the committee. The answer was, as has been indicated by the Senator himself, no, he having misunderstood my question. Now we find that there was a change from the usual way of appointing the committees, and it was done, of course, by the Senate under a misapprehension, and was not known at the time. I make this statement so that it may hereafter be referred to again by some Senators.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, if it be true that there are no joint rules operative in Congress to regulate intercourse between the two Houses, this practical result would follow: If this body should desire to send a message to the other House it cannot be done under the rules as it has been previously done, but the matter would have specially to be brought to the attention of the body and action taken upon each separate message. If we want to communicate the fact that we have passed a bill, passed a resolution, or anything of that sort, then some Senator would have to rise in his place and make the motion that a committee be appointed or that a messenger be sent for that purpose in each and every special case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will look at the Journals of the Senate from the beginning of the Government he will see that, except stating that a member made the motion, the Senate in each case makes an order as to what person shall carry the message to the House.

Mr. JOHNSTON. It is done under a joint rule.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg the Senator's pardon, because the joint rules do not provide who shall carry a message.

Mr. JOHNSTON. But practice does.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senate orders in every case that the Secretary, or anybody else it chooses, shall take the message, and that order is entered every time as a matter of course.

Mr. JOHNSTON. One joint rule provides that—

Messages shall be sent by such persons as a sense of propriety in each House may determine to be proper.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Cannot that be done without a joint rule?

Mr. JOHNSTON. It has not been done without a joint rule. Congress has not thought so heretofore.

Mr. SARGENT. On page 553 of the Senate Journal of the last session I find the following:

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives thereof.

That is, notify the House of a resolution we had passed. In every case it seems that the Secretary or some other person is authorized to enter such an order.

Mr. JOHNSTON. That is done according to the practice existing under the joint rule as a matter of course. There has been no special order. Look at that Journal and you will find that no special motion was made to that effect, no special order submitted, but it was done under the general order of the two Houses according to the joint rules.

Mr. SARGENT. I will give the Senator a parallel case. Here is a large number of petitions found on page 332 of the same Journal followed by the words:

Ordered, That they be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

No Senator moved that those petitions be so referred. In nine cases out of ten where a petition is referred the presiding officer says, it will be referred so and so. This order is then entered in the Journal as if ordered by a vote of the Senate. That is not done under a joint rule.

Mr. JOHNSTON. No, it is done under a standing rule.

Mr. SARGENT. It is exactly a parallel case.

Mr. JOHNSTON. It is done under a Senate rule, not under a joint rule; but I insist that it is impossible for Congress to go on one day in the absence of the joint rules; that we acted under them at the last session up to the last hour; that we have been acting under them at this session; and that we could not carry on the business of the Government without the joint rules. We have done things which we could only do by virtue of the joint rules, and having acted under them, having been guided by them, having regulated the Government by them, they cannot be disregarded.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator be kind enough to state, if I do not too much interrupt him, what are the things which he thinks we have done that could not have been done without the joint rules?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I will state what we have done under those rules. We have appointed committees of conference and those committees of conference have made reports to the House and to the Senate, their reports have been adopted by the two Houses, and received the signature of the President, and become laws. That has been done under the joint rules of the two Houses.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But the statement of the Senator was that we had done things that could not have been done without the joint rules. What I ask him to do is for information to tell us specifically what those things are.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I mentioned one.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very good; that is the kind.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I mentioned one thing that was done under the joint rules, and I venture to say that when the Senator agreed to appointing a committee of conference or acted on a conference he did not consider that it was done under general parliamentary law, but under the joint rules; and the bills on which conferences were thus had have passed and have become laws of the land. Practically, I insist that we could not get along without these joint rules.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, perhaps there is no legal proposition that can be started in favor of which an argument cannot be made. If there is a plain proposition to my mind, one perhaps plainer than another, it is that the twenty-second joint rule was nullified; that we have no joint rules of any kind except by the consent of each body; and that if that consent has been once given it may be withdrawn at any time. While a joint rule exists it is not competent, as shown probably by the Senator from North Carolina, to suspend it in a particular case that might suit the convenience of one House and continue it as to all other cases; but when a joint rule has been abrogated, then of course it is no longer to be regarded. Until formally abrogated, when it has once been made, both Houses are bound in good faith to observe it, not bound in law but simply bound in good faith. Joint rules are not laws. They are not submitted to the President; they are not enacted. They are in no sense laws, but they are mere methods of doing business between the two Houses, which are agreed upon for mutual convenience. That is all there is about them. Everything the Senator from Virginia mentioned we can do without joint rules. We can send and receive messages from one House to the other without a joint rule. We can appoint committees of conference to confer with the House, or with a committee on the part of the House, or with the merchants of New York, or with anybody, without a joint rule.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I agree to what the Senator has said, that we can do these things without any joint rule; but I wish to know whether any communication from this House to the other can be made except by a special order unless it is made under a joint rule of the two bodies?

Mr. EDMUNDS. But there is a special order in every case.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Could our Secretary be sent to the House of Representatives without being specially ordered to do so under any other rule than the joint rule on that subject?

Mr. MORTON. As the Senator from Vermont suggests, there is a special order in every case, and it need not be repeated every time. But aside from that, if that is the habit of the Clerk, and he does it by the consent of the Senate, it is the same thing precisely as if he was specially instructed in every case. It requires no concurrence upon the part of the other House for him to do that thing; and whether the Clerk does it by the consent of the Senate or whether he does it in pursuance of any specific rule makes no sort of difference. It does not require the concurrence of the other House or require a joint rule to enable him to do these things.

Mr. MERRIMON. But the Clerk cannot do it without a special order. Congress seeing the importance of it, one of the first things the first Congress did was to raise a Committee on Rules and a committee also on joint rules. The Congress met in March and on the 25th of April the joint rules were in operation.

Mr. MORTON. So far as joint rules are concerned, they are unknown to the Constitution. There is no provision for them. They are not laws, and they are not provided for by any provision of the Constitution. They simply spring up out of the condition of things between the two Houses, and they are under the control of each House; that is to say, each House can withdraw from them at pleasure.

Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member.

At the end of every two years a Congress dies. The new House is as essentially new as if it had been the first House. It makes its own rules of proceeding. It is not bound by anything a former House has done. This has been the received construction ever since the foundation of the Government. When a new House is organized it adopts its rules of proceeding. It is not bound by any previous action of a former House. It begins de novo. The present House has done it, and every other House has exerted its power in that particular. Will it be pretended that the present House of Representatives is bound by joint rules made by a former House, and that it cannot get clear of them except by the consent of the Senate? No Senator has said that; and I make this direct proposition: is the present House of Representatives bound by a joint rule made by a former House unless the Senate consents to its repeal?

Mr. MERRIMON. I say yes.

Mr. MORTON. I submit to my friend that it is an after-thought.

Mr. MERRIMON. No, sir.

Mr. MORTON. It is an after-thought of my friend himself, as he admitted this morning. This whole pretext that the twenty-second joint rule and that the other joint rules are in operation is an after-thought. When the question was up here less than a year ago there was not a Senator who entertained any other opinion, and the roll was not even called when the resolution was adopted. I will read the resolution adopted by the Senate on the occasion to which I allude:

Resolved, That the joint rules of the Senate and House of Representatives in force at the close of the last session of Congress, excepting the twenty-second joint rule, be, and the same are hereby, adopted as the joint rules of the two Houses for the present session.

That resolution passed this body unanimously. There was no one to call for the yeas and nays. My friend from North Carolina voted for it, and he voted for it, as I understand him now, understandingly.

Mr. MERRIMON. No, sir; the Senator does me injustice and resorts to the lamest way to argue a question, an ad hominem argument. I, at the time, as I have explained twice this morning, concurred in the report of the committee with very little reflection and without examination, deferring to the larger experience of the other members of the committee. I have said before, this morning, that after the able arguments of the Senator from Ohio who sits on my right nearest me and of the Senator from New York my opinions at that time were very much changed, and I mentioned it to a member of the committee at that very moment and told him that my opinion had been shaken very much. Since that time I have given the subject more reflection.

Mr. MORTON. I think my friend does injustice to his reflection.

Mr. MERRIMON. I claim to have the manhood, when I change my opinion under such circumstances as these, to express it and to admit it.

Mr. MORTON. I do not do my friend such injustice. I said it was an after-thought, and my friend says that he changed his mind upon reflection.

Mr. MERRIMON. My friend talks about the twenty-second joint rule as though that were the only rule. I do not know that the twenty-second joint rule has more to do with this debate than any other joint rule. I entertain opinions about the twenty-second joint rule not material to be expressed now at all.

Mr. MORTON. My friend says the twenty-second joint rule has no more to do with this question than any other joint rule. I am inclined to think, or at least I had thought up to that moment, that it had all to do with it.

Mr. MERRIMON. The Senator is very much mistaken, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. MORTON. I thought that it was to preserve that rule in force that this argument was now made. My friend is earnest and sincere about it and I do not doubt for a moment that he entertained a different opinion last session when the vote was taken; and he himself will not deny it.

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, I do deny it.

Mr. MORTON. But my friend voted for this resolution; there was no opposition to it.

Mr. MERRIMON. I did not vote for the resolution. I did not vote at all; and I went, as I repeat to you now, to a member of the committee and told him that my opinion had been very much changed upon the subject and that I was thinking seriously after the debate had progressed some time, and it was a very interesting one, whether I should not get up then and declare my dissent; but I did not feel any great interest in the matter, because I supposed the House would promptly concur and there would be no difficulty about it.

Mr. MORTON. According to my friend's present statement he was on the fence when the vote was taken; he was not on either side.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to correct an error into which he has perhaps inadvertently fallen? He says that in the discussion there was no expression of dissent from that view. I desire to call his attention to some remarks which I made on that occasion myself, found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 435 of volume 4, part 1. I then used this language:

But I do not concur in the views expressed by the other Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] that it is competent for this body to annul, at pleasure, any joint rule between the two Houses. The view which I take of these joint rules is that as they require the concurrent action of both Houses they partake of the nature of a statute, and that neither House may annul a joint rule without the concurrence of the body that helped enact it. I therefore do not believe that it is competent for the Senate of the United States to annul the twenty-second joint rule, nor do I believe that it is competent for the House, after its having been enacted or ordered by the concurrent action of both Houses, without the concurrent action of both Houses to render it null and void. This is the view I take of the joint rules.

So that the Senator from Indiana is mistaken when he says that no dissent whatever was made at that time.

Mr. MORTON. I did not recollect what my friend from Delaware said; but I will ask him if he voted against the resolution.

Mr. SAULSBURY. My vote is a matter of memory, and it may be supposed from my speech that I voted against it.

Mr. MORTON. The yeas and nays were not taken, and my recollection is that there was no one voting in the negative. The resolution was adopted by common consent. I know that my friend from North Carolina is so vigilant and that my friend from Delaware is so vigilant in regard to the performance of their duty that if they had thought we were taking an unconstitutional step, they would have called a halt.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not see how I could express myself more plainly than I did in the few sentences I uttered.

Mr. MORTON. My friend could have expressed himself more plainly by voting against the resolution if he thought it unauthorized. The resolution assumes precisely that we had the power and that we did thereby withhold our assent from the adoption of the twenty-second joint rule. I will read it again:

That the joint rules of the Senate and House of Representatives in force at the close of the last session of Congress, excepting the twenty-second joint rule, be, and the same are hereby, adopted as the joint rules of the two Houses at the present session.

Now I want to call attention to the remarks made by the colleague of the Senator from Delaware who has just taken his seat.

Mr. BAYARD. If my friend will allow me, he will find that my views do not change, and I will state, if he will permit me, my views now.

Mr. MORTON. I hope the Senator will wait until I get through. I shall finish in a few minutes, and he can have the floor.

Mr. BAYARD. I will say to the Senator that I have been waiting for an opportunity to state my views upon this subject.

Mr. MORTON. I will give the Senator the opportunity in a very few minutes. But the Senator from Delaware who has just taken his seat, expressed the law so very clearly at the last session in regard to this whole thing that I want to read what he said.

Mr. BAYARD. From what page?

Mr. MORTON. I read from page 517 of the RECORD of last session:

Mr. BAYARD. As I stated in reply to the Senator from New York, I had nothing in contemplation in the way of interference or amendment with any of the existing joint rules of the two Houses except the twenty-second joint rule. As the question has been raised, it is of great importance that it should be properly settled. Gentlemen have differed on this floor in regard to the power of each House over the joint rules. A very ingenious and able presentation of the subject was made by the Senator from Ohio who sits near me, [Mr. THURMAN,] claiming that the House of Representatives was a continuing body, and that there was needed no adoption at the incoming of each new Congress of either the separate or the joint rules governing the preceding House. Having heard him and considered his point, I entirely dissent from his view. I believe that the House of Representatives is not a continuing body, and that, indeed, it is not only separate but that each House has its operative legal existence and would be without any rules until it has adopted the parliamentary rules of the preceding House, as is usually done. The proposition has been made here that, this being a joint rule, made by two contracting parties, neither can at will retire from the rule. That is a very grave subject. Gentlemen on this floor have admitted such a view, and declared that it required a joint consent to the rescission of a rule as much as to its formation; but from that proposition I entirely dissent. I cannot believe that, either under the language of the Constitution or the very theory of checks and balances which the two Houses were designed to enforce one upon the other, the independence of either House can be taken from it, either by its own act or an act of the other House. Therefore I hold, as these rules are made, they are made during the good pleasure of each House, and that it is in the power of either the Senate or House of Representatives to retire from a joint rule at any time, and simply give notice of that fact to the other branch of Congress.

But still the question has been made, and I think it would be advisable to have it settled by conference of the two Houses through their respective Committees on Rules. I cannot doubt that on examination they will come to the conclusion to adopt the whole code, if I may so call it, except this twenty-second joint rule, which is highly exceptionable. Therefore I do not think there is any necessity to apprehend embarrassment in treating this subject, because I have referred the matter to the two Houses. These points having been raised, I think they should be disposed of gravely and properly. I know no reason why there should not be an entire assent between the two branches on the subject; but the questions having been raised, I think it is a good opportunity to have the subject considered.

I should vote now for the adoption of the joint rules of the two Houses, excepting the twenty-second joint rule, and I prefer to have the proposition made and considered in this formal and deliberate manner for the purpose of having the matter reviewed. It is a very grave subject. It has not been, so far as my researches enable me to discover, heretofore brought before the Senate in a manner that would admit of a clear decision, as it has been at the present time. There is no act of Congress on the subject. There is really nothing in the practice of the two Houses on the subject. I am not aware that any joint rule of the two Houses has ever been repealed. Such rules have been amended by the joint action of the two Houses but I submit that as yet I know of no case where either House has elected to retire from a joint rule; and yet I cannot doubt the power of either House to do so. Still I think it would be well, as we are treating of these joint rules, if we should invite the co-operation of the other House. If I am right in that, there will be no embarrassment, because the whole subject of the rules will be referred to the committee.

There can be no pretense that these joint rules continue from one Congress to another, except upon the theory that the House is a continuing body.

Mr. MERRIMON. Which it is.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator from Delaware who interrupted me a moment ago [Mr. SAULSBURY] in his speech to which he referred denied that the House was a continuing body.

Mr. SAULSBURY. No, sir; I beg the Senator's pardon; I said it had not a continuing organization; not that it was not a continuing body. It is a co-ordinate branch of this Government, which is in existence and has been in existence from the foundation of the Government.

Mr. MORTON. I will read the Senator's words:

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I do not concur in all that I have heard on this question. I differ from the views expressed by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.] I do not regard the House of Representatives as being at all times an organized body. While it is true that the House of Representatives is one of the departments of this Government, yet there are periods when there is no organization of the body, according to the view which I take, and the members of the House of Representatives in each Congress have the right to adopt their own rules, and the rules provided by the previous Congress are not obligatory upon them.

Mr. SAULSBURY. That is in reference to the House itself. The rules of the House of one Congress do not bind the House of another Congress; it has not a continuing organization; but the House itself as a House always exists.

Mr. MORTON. My friend, then, involves himself in this logical absurdity, if he will excuse the use of the word—I use it respectfully—that one House of Representatives cannot make rules which will bind the next House, but that it can unite with the Senate in making rules which will bind the next Congress.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes, sir; I say as a co-ordinate branch of this Congress we can enter into stipulations with another co-ordinate branch of this Government which are binding, being regarded as the concurrent action of both, until by the joint action of both they are repealed.

Mr. MORTON. My friend's assumption is that one House of Representatives can enter into a contract with the Senate and make a rule which will be binding on all the Houses that come thereafter, unless the Senate concludes to release the House from its obligation. I think I need only state that proposition, without arguing it one moment. My friend says that the House is not a continuously organized body. He concedes the whole case by that admission, for if it is not organized it is no House at all. He says it is not a continuously organized body, but nevertheless it is a continuous body; a body that is not organized; I do not understand; that will not do. The only proposition upon which this doctrine can be sustained—and it cannot be sustained logically upon that—would be that the House of Representatives is a continuous body, like the Senate; but even if it was a continuous body a joint rule is not a law; it has no resemblance to a statute; it is a mere method of joint proceeding which either House can retire from at pleasure. As stated by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] either House can withdraw from it at pleasure.

Mr. MERRIMON. No, sir, a solemn engagement between the two branches of a deliberative assembly as to those two bodies is just as binding as a statute.

Mr. MORTON. These two Houses have no right to make a bargain except in the form prescribed by the Constitution. They have no right to make a contract except in the form prescribed by the Constitution; and that is in the form of a statute. If they agree upon joint rules, at the pleasure of each they may withdraw from them at pleasure; but they can make nothing in the form of a law which is not sent to the President of the United States for his approval.

Mr. MERRIMON. But there is an implied power in the Constitution that sanctions these joint rules.

Mr. MORTON. I know of no such implied power, and I deny it utterly. I must say that I look upon this whole doctrine as dangerous. Until my friend from North Carolina made the remark that he did, I supposed that the entire purpose of now assuming that the joint rules are binding upon us is to maintain the twenty-second joint rule, a rule that has been condemned as being wicked or improper by every member of this body.

Mr. MERRIMON. I shall not be so uncharitable as to suspect that the wish on the other side is to get rid of it for a purpose.

Mr. MORTON. I have been always anxious to get rid of it. My friend knows that I have been fighting that joint rule since 1871. I have called the attention of the Senate to it "in season and out of season." I have always denounced it as being wicked, and I have denounced it as being unconstitutional.

Mr. MERRIMON. My friend will remember that I joined with him.

Mr. MORTON. I believe my friend did; but my friend has given the subject more attention since the last session of Congress than before, and I fear he has changed his mind.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana has saved me, in a great measure, the trouble of restating my views at this time upon this very important question by reading long passages from a debate which took place in January of the present year. While I trust my mind will always be open to the reception of new light and that I shall always be strong enough and candid enough to change my views when convinced of error, I can only say now that on this subject my views have undergone no change.

At the risk of a repetition of much that the Senator has read from the debate of 1876, I desire shortly to say this much: The very theory of our Government is founded on the necessity of the independence of the several powers of its co-ordinate branches. From the country from which our institutions are in the main drawn we have the theory that checks and balances of power are essential to liberty; not only that they tend to secure independence, but because they secure that deliberation and those pauses in action which are frequently essential for the purposes of justice; and all throughout the Constitution of the United States are to be found marks of the designation of separate powers in the different branches of the Government. In no case are these features more strongly apparent than in the distribution of powers between the two Houses of Congress, to whom, together with the President, is committed the entire legislative power of the Government.

I need not repeat to the Senate the frequent illustration of this truth which appears everywhere and all over the face of this written charter. Throughout the first article, in the definition and enumeration of powers, we find the phrase:

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.

Again:

Each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings. * * *

Neither House, during the session of Congress, shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other place than that in which the two Houses shall be sitting.

In this careful discrimination and delegation of power to each we find the sole exception in which the control of one House over the other is stated to be the want of power in either to adjourn for more than three days without the consent of the other. There you have the solitary and exceptional grant of power of one House over the other in its proceedings anywhere given by the Constitution. But there is other language than that directly applicable to the subject under discussion, and I know not how to find words of more apposite meaning to convey the idea intended:

Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member.

First, there is given to each House the sole judgment upon the composition of its body by controlling the question of the qualification, election, and returns of its own members. Sole and exclusive was the power given there. Then comes the power of each House to expel its own members, and to punish them for disorderly behavior, and coupled with that is the new power that they shall, not in common phrase, "make and alter," but shall determine the rules of its procedure. What is determine? What is terminus but the end, and what to determine a fact but to put an end to it? What is it that each House may determine? The rules of its own proceedings. Are not the rules in which we join with another as much rules as those which are rules for our sole guidance? Can it be that I, in partnership, am not responsible as I acting alone, and must it not be that my power and duty and responsibility for my acts shall continue and extend to those which I perform jointly with others, and to which I give my consent as to those over which I have my own sole consent to be obtained?

Really, Mr. President, it seems to me, with all due respect to the reasoning of others, that it would be the relinquishment of that which we have no power to relinquish. This Senate cannot put on and off its powers at will. Power means the duty to execute power. Responsibility runs ever with power, and this body may not divest itself and transfer to another a discretion and a power such as this. It is a common principle of law that a delegated discretionary power cannot be delegated. This is the execution of a high discretion, and how can we part with that and give it to another body, of all bodies on earth that over whom we were designed to act as a check. Parliamentary law and our rules prohibit even reference to the proceedings of one House in the other. This is my view. This was my view and I have been unable to find light or authority to change it. It was considered by us in connection with another subject. I would prefer where I pass upon a subject to settle the principle and stand by it and not have my judgment perturbed or darkened by my sense of interest in the result. It is my object to settle the principle upon which I stand, and I would rather not know the precise and immediate consequence or results to my individual interest when I have to pass upon a case any more than as a judge I would ask to know what was the personal result to me of a decision which I should give under my oath. Therefore it is that I think this grave question is one to be decided upon principle and upon reason. I tried so to decide before. I have seen nothing to change my view since. I may be permitted further to read from the following page of the RECORD a statement which I made about one year ago on this very subject. The honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] had stated that he did not believe that it was in the power of the Senate to retire during a session from a rule which it had adopted at that session, but seemed to consider that there was something running with the session that compelled him to observe a joint rule during that session's continuance.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will yield to me, I do not think he puts a correct construction on my remark. The idea that I had in my mind and I think—although I have not looked it up—he will see that somewhere I said so, was that retiring, or whatever the phrase was, was one thing and changing the rule and admitting it to exist was another, but as long as it existed of course we must stand by it. That was the idea I had in my mind. I do not know whether I was happy in expressing it or not.

Mr. BAYARD. I referred to the Senator from Vermont in order to explain the language I was about to read, that I made use of in reply to him last January.

My present disposition is, with deference of course to the Senator from Vermont, to differ from him in regard to the power of the House at any time to retire from a joint rule on giving notice.

As I understood, he implied that they could not retire at any time on giving notice after that rule had been adopted for the session.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator kindly tell me the page of the RECORD he is reading from?

Mr. BAYARD. Page 519, the debate of January 20, 1876:

Otherwise they would be tied up for the session irrevocably to a joint rule which, because it was a joint rule, had a binding effect which other rules could not have. The Senate cannot deprive itself of its power over its own rules; it cannot delegate any portion of this power to another branch of Congress; and it has no right to deprive itself of its power given to it for its own exercise in its sound discretion.

Therefore it is that I believe it is within the power of the Senate—I mean within the constitutional power of the Senate—to retire from any joint rule at will, under the forms prescribed by themselves for amendment and alteration of the law. I believe this idea is in furtherance of the necessary independence of each House of Congress from the other, in order to form a check on the action of the other, for this was designed to be a Government in which various checks should constantly interpose upon the power of each House. Each House was created with particular powers for the purpose of preserving those checks and balances in the Government. But I am anxious that the question shall be considered, and considered now by the respective Committees on Rules of the two Houses. I have no idea that there will be found any necessity for amending any of the rules but the twenty-second joint rule, and that, I believe, had better be tried, because it is leaving that subject under the machinery of a rule which ought to be dealt with only under the machinery of a law regularly enacted.

If it be the object of the Senate to repeal the twenty-second joint rule and to leave the naked language of the Constitution, insufficient and meager as it has been found to be, to stand in doubt and obscurity until the next count of the presidential votes, then I shall say they will fall very far short of their duty in my opinion.

What I say now, Mr. President, is only meant to bear upon the question and upon the true principle which underlies the adoption and abrogation of joint rules. I do not speak upon the present condition of the joint rules, for, after all, the convenience and orderly progress of the business of these two great bodies would show by the light of experience that we should conduct them under rules, under regulations such as these, and most of which have existed from the very earliest history of our Government. The usage of the Senate on this subject is full of instruction. Many of the joint rules have remained untouched by amendments, have been admitted and in force in practice since 1794, when, I believe, most of them were adopted, and some from the very first year, 1789, and so they stand. A reference to the manual prepared by our Chief Clerk will disclose the fact, for the date of the adoption of these rules will be found at the foot of each, so that they are rules of great antiquity in our system.

But, Mr. President, it seems to me and I may submit here, what are rules, what are laws worth unless the spirit of the rules and of the laws shall lie back of them? Take, for instance, this question of joint rules. Grant, if you please, some obligation in the shape of constitutional law that makes it under the idea of the honorable Senator from North Carolina, impossible for either House to retire from a joint rule, and that it stands there never to be changed except by joint consent, binding them and their successors forever unless there shall be an agreement arrived at between the two Houses to change it; suppose there is a refusal by one House or the other to abide by it, what is your remedy of enforcement? This is a law-making body, not a law-executing body. And the joint rules never had the forms of law, nor received the sanction of the Executive. As mere rules they did not need it—and the independence of the two Houses would have made executive assent unnecessary and improper. When we make laws other departments of the Government execute them. If this be a law, where is the power to execute it? If it is to have the irrevocability and the permanence of law, where is the power to execute it? I think it would puzzle any honorable Senator to apply to the judicial branch for a remedy for a refusal of either House to concur with the other, either upon the question of obedience to a rule or upon differences as to its construction. The result would be that the comity of business between the two Houses would be interrupted, and nothing but the will of either and the will of both could restore it. Such is the practical effect.

It seems, therefore, that living under a government of laws, as I sincerely hope, and as is so necessary for us to exist, the test is a just one in regard to any exercise of power and the shape that that exercise takes, whether it be a law and binds us, to ask, can it be executed; and under what authority? It seems to me that there is none here, that necessarily there should be none, because not only there is no form of law, it is the expression of a mere will. Like any contract between individuals that has no term agreed upon for its execution, it may be retired from at the will of either party. A contract with no term for its continuance or its performance is a contract severable or rescissible at will. Even putting it in that shape, I cannot agree with the Senator from North Carolina as to the action of these two bodies over a subject which rests only in their several discretion and which, at their will, they may, in the language of the Constitution, "determine," and I cannot suppose that we are to apply even a principle of this kind, but we must look to the grant of power, to the nature of the power, and the necessary application of our principles to it. Therefore it is that I am, for one, compelled to stand by the conclusion that I reached before, that the joint rules of the House and the Senate are as much within their separate control as any other rules of the House or the Senate, and that they may be determined and must be determined by each in the exercise of their just discretion. I cannot see otherwise how that independence, which is essential to the preservation of the powers delegated to each House under our written Constitution of government, can possibly be maintained. If the matter were within law and had taken the form of law, we then should be transferred to an entirely different domain; a different jurisdiction would take cognizance of the question. But no one professes as yet, that I have heard, that the rules of the Senate are laws of the land, whether joint or separate; and for this reason, and without referring to the condition of the other joint rules—I am not precisely aware what was the action of the Senate on that subject—I do not hold the twenty-second joint rule to be in force. On the question of power over the subject, I am unable to reach any other conclusion than I have stated.

Mr. MORTON. Does the Senator know the action of the House on that question?

Mr. BAYARD. I did not read it.

Mr. MORTON. I have the House Journal here, and on the page where the joint rules appear I find the following entry:

The following resolutions will explain the omission herein of the joint rules of the two Houses, as heretofore.

Then follows the resolution of the 22d of January, 1876, which has just been read, and then follows the resolution of the 16th of August, which has also been read. It seems that in view of the action of the Senate the House has treated the joint rules as all dead, and has not published them in the Journal of last session.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I wish, in the first place, to defend myself from the implication suggested by the Senator from North Carolina, and possibly by the Senator from Delaware, that I have at any time either admitted or maintained that what are called the joint rules of the two Houses are not at all times, like their separate rules, within the control of each House as far as its own action is concerned. The Senator from North Carolina read from something that I said, I do not know when, but two or three or more years ago, when a question under the twenty-first joint rule was up. But that was so perfectly answered by the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana, that I need not take any time about it at all. The simple point of what I said, whether I was happy in the language, as my friend from North Carolina would have been in expressing it, was that as long as the rule was in force, of course we were bound to obey it, as we are our own rules. Every time that we dispense with our own rules by unanimous consent, we violate the provision of those rules which declares that no rule shall be suspended without a day's notice, and so on, unless there be a qualification, which is conventional if it be one, that by unanimous consent they can be suspended at any time. If so, that makes the law for the time being; but we can change the law if we like. So much for that.

Now I come to the debate of the last session, to which my friend from Delaware has referred. What I said, and to which he replied, upon that subject, was this:

That being the state of the case—

After stating how the question stood, I said:

That being the state of the case, we have not, as my friend and I both agree, any joint rules. We all agree, as the practice has been, that joint rules may be adopted by acquiescence, by acting under them without objection. Some of them provide for intercourse between the two Houses, and it may be that acting under one would not imply an adoption of another. I do not really think it would; but in drifting along in this way we are liable to be met by and by in one House or the other with the suggestion, "You have already got your joint rules for this session, however clear the law may have been that you had not any when you began your session, and it is now too late to make objection; and therefore you cannot change the twenty-second joint rule without the consent of both parties." I do not agree with my friend from Delaware that in a particular session, when the joint rules have been adopted by the concurrence of the two Houses, either may retire at its own will by simply giving notice to the other party. I do not think that is the law. I cannot see any foundation for such a proposition as that. We might as well say that any member of this body can retire from the observance of rules as soon as it displeases him.

And yet everybody can see that neither I nor anyone else would have contended that it was not the right of any member of this body, if the law made him a quorum, or with others who thought as he did, to make a change of the rule that he could not retire from or disobey, and make an entirely different one, or abolish it altogether.

Of course two governments treating with each other may retire from a treaty; but, unless the treaty provides for retiring from it, they retire from it by breaking it. Of course if either House, as a mere matter of power—

Here I speak of constitutional power—

without regard to right—

And there I speak of moral right—

(which must be supposed to govern both Houses,) should say "We will disobey a joint rule which declares that messages from the House of Representatives shall be received through their Clerk, and that messages for the Senate shall be received there by our Secretary," the remedy might be difficult to find.

Just as the Senator from Delaware has now said that, if you had a contract or compact between two equals that had no definite limitation of time during which it was to run, either might retire from it, to use his expression, but I should say terminate it instead of retire from it, and that was what led me to make these remarks last year.

It was rather upon the true use of a particular word which implied to the Senator's mind one thing and to mine another. If the Senator had said that it was competent for either House to terminate any joint rules, as they are called, between the two bodies, I should certainly have agreed.

Mr. BAYARD. There the Senator would use the word "determine" as a synonym for "terminate."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not say "determine," but "terminate."

Mr. BAYARD. The Constitution says "determine," and I apprehend they are synonyms.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So it may be, but I do not wish to waste the time of the Senate in discussing my own individual views hitherto, although, if I correctly understood them at that time and correctly understand them now and correctly understand the exact force of the language I used, I do not occupy any attitude in the slightest degree inconsistent with that which I have occupied before.

The Senator from North Carolina says that he, as another eminent person did on a former occasion, has seen a great light, and as he was coming to Washington, instead of going to Damascus, he suddenly has changed his views. Well, in the first case there was certainly very good reason for it, and to the Senator I have no doubt there is very good reason for this, although he has not referred to any particular authority or to any fresh research that he had not examined before, when, as a responsible member of a responsible committee of this body, there was committed to him the trust of making a careful examination of this question, which he told us, on the occasion when he with the other members of the committee made their report, he had made, and in which he said this as a member of the committee, and upon which I placed great reliance:

Mr. MERRIMON. * * * When the matter was brought to the attention of the Committee on Rules we could not see how any rule, whether joint or otherwise, of one Congress could be binding on a subsequent Congress, for the Congress as a Congress lasts but two years. As a legal proposition, if a joint rule is not binding upon the House, how could it be binding upon the Senate?

Mr. MORTON. From whom is the Senator reading?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am reading from the remarks of Senator MERRIMON, of North Carolina, a member of the Committee on Rules of this body, who reported upon this question of the joint rules, whether in force or not, and who as a member of that committee had made, as it appears from his reference to precedents and the want of precedents and the principles of constitutional and parliamentary law, a most exhaustive and candid examination, such as he always does when he brings a fresh mind to the consideration of a fresh subject. What intellectual pressure has reversed the Senator's opinion I am unable to perceive, because he has not produced the evidence of the source of this great light that has shone upon him from somewhere in this respect. Then he goes on to say:

We thought one House of Representatives could not by its own mere construction imply an engagement on the part of a subsequent Congress. The committee went on the ground that if a joint rule was not binding on a subsequent House it could not be binding upon the Senate in connection with a subsequent House, for an engagement with one Congress is no engagement with another Congress. It seems, as the venerable Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] stated on a former occasion, that this matter has passed uniformly from the beginning of the Government down to this time without question. The question is now raised, and if to-day some action of Congress should be required under the joint rules, and a Senator should rise and say "I object,"—

I am sure he could not have referred to me, because I rarely do a thing of that kind, [laughter,]—

there would be the end of it. It is only by common consent that the practice to which I have referred has prevailed.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the date of those observations?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The date of those observations is the 17th of January, in the year of our Lord 1876, the centennial year of the Republic, as this present moment is also.

Mr. MERRIMON. Now I trust the Senator will allow me to make a statement here. I know that he will be courteous enough to let me state the ground I occupied. Those remarks went upon the ground that each succeeding Congress, so called, was different from that which preceded it. I have said here to-day that after the arguments made by the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from New York pending that debate I modified my opinion. Since that time I have reflected much on the subject, and now I am as sure as I ever was about any conclusion in the world that the House is as much a perpetual body as the Senate and that it lives without intermission; and if that proposition is true, then the theory upon which those remarks went, and upon which the committee went, falls to the ground.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is very extraordinary, Mr. President, that if after as a member of a responsible committee of this body the honorable Senator from North Carolina had stated ex cathedra those opinions and following that and in the same debate those opinions had changed from observations of other Senators he should have omitted to state the fact, because he could not have failed to know that others of us, less familiar with the principles of parliamentary and constitutional law than he is, would have relied entirely upon his first observations and so should have been entrapped into a false position. I can scarcely impute to the Senator such an idea as that.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator at this point yield to me to read a short extract from the proceedings of the House?

Mr. EDMUNDS. With pleasure.

Mr. MORTON. I read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 6, 1875, page 174 of the bound volume:

Mr. RANDALL. I submit the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the rules of the House of Representatives of the Forty-third Congress shall be the rules of the House of Representatives until otherwise ordered, except Rule 166 and Rule 167.

"Resolved further, That a committee of five, to consist of the Speaker and four members, to be named by him, be appointed, to whom shall be referred the rules of the House, who shall report all such amendments or revisions of the same as they shall think proper, and such reports shall always be in order to be made."

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a point of order. I object to the resolution under the existing rules, which are our rules without a declaration of this sort.

Mr. RANDALL. I submit that both these resolutions are strictly in order. I propose that we adopt the rules of the last House, with the exceptions stated. As to the second resolution, I will say there is no rule providing for the appointment of a Committee on Rules. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is therefore mistaken on this point.

Mr. GARFIELD. That particular point is not what I object to. I object to the first branch of the gentleman's resolutions, on the ground of immemorial usage.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman has a perfect right to object by voting against the resolutions, but in no other manner.

Mr. GARFIELD. I submit that this is not a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make that point of order?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules it, on the ground that the Constitution clearly gives to each House the right to adopt its own rules. Whatever may have been the rules of orders of a preceding House in reference to this matter, they cannot supersede the constitutional right of this House to adopt its own rules.

Mr. RANDALL. The Speaker is clearly right.

Mr. GARFIELD. I submit that these resolutions should be referred to the Committee on Rules when appointed.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no rule of this House, and there was no rule of the last House, by which a Committee on Rules can be appointed. It is only by a resolution of this character that the Speaker can be authorized to appoint a Committee on Rules.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will find that immemorial usage is in itself a rule.

Mr. RANDALL. Immemorial usage will do for that side of the House, but we mean to have strict construction of the rules. [Laughter.] For the information of the House, let the rules excepted be read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was intending to have referred to that in a little different connection.

Mr. MORTON. I did not know the Senator had it there.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But I am very glad the Senator has read it, because it is very high authority, from a very eminent man, with whom, although I disagreed with him upon subjects of general politics, I long had a most pleasant personal intimacy, acquaintance, and friendship, and who has departed from his career of honor and usefulness with the sorrow and regret of his family and friends and the sympathy of all who knew him, pre-eminent in that great party of which he was a leading character, not only for the zeal of a politician but for the high honor of a patriotic citizen and the large views of a statesman; and when he, speaking to one of his own confrères, now, if I do not violate the rules in saying it, the presiding officer of the other House, reminds him and reminds the objector that, under the Constitution and the essential principles of the absolute independence of each House within its constitutional sphere, nothing that a preceding body of men, although constituting in the constitutional sense a continuous government, can do shall bind their successors, I commend to my friend from North Carolina a fresh reconsideration of this subject, and it is just possible that after the present emergency—if I may follow a newspaper phrase—has, like all preceding emergencies, calmly passed away under the law, he may again come to his first love and believe that each House is at all times absolutely independent of the other, and that neither can by the Constitution or would knowingly undertake to make an engagement, if you call it that, with the other that it could not at all times rightfully in the constitutional sense and in the legal sense recede from.

Mr. President, I do not wish to delay the Senate about this thing, as it has been discussed over and over again and the Senate has twice, and with apparent unanimity, and on the last time as I happen to remember personally with an absolute unanimity, not upon the yeas and nays, determined that these joint rules, as they are called, are not in force; but still I wish under the special circumstances of this case to state in a very brief way how it appears to me this question stands.

In the first place, as high an authority as Mr. Jefferson, in the preface of his Manual, which has stood with the rules of the Senate of the United States almost from the foundation of the Government, says that independent of conventional arrangements there exists, drawn from the country from which we take the larger share of our methods and institutions, a system of parliamentary law; and he says—I have it before me; it will be found on pages 207 and 208 of the Senate Manual—that there is a means, notwithstanding what the Senator from Virginia who has so ably succeeded to the place of Mr. Jefferson—I do not mean as a Senator, but as the pre-eminent representative of that great State—whereby Senates and Houses of Representatives may get on together in peace and amity and good order without the necessity of violating or even enacting anything for their own government, and that this common law of Parliament, as it is called, where the specific ordinances of each House do not apply, is the rule which governs the two bodies. I take it I need not go into an argument to show (because it has been the daily practice of both bodies of Congress for nearly a hundred years) that the parliamentary law is binding.

Now, then, when these first joint rules, as they are called, were adopted, let us see what the state of the law was. If my honorable friend from North Carolina will turn to the work of Mr. May, an Englishman, on the laws of Parliament, he will find that the standing orders of the Lords and of the Commons existed, as he has read out of Cushing, from session to session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont will pause a moment to enable the Chair to receive a message from the House of Representatives.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House has passed a bill (H. R. No. 4120) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions for the year ending June 30, 1878; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 1057) to provide for engraving and printing the portrait of the late Hon. Henry H. Starkweather, of Connecticut.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 1592) to re-imburse Horace Glover for property unlawfully seized and sold by the United States Government; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I am almost surprised that the honorable Senator from Virginia and the honorable Senator from North Carolina should not at this moment, when I was interrupted by a message from the House of Representatives, have arisen in their places and protested against this violation of the joint rules of the two bodies.

Mr. MERRIMON. Either of us might have done it very pertinently.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly, and if the Senator is sworn to the constitutional performance of his duty and sees the other House here day by day this session violating the joint rule which says they shall do nothing of the kind that they are daily doing and sending to us, certainly it is his duty to see to it that the implied constitutional privilege, as he expresses it, of the Senate—because he gets this power for joint rules out of an implication, which like a water-color painting is swashed all over the Constitution, and cannot be found in any particular place—is not so violated. The House of Representatives itself—and I violate no rule in saying that, because I refer to its action that it communicates to us, not to the motives that lead to it nor the debate that leads to it; but the action that is communicated to us is our property for discussion—day by day since this session began, the House of Representatives, restrained by this twenty-first joint rule as I call it, without stopping to say "so called," has, in the teeth of it, acted upon bills just like that to which the honorable Senator now objects and makes a point of order upon. Why? Not by a proposed suspension of it sent to us for our concurrence, but because, having received from us on the 14th of August the solemn and unanimous resolution of this body that we declined to entertain the proposition that the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules be suspended, because there were no joint rules in force, it proceeds to do what otherwise upon the theory of the honorable Senator it would have no right to do; and it proceeded after that resolution was sent back by us in August last to send bills to this body and to send them to the President of the United States; because, according to the authoritative and unanimously-acquiesced-in statement of Mr. Speaker Kerr, it was impossible that any preceding House of Representatives could make a law of any character which should bind the fresh men, coming fresh from the people, under the Constitution to do one thing or another in respect to their constitutional right to regulate their own proceedings. We have therefore what comes broadly toward a great farce of this Senate spending this day in debating whether these joint rules, as they are called, exist or can be changed, or retired from as the Senator from Delaware calls it, terminated as I express it, without the consent of both Houses, when day by day ever since the question was raised both Houses have continued to do the very things that these joint rules say shall not be done. I do not know—for the future is always uncertain—but that some motive or some inducement, patriotic of course, may lead that great body to stultify itself, as we are endeavoring apparently to stultify ourselves and to say "Good Lord and good devil; for all the purposes of legislation the joint rules are not in force; they are gone, buried in the catacombs of yore; but for all purposes of political advantage, when it is convenient, we will say they are in force." But I venture to believe that that great constitutional body will respect itself as it expects right-minded people in this country to respect it.

Now then I will come back to what I was speaking of when I was interrupted by this supposed unconstitutional message from the House of Representatives. If the Senator from North Carolina will take the trouble to look into the history of English parliamentary law, he will see this thing set down in the plainest possible phrase, that the standing orders of the Lords and the Commons, from the beginning of Parliament down to this day, although they do bind both bodies as long as they are in force, bind each one of them separately just as their separate orders and rules do, and in no otherwise, and that not a single standing order of either House was ever put into the form of a compact, or agreement, or partnership, or anything of the kind, although they did regulate from day to day the intercourse and procedure that the operations of the two Houses required should be done in some way by concurrent action. Then, if the distinguished Senator from North Carolina will only look into the Journals of the Senate and House of Representatives when these joint rules from time to time were adopted, he will see that, following the settled and well-known practice of the Lords and Commons, these joint rules themselves, as we call them, are, every one of them, simply standing orders that each House has agreed upon in the same language; and when he looks at the Journal he will see that the resolutions adopting them, certainly the earlier ones—I have not looked them all through, but I have examined two or three—in 1789 and 1790 are the simple separate resolutions of each body agreeing to the same thing. That may make some difference with the Senator's further reflections if he will look it up, for we are convinced by what the Senator has said that he is always ready to correct himself if he finds on reflection that he is wrong. But when you look at these as they are printed Mr. President, you will find that "joint rules," as they are called, is merely the heading at the top by the man who compiled the book, and when you take up the first one and examine into it you will find that it was adopted by itself on the 6th of April, 1789, as will be seen by referring to the Journal of that day of the Senate of the United States, but I cannot find in a hasty examination that the House ever adopted it at all, except by prescription or usage. It was adopted as a Senate resolution. As to a reasonably long string of those adopted afterward, a dozen or more altogether, you will find that although they were called in the resolution joint rules they were not adopted by a concurrent resolution that was sent from one House to the other for assent, but each House adopted it on its own hook and informed the other that it had adopted such and such a thing. What is the consequence? The consequence is just as it is with the standing orders of the two Houses of Parliament where they have identical laws, which govern themselves separately and independently upon subjects of common and concurrent concern. If that be so, as it certainly is by the record, as it plainly ought to be upon constitutional principles either under the British or the American Constitution, then it necessarily follows, I submit to my honorable friend from North Carolina, that each House may change its own order of procedure, whether it affects its method of communicating with the other House or doing anything else with the other House, at its own will and pleasure. And so the makers of the Constitution, familiar as they were with this notion of the standing orders of parliamentary procedure in the two houses of the British Parliament, said all that was necessary to be said when they stated in the Constitution that each House—not both Houses—should determine the rules of its procedure, not a part of the rules of its procedure, not upon one subject, but upon every subject that it had any constitutional power to deal with, and so having said it had given authority enough, preserving what the Constitution necessarily intended to preserve, the absolute independence of each House, that being so independent it should determine every method of its procedure for itself, whether that procedure embraced one topic or another topic, whether something that required the action of the two Houses as every law does and as every bill does or whether something that concerned the mere expulsion or discipline of a member of either body that affected only itself.

Mr. President, this is so clear, I submit to my honorable friend from North Carolina, if he will only read the history of it and consider the principle, that I should hope, as I indeed expect when we come to take the yeas and nays upon this question, that we shall find for once that this body is, as it has been on two previous occasions on the same topic, almost unanimous.

There is nothing in any one of these so-called rules but the simple independent action of each House in respect of guiding its own conduct. The Constitution of the United States, as well as the British constitution, does not give and did not intend to give—for otherwise it would overthrow every principle upon which liberty and security in legislative action is concerned—any power to either House to coerce or control the other in any particular whatever. There must be absolute independence, and so being independent the things that they are required to do in concurrence, as everything that makes law is in their mutual relations, are still done with the absolute independence that is reposed in each, and they go by one method or another method that they may agree upon just as long as it is agreeable to each to do it and no longer.

But, Mr. President, I do not wish to waste the time of the Senate about this question. If my honorable friend will only reconsider once more, I feel, knowing him so well as I do, that the candor of his mind and the clearness of his intellect will lead him, when he makes further research, to these conclusions. But as this Senate has settled it twice upon the clearest grounds, and as the House of Representatives has, ever since the Senate has informed it that it had so settled it, disregarded every one of these rules that bore upon action it has taken, such as the sixteenth and the seventeenth and the twenty-first, I do not see, as I have said, what it is that we are discussing except a mere abstract proposition that not only this body but the other body has long put at rest. I believe the yeas and nays have been asked for.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. MERRIMON. I shall detain the Senate but a minute in vindication of the argument I submitted a short time ago and in answer to the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

It is ordinarily understood to argue weakness to resort to things that do not bear directly on the merits of any issue in order to control it. The opinion that I expressed before has very little to do with the argument to-day. I based my opinion then upon a particular ground that was stated. I adverted to the fact that I had done so, in the opening of my remarks to-day. I stated as expressly and as clearly as I could the ground upon which that opinion was changed. What, therefore, has the fact that I expressed a certain opinion on that day to do with the argument to-day? What am I in the argument or what is the Senator from Vermont? It is a question of truth; it is a question of principle; it is a question of argument; and men are out of the case entirely.

Now, sir, I wish the Senator had had the candor to state with more distinctness and care the position I did really occupy. I did not deny the provision of the Constitution that each House may determine the rules of its proceedings. On the contrary, I admitted it. I said that the Senate, touching all matters wherein it was independent of the House, had the power under this provision of the Constitution to make its own rules. I said that the House, touching matters that pertained to it exclusively, had the power to make its own rules. But I said that neither the Senate nor the House was absolutely independent of the other. By the very terms, as well as by the very force and spirit of the Constitution, in one respect these two bodies are one, and there are certain relations which exist between them that neither can put off. Among other things, there is constant intercommunication that must be regulated by some order, and, because the Constitution has not expressed in terms the power conferred to so regulate it, I said that necessarily the power was implied in the Constitution to do it, just like any other power that existed by necessary implication in the Constitution; that in the exercise of this implied power, which is only limited by the general parliamentary law, the Senate and the House of Representatives had entered into an engagement and contract by which their intercourse was to be governed. It was done in the beginning of the Government and it has been kept up from that day to this. We are told now for the first time in the history of the Government that either branch of Congress can at will abandon these joint rules, this solemn engagement to which the faith and honor of each House are pledged. That is the whole of it.

If the doctrines contended for on the other side are true, it does seem to me that the joint rules are mockeries; they are absolutely nothing; the Senate can recede from them at will on any occasion. So the argument the Senator from Vermont has made, the argument the Senator from Delaware has made, does not affect, in the slightest degree, the ground that I occupy, to wit: that there was an implied power because of the necessity of regulating the manner of intercommunication between the two Houses; and as there was no limitation by the Constitution on the exercise of that power, it was governed by general parliamentary law; and according to the general parliamentary law these joint rules bind not only the Congress which adopts them but every subsequent Congress until they shall be modified or abolished. That is the argument I made. I do not deny that each House has absolute control of all matters that pertain to it exclusively and wherein it is independent of the other House. But each House is not absolutely independent of the other House. There are certain respects in which each is affected by the other, and each sustains relations to the other, and these relations and this matter of intercommunication must be regulated by some order, some order agreed upon between the two Houses, or else we have confusion and anarchy, as it would seem we should have if we did not act even under these joint rules, though it is said we have no joint rules. It is said we have no joint rules, and yet every day during the session we have been acting practically under the joint rules, as has also the House of Representatives The Senator says that the joint rules are not observed. I might say that the rules of the Senate are not observed; the rules of the House are not observed. That goes unnoticed. Nobody notices it. But, if the point were raised, the presiding officer of either House would be bound to decide that the point of order should be sustained, if the rules are regarded as in force at all. That argues nothing. It argues no more than the suggestion that this point of order is made and this effort is made to see whether we have any joint rules, for political purposes. I have no political purpose. It argues weakness, it argues nothing to make such imputations. I might do it with as much force and propriety on my side as it is done on the other side, but I will not do it, because it has no fair, just bearing upon the issue between us.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will restate the question. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] moved the present consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 10, submitted by him during the last session. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] raised the point of order that under joint rule No. 21, as denominated by him, no bill or resolution of the last session can be taken up within six days from the commencement of this session. The Chair overruled the point of order, stating that the joint rules are not in force, and that Senate rule No. 52 governs the question. From this ruling the Senator from North Carolina has taken an appeal to the Senate. The question now is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate? on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY;] who I believe would vote "nay" if present. I should vote "yea."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 50, nays 4; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Blaine, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Chaffee, Christiancy, Clayton, Cockrell, Conkling, Conover, Cooper, Cragin, Dawes, Dennis, Dorsey, Eaton, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Kernan, Logan, McCreery, McDonald, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill, Morton, Paddock, Patterson, Price, Randolph, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, Teller, Wadleigh, Wallace, West, Windom, and Wright—50.

NAYS—Messrs. Maxey, Merrimon, Whyte, and Withers—4.

ABSENT—Messrs. Barnum, Bogy, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Davis, Ferry, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamlin, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Key, Norwood, Oglesby, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sharon, Stevenson, and Thurman—21.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont to take up the joint resolution for consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I submitted the other day, and which is printed, an amendment that I gave notice I would offer, to make this provision, if it shall be adopted by the 1st of February, applicable to the last election. I perceive that in printing one or two of the words that I think were in my original draught have been omitted. I wish for the information of the Senate to supply those now, so that Senators in looking at this amendment may read it as it was really intended to be. In the fifth line of the printed amendment, at the end of the resolution, after the word "the," where it first occurs, there should be the word "ascertaining."

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to inquire of the Senator if he desires to go on with the debate on this to-night.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir, I do not; but I wish, in order that Senators may know exactly what I propose, to have the amendment that I offer made according to the way I submitted it.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to move that when we adjourn to-night it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I intended to move an executive session, and then we can consider what we shall do.

Mr. SARGENT. The motion I have indicated might be submitted now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator will pardon me a single moment; there is another word I wish to add. After the word "result," in the fifth line of the amendment I proposed to the joint resolution, there should be inserted the words "of the last election;" so that the proposed amendment will read:

This article shall, if it be ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States on or before the 1st day of February, A. D. 1877, operate upon the opening and counting of the votes and the ascertaining and declaring the result of the last election by the Supreme Court.

Mr. ANTHONY. I suggest to the Senator from Vermont, as this is a very important resolution, that it had better be printed as amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask that it be reprinted as corrected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chairs hears no objection to that suggestion. It will be printed as amended.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. SARGENT. With the consent of the Senator from Vermont, I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before the doors are actually closed, if there be no objection, the Chair will dispose of some business on his table.

Several SENATORS. No objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of State, transmitting, in obedience to law, a statement of fees collected, accounted for, and reported by the diplomatic officers of the United States for the year 1875; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 2825) to correct errors and supply omissions in the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws.

The bill (H. R. No. 4120) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions for the year ending June 30, 1878, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

COURTS IN ARKANSAS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 155) to amend sections 533, 556, 571, and 572 of the Revised Statutes relating to courts in Arkansas and other States.

The amendments were on page 2, line 6, to strike out the words "the eastern district of Arkansas, at Helena," and to add to the section, "and in the eastern district of Arkansas, the terms of the circuit court shall be held at Helena at the same time as the terms of the district court."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the amendments be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CLAYTON. I ask the Senate to concur in the amendments. The Senate bill provides that the district court held at Helena shall have circuit-court powers. This amendment requires the circuit court to be held there. That is all the difference.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not doubt it, but at the same time in respect to these judicial matters I do think it is better that the committee should look at them exactly, for we have sometimes discovered that we were all mistaken.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I can tell the Senator that we shall report it promptly.

The motion to refer was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at three o'clock and fifty-two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, December 8, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

NAVY WAITING-ORDERS PAY.

Mr. WHITTHORNE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4125) to appropriate "waiting-orders pay" to those officers of the United States Navy whose pay was affected by the general order of the Secretary of the Navy No. 216, and to repeal section 1442 of the Revised Statutes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

S. D. PLEMMONS.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4126) for the relief of S. D. Plemmons, of North Carolina; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

CHARLES S. KELLER.

Mr. STEVENSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4127) for the relief of Charles S. Keller; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

BLACK HILLS TERRITORY.

Mr. PIPER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4128) to establish the Territory of the Black Hills and to provide a temporary government therefor; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Territories, and ordered to be printed.

DESERT WEST OF FORT YUMA.

Mr. PIPER also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4129) to encourage the introduction of a supply of fresh water on the desert west of Fort Yuma; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

MONTHLY AGRICULTURAL REPORT.

Mr. CUTLER, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 167) for continuing the publication of the monthly reports of the Commissioner of Agriculture, and making an appropriation for the publication of the same; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SURETIES OF B. B. EMERY.

Mr. HOOKER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4130) for the relief of J. M. Stone, William M. Compton, and W. C. McAlexander, sureties on the bond of B. B. Emery, deceased, late collector of internal revenue, third district of Mississippi; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

TERRENCE J. KENNEDY.

Mr. MACDOUGALL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4131) for the relief of Terrence J. Kennedy, late lieutenant-colonel Third New York Volunteer Artillery; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

J. N. RIGGS.

Mr. MACDOUGALL also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4132) for the relief of J. N. Riggs, late major Third New York Volunteer Artillery; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES P. CARROLL.

Mr. DURHAM, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4133) for the relief of James P. Carroll; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 168) proposing an amendment to the Constitution, forbidding the assumption or payment of any claim for loss or damage growing out of the taking, use, or destruction of property during the late war of the rebellion; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour will now begin at fifteen minutes past twelve o'clock. This being Friday, the first business during the morning hour is the call of committees for reports of a private nature.

CHARLES HOWE.

Mr. GUNTER, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4134) to confirm the title of the legal representatives of Charles Howe to certain lands in Florida; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JEAN FRANCOIS PERRY.

Mr. GUNTER also, from the same committee, reported as a substitute for House bill No. 2518, a bill (H. R. No. 4135) for the relief of the heirs of Jean Francois Perry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The call of committees for reports of a private character having been concluded, the Chair will now call the States and Territories for resolutions, commencing with the State of Maine.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is not this private bill day?

The SPEAKER. It is private bill day, and the call of committees for the presentation and disposition of private bills has been concluded. Under Rule 52, which the Clerk will read, the Chair holds that the next business in order is the call of States for resolutions

Mr. GARFIELD. Private or public resolutions?

The SPEAKER. The rule does not define.

The Clerk read as follows:

Reports from committees having been presented and disposed of, the Speaker shall call for resolutions from the members of each State and Delegate from each Territory, beginning with Maine and the Territory last organized, alternately; and they shall not be debated on the very day of their being presented, nor on any day assigned by the House for the receipt of resolutions, unless where the House shall direct otherwise, but shall lie on the table, to be taken up in the order in which they were presented; and if on any day the whole of the States and Territories shall not be called, the Speaker shall begin on the next day where he left off the previous day; Provided, That no member shall offer more than one resolution, or one series of resolutions, all relating to the same subject, until all the States and Territories shall have been called.

Mr. GARFIELD. I simply asked for information. My understanding was that this day being set apart for private bills, the whole of the day must be given to the consideration of private bills, if that was demanded by any member.

The SPEAKER. All the rules relating to the consideration of private bills have been complied with.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Chair may be right.

Mr. HOSKINS. I desire to call the attention of the Speaker to Rule 128 in connection with this matter.

The SPEAKER. That rule does not conflict with the ruling of the Chair. It is as follows:

Friday in every week shall be set apart for the consideration of private bills and private business in preference to any other.

The SPEAKER then proceeded to call the roll of States and Territories for resolutions; and having reached the State of Louisiana without any response being made,

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Has the State of New York been called?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Do I understand that under this call simple House resolutions can be introduced and put upon their passage?

The SPEAKER. They can.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I did not hear when the State of New York was called. I desire to offer a resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to call the attention of the Chair, in connection with the answer he has just made to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] to the fact that the rule requires that the resolutions submitted under this call shall lie upon the table for one day.

The SPEAKER. The rule requires that all resolutions offered under this call shall not be debated upon the very day of their being presented, which would seem to imply——

Mr. HOAR. The Chair does not read quite far enough. I understand that under this rule all resolutions offered lie upon the table without debate until the entire call has been gone through with, and then they may be taken up for debate in the order in which they have been presented, but they cannot be debated on the day on which they were presented.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would rule that all resolutions introduced under this call, except by unanimous consent, must lie over one day for both debate and action.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it not the correct interpretation of that rule that if the previous question is not seconded, thereby leaving the resolution open to debate, it must lie over one day? If the previous question is seconded, then the resolution is before the House for immediate action.

The SPEAKER. As to the question of consideration, that is for the House to determine.

Mr. HOLMAN. If a resolution is offered and the previous question called upon it and not sustained, then it is open to debate; and, inasmuch as it is not debatable on the day it is offered, then it must go over one day on the objection of a single member rising and proposing to debate it.

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman from Indiana will pardon me for calling his attention to this point: he is now speaking of resolutions which come in during the morning hour of Monday on the second call of States, and which are governed by their own rule. This is a rule which applies to every day of the week, and it is now being applied to Friday. It is a rule applying to the order of business after all the reports of a private nature from committees have been presented and disposed of.

Mr. HOLMAN. To what rule does the gentleman refer?

Mr. HOAR. To Rule 52; that is the one the Speaker is now applying. Allow me to say that if the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] desires to introduce any business now, I for one would probably have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the portion of the rule which says that under this call resolutions may be introduced, but "shall not be debated on the very day of their being presented," looks to the debate of resolutions presented under the call provided for by this rule. Therefore the Chair under this call would not entertain a motion for the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. That would necessarily cut off debate and therefore defeat the intention of the rule.

Mr. HOAR. This is probably the first time within the parliamentary recollection of the Speaker that the House has been so far without business that this rule has been applied.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not recollect any occasion during his term of service when this rule has before been called into operation.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. This rule presents an opportunity that hundreds of members have looked for and never found. Since I have been a member of this House, this call has never been made; it has generally been skipped over. But it is clearly provided for in Rule 52. The States are now called for resolutions in just the same way as committees are called during the morning hour. But in order that members may not be taken by surprise, all propositions introduced under this call are required to lay over for one day; and then the series of resolutions introduced from different States under Rule 52 would come up for consideration in the order in which they were offerred. I do not think that the previous question is in order at all under this call.

The SPEAKER. With all respect for the gentleman, the Chair would say that he has already decided this question.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The call referred to by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to which the previous question is applicable is the second call in the morning hour of Monday.

Mr. HALE. As the basis of this action is admittedly that the condition of the House is such that no business is ready, would it not be in order at the present time to make a motion which would involve actual business, and would not such a motion remove the condition under which this call comes up? For instance, this is private-bill day; the committees have all been called and they have no measures ready; is not a motion now in order to proceed to the consideration of business on the Private Calendar, that being business of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair, in anticipation of the exact condition of things that has occurred, made examination of the rules and found that when the call of committees for reports is exhausted before the morning hour is actually out, this fifty-second rule comes into operation. Therefore, until the procedure provided for in this rule is exhausted, the Chair would not entertain any motion which would interrupt it.

Mr. HALE. Not until the expiration of the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. Then of course this business could be superseded.

COUNTING ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. LE MOYNE submitted the following resolution:

Whereas serious differences of opinion may arise between members of the two Houses of Congress as to their jurisdiction and powers in joint session in counting the electoral vote, and the questions involved being questions of law:

Resolved, That the Senate be requested to appoint a committee to act with a committee of five to be appointed by the Speaker of this House, in presenting to the Supreme Court such questions as either of said committee may deem important in the premises and in asking the members of the Supreme Court to give to Congress an opinion thereon.

Mr. HOSKINS. I rise to debate this resolution.

The SPEAKER. Debate arising, the resolution lies over.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT FOR 1876.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to report a joint resolution providing for the printing of the Report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1876.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent the resolution can be adopted at this time.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I presume there will be no objection to it.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does this resolution come from the Committee on Agriculture? If not, I suggest that it be referred to the Committee on Printing for consideration, instead of being adopted.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not accept the gentleman's suggestion. If he will not allow the resolution to pass now, let it lie on the table. I will find a way to reach it hereafter.

The resolution was laid over under the rule.

NATIONAL ARMORY AT HARPER'S FERRY.

Mr. FAULKNER submitted the following resolution; which, by unanimous consent, was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the objects and purposes of the Government in recently becoming the purchaser of the water-power and land formerly occupied and used for a national armory at Harper's Ferry, and to inquire, since the Government has now again become the owner of that property, whether it would not be expedient to re-establish the national armory at that point, or employ its valuable water-power for some other governmental purpose.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The call of States and Territories for the introduction of resolutions having been concluded,

Mr. ATKINS moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the pension appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CLYMER in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4120) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1878.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated for the payment of pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878:

For pensions for Army invalids, for widows, minors, and dependent relatives, and for survivors and widows of the war of 1812, $27,325,000, including such contingent expenses as may be recommended by the Commissioner of Pensions, and approved by the Secretary of the Interior; fees for preparing vouchers and administering oaths, in accordance with the act of June 20, 1874, $225,000; fees of examining surgeons, $235,000; compensation to pension agents and the expenses of the several pension agencies, $245,000, as provided under the act of June 6, 1874, and of section 4781 of the Revised Statutes.

For Navy pensions to invalids and for widows and dependent relatives, $525,000; for fees of examining surgeons, $2,600; for fees for preparing vouchers and administering oaths, as provided by the several acts of Congress, $3,400; compensation to pension agents, $2,000, including such contingent expenses as may be recommended by the Commissioner of Pensions, and approved by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That the appropriation aforesaid for Navy pensions and other expenditures under that head shall be paid from the income of the Navy pension fund, so far as the same may be sufficient for that purpose, as provided by the act of July 11, 1870.

The total sum recommended by this bill is $28,533,000.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I will simply state that the Committee on Appropriations have this year followed, as they did last year, the estimates of the Commissioner of Pensions. The appropriation this year is $999,500 less than the appropriation last year. The whole amount of appropriations contained in the bill is $28,533,000 for both Army and Navy pensions. About $3,000,000 of this sum it is deemed important by the Department to set aside for the purpose of meeting the arrears of pensions. A little over $25,000,000 will be sufficient to pay the pensioners upon the Army roll, and between $400,000 and $500,000 will pay the pensioners on the Navy roll. But it is necessary to have about $3,000,000 to meet arrears upon the Army roll, and from $25,000 to $50,000 to meet arrears upon the Navy roll. The rate this year per month shows a slight decrease upon the rate last year. Last year it was $8.65; this year it is $8 60.

I do not think it is necessary to say anything further on this bill. I suppose no gentleman in the House will raise any objection to its passage.

Mr. GARFIELD. It may be well for the country to know, as a matter of information, whether the number of pensioners on the roll is now less than it has been.

Mr. ATKINS. The number of invalid pensioners has increased; but the ratio of decrease of widows and dependents is greater than the ratio of increase of invalid pensioners. Hence the reduction.

Mr. GARFIELD. As a matter of information, as to the new elements of increase and decrease, I should like to know how much the appropriation has been reduced by change of law and how much by change of mortality rates.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman will find the facts embraced in the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, which has just been laid upon the table of every member. I have the report here and can read the figures, but every gentleman can read them for himself. But there is no change growing out of the law.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me say to the gentleman from Ohio that no increase or decrease of the appropriation results from recent changes of the law, but altogether from the decrease on the one hand and the increase on the other hand of the number of pensions.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman is of course aware that besides occasional changes in the general law of pensions the number of persons put upon the rolls by private bills year by year is one element in making up the pension bill. I have tried, so far as I could, to analyze the forces which play upon this bill, to see what keeps it up and what puts it down.

Mr. HOLMAN. There has been for the last eight years the same number of private bills passed both Houses.

Mr. GARFIELD. My idea is, if the gentleman will allow me, that we have reached and perhaps passed the summit of appropriations for this object; that it took a number of years to develop, to get through with the regular form of laws to admit to the rolls the persons entitled to pensions, and that the time must necessarily come when we shall pass the climax and begin to go downward. I suppose we have already passed the maximum.

Mr. ATKINS. We reached the maximum two years ago. We appropriated last year $500,000 less than the year previous and we appropriate this year a million less than the appropriation in the previous pension bill.

If any gentleman desires further to discuss the bill I will yield the floor for that purpose, but no further discussion being desired I will move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CLYMER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4120) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1878, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SERVICE OF THE ARMY IN THE SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I desire to call up for action at this time the resolution I presented yesterday, which under the rule was laid over until this morning.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to transmit to this House copies of any and all orders or directions emanating from him or from either of the Executive Departments of the Government to any military commander or civil officer, with reference to the service of the Army, or any portion thereof, in the States of Virginia, South Carolina, Louisiana, and Florida, since the 1st of August last, together with reports, by telegraph or otherwise, from either or any of said military commanders or civil officers.

Mr. KASSON. Is it in order to-day, on Friday, to consider that resolution?

The SPEAKER. Why not?

Mr. KASSON. It was entered on a day of public busines, and the general rule is when it stands over, it stands over to another public-business day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the private business, as far as the rules provide for private business coming before the House, has been gone through with, and, if the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa be correct, then the House would have nothing to do but to adjourn. The Chair would rule that the motion would not be in order to-day.

Mr. KASSON. Not to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar?

The SPEAKER. Not to-day.

Mr. KASSON. There is new business as well as old business on the Private Calendar, and it seems to be in order to consider the new business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would modify his statement in that regard, that the new business would be open to consideration.

Mr. KASSON. With the permission of the Chair, I will say that I understand the construction of Joint Rule 21 to be simply imperative when business lying over shall be in order, but it does not exclude as being in order at the will of the House at an earlier moment——

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already ruled upon that point.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I demand the previous question on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. HALE. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HALE. And that is to object to the reception of the resolution.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Does the gentleman from Maine raise the question of consideration?

Mr. HALE. No; I make objection as a member of the House upon this ground: that this report, or resolution, comes here from no committee, by no authority, and that it can only be received by unanimous consent. There has been no action taken upon it. It was first submitted on yesterday. Now, in certain cases where committees report on certain matters on the call of committees an objection may send the report over for a day, and then it may be taken up. But this resolution, as I understand, was presented on yesterday; objection was made and it was said, let it lie over for a day and perhaps no objection will be made to its consideration. Now, that was simply an expression of what any member might or might not do. I raise the point of order on this ground, that I have the same right to object to-day that I had yesterday; that the resolution is in no better condition to-day; that it requires unanimous consent to be now considered. I do this because, while I have no objection to such a resolution as the Senate passed in proper terms, calling for full information, not limiting it, and also having the clause which is always attached to requests made to the Executive for information, "if not incompatible with the public service"—while to such a resolution I would have no objection, the objection to this is fundamental, that it is not in the proper form; and so I avail myself of the privilege of a member to object.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] is wrong in his premises on which he has erected his argument which, in my judgment, is entirely out of place in reference to the question before the House. The resolution of yesterday was objected to simply in regard to its consideration at that time. It was laid over and now is called up to be considered. If the gentleman from Maine is right in his position and may object to the resolution to-day, another member may object to it to-morrow, and so it may go through the whole session, some one gentleman objecting every time that the resolution comes up, so that the House would never have an opportunity of acting upon the resolution at all.

Mr. HALE. If the gentleman will excuse me I will say that I think every gentleman has a right to object in the way he suggests.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. The gentleman from Maine is wrong, for the reason that the resolution was laid over under the rule one day before being considered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would correct the gentleman from New York. The resolution was not laid over one day under any rule. The Chair will also correct the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.] The resolution was before the House by unanimous consent. The Chair will state his exact understanding with reference to this matter. This resolution, in the first place, was presented for unanimous consent. It was not in the power of any member of the House to make a conditional objection. But the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] stated in debate or conversation with the gentleman from New York, that if he would agree that it should come up again to-day he would not interpose an objection, therefore the Chair thinks that this resolution on yesterday, with the conditions attached for its consideration to-day, was brought then before the House by unanimous consent.

Mr. KASSON. The Chair will allow me to state that when I made the objection my object was to prevent the consideration of the resolution, or its reception, until there was time to examine it. I thought it differed in form essentially from the resolution, adopted in the Senate, to which the gentleman from New York has referred. It was read a second time, and what took place appears thus in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

Mr. WOOD, of New York. The Senate has unanimously passed a similar resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be again read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be considered at this time.

Mr. KASSON. I object to its being considered now.

Then the gentleman from New York asked that the resolution might be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I made objection to that, still insisting that it should lie over. The object clearly was to prevent its being taken up, its being even considered by the House until I could see what it was; because, on the first reading, I thought its terms were different from the ordinary terms in which we address the President of the United States for information.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Iowa that he did not quite read all that appears in the RECORD.

Mr. KASSON. I referred to the last portion and will now read it:

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Will the gentleman object to its being referred to the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. KASSON. Let it lie over for a day. There may be no objection to its passing when it is again considered.

The resolution was accordingly laid over under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the objection must be absolute; that it could not be conditional; and that this arrangement which was being made was for the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I request that the Journal may be read.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. The gentleman from Iowa did not object to the reception of the resolution but to its consideration at that time. That is the distinction.

The SPEAKER. The Journal will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution, to-wit:

Mr. KASSON objected to the present consideration of said resolution, and by unanimous consent the same was laid over for one day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had not seen the Journal before, and the House will observe how accurately the Journal confirms the position of the Chair.

Mr. KASSON. But when the Journal recites that it was by unanimous consent the resolution was laid over, it is clearly an error; because the rule requires that when a resolution calls for information it shall lie over for a day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say that the resolution had to come in by unanimous consent. It could not come in under any rule.

Mr. KASSON. Unquestionably it had to be by unanimous consent that it got in, if at all; but it was the rule, on my objection, and not unanimous consent which took it over.

Mr. HOAR. Permit me to call attention——

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state right at this point that the rule which provides that resolutions shall lie over one day does not apply to this resolution, but to resolutions introduced on Monday.

Mr. HOAR. In regard to a statement which the Chair has just made to the House about not having seen the Journal, the Chair will pardon me for calling his attention to Rule 5.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that that rule has been and is practically a dead letter; that seldom does the Speaker examine and correct the Journal before it is read. The House has that power, and the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read to the House to-day and no correction was made.

Mr. HOAR. Permit me to say in the friendliest and most respectful way——

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that one very great security which the House has always had in regard to the correctness of the Journal is in this very Rule 5, which gives the House the assurance, depending upon the personal character of the Speaker as well as the Clerk, that the Journal has been examined by the Speaker before it is read to the House. I know that in the case of some of the predecessors of the present Speaker that rule has not been carried out.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman recollect an instance, within his own knowledge, when it was the practice of a Speakor on his own motion to correct the Journal?

Mr. HOAR. I have no doubt it has been done.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has more knowledge on that point, then, than has the Chair.

Mr. HOAR. It do not state it of my own knowledge. That rule should not be a dead letter; it is a very important rule.

Mr. KASSON. I referred to Rule 53, which is as follows:

A proposition requesting information from the President of the United States, or directing it to be furnished by the head of either of the Executive Departments, or by the Postmaster-General, shall lie on the table one day for consideration, unless otherwise ordered by the unanimous consent of the House.

That unanimous consent was not given yesterday. The rule does not refer to resolutions offered on Monday, but to any such resolutions whenever offered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds that unanimous consent was given yesterday for the introduction of this resolution, and that an arrangement was made, not under any rule, but by unanimous consent, that the resolution should be considered to-day, for the reason that a qualified objection could not be made.

Mr. KASSON. I take no exception to the ruling of the Chair, because the record as it is made looks as if it were intended by the House to make this order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the question of consideration to the House if that question is raised.

Mr. KASSON. I will only say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] that my only object was to have an opportunity to get the resolution worded in the usual manner of all addresses to the President calling for information; that is, "if not incompatible with the public interest."

Mr. WOOD, of New York, While I do not object especially to the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] I want to correct a statement of fact about which he is evidently mistaken. It is usual when calling upon the President for executive information in reference to foreign affairs to put in the phrase "if not incompatible with the public interest;" for in those cases, involving our relations with foreign governments, there may be reasons of public interest rendering it inadvisable to make known certain diplomatic correspondence, &c. But in cases like this, where we call for information touching certain orders the President may have issued and which are matters of record in the Departments, which we have a right to legislate upon and which we desire for purposes of legislation, it does seem to me that no public interest can require any secrecy in regard to them, unless——

Mr. KASSON. Permit me to say that I think the gentleman——

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I have said that I will not object to the modification of the resolution if the gentleman insists upon it.

Mr. CLYMER. I trust the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] will not modify his resolution.

Mr. KASSON. I will only say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] that he will be unable to find any exception such as he refers to. The necessity for the use of the phrase to which I have referred arises from the fact that the executive is one of the coordinate branches of the Government, and its judgment is also free upon such points. But the gentleman accepts my suggestion, and that is all I want.

Mr. CLYMER. I trust the gentleman will not accept the suggestion.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I cannot conceive that in answering this resolution it is possible for the President of the United States to make any exception on any ground or pretext that the public interest requires that he shall not submit to Congress the information called for. If he shall so far transgress his clear and palpable duty under the resolution as not to send us everything we ask for, I can only say that that would be an additional offense which the Congress of the United States will not permit to be overlooked. As I said before, I will accept the modification suggested by the gentleman, believing that it does not substantially affect any public interest. I now call the previous question on the resolution as modified.

Mr. HALE. Let the resolution, as modified, be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to this House copies of any and all orders or directions emanating from him or from either of the Executive Departments of the Government to any military commander or civil officer, with reference to the service of the Army, or any portion thereof, in the States of Virginia, South Carolina, Louisiana, and Florida, since the 1st of August last, together with reports by telegraph or otherwise from either or any of said military commanders or civil officers.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. WOOD, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELECTIONS IN SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I ask unanimous consent to have the RECORD corrected in reference to the resolution which I offered on Monday for the appointment of special committees to investigate the recent elections in Louisiana, South Carolina, and Florida. The resolution is printed in the RECORD as originally offered, and contains a clause which was stricken out in the resolution as afterward adopted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the Journal is correct.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The Journal is correct; but the RECORD does not give the resolution as finally passed. I ask that the resolution be reprinted as actually adopted.

Several MEMBERS. Let the resolution be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution as it appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; and then the gentleman from New York will indicate the correction.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That three special committees, one of fifteen members to proceed to Louisiana, one of six members to proceed to Florida, and one of nine members to proceed to South Carolina, shall be appointed by the Speaker of the House to investigate recent elections therein, and the action of the returning or canvassing boards in the said States in reference thereto, and to report all the facts essential to an honest return of the votes received by the electors of the said States for President and Vice-President of the United States, and to a fair understanding thereof by the people, and whether the electoral votes of the said States should be counted; and that for the purpose of speedily executing this resolution the said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to take testimony, and, at their discretion, to detail subcommittees, with like authority to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to take testimony, and that the said committees and their subcommittees may employ stenographers, clerks, and messengers, and be attended each by a deputy sergeant-at-arms; and said committees shall have leave to report at any time by bill or otherwise.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The clause which was stricken out in the resolution as adopted is in these words:

And whether the electoral votes of the said States should be counted.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will be corrected in accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman from New York and the resolution in its corrected form reprinted.

There was no objection.

Mr. GARFIELD. I understand that it is the right of a member to make a correction in the RECORD without calling the attention of the House to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will observe that this is a correction of a resolution, not of a gentleman's remarks.

Mr. GARFIELD. Still, I think that if a resolution has been misprinted it is the right of a member to have it corrected in accordance with the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not rule on that point till the occasion requires.

The resolution as corrected is as follows:

Resolved, That three special committees, one of fifteen members to proceed to Louisiana, one of six members to proceed to Florida, and one of nine members to proceed to South Carolina, shall be appointed by the Speaker of the House to investigate recent elections therein, and the action of the returning or canvassing boards in the said States in reference thereto, and to report all the facts essential to an honest return of the votes received by the electors of the said States for President and Vice-President of the United States, and to a fair understanding thereof by the people; and that for the purpose of speedily executing this resolution the said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to take testimony, and, at their discretion, to detail subcommittees, with like authority to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to take testimony, and that the said committees and their subcommittees may employ stenographers, clerks, and messengers, and be attended each by a deputy sergeant-at-arms; and said committees shall have leave to report at any time by bill or otherwise.

WAR DEPARTMENT EXPENDITURES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of expenditures in the War Department and its bureaus for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1592) to re-imburse Horace Glover for property unlawfully seized and sold by the United States Government.

ADJOURNMENT TILL MONDAY.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House now adjourn; but before the question is put I will yield to allow my colleague [Mr. CASON] to make some reports from a committee.

REPORTS ON PRIVATE CLAIMS.

Mr. CASON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with a recommendation that they pass, bills of the following titles; which were severally referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 1906) for the relief of John Fletcher;

A bill (H. R. No. 510) for the relief of W. C. Snyder, of Illinois;

A bill (H. R. No. 1005) to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1872, and for former years, and for other purposes," approved May 18, 1872;

A bill (H. R. No. 902) for the relief of Abel M. Lewis; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1157) for the relief of Joel A. Billups.

Mr. CASON also, from the same committee, reported back with amendments a joint resolution (H. R. No. 74) relating to the claim of Forman Matthews and David S. Parker, in the Court of Claims; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. CASON also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the petition of Captain A. W. Bolenius and other officers of the Fiftieth Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers, claiming remuneration for clothing and other property lost in the service of the United States; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that they pass, bills of the following titles; which were severally referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 1433) for the relief of A. B. Woodruff, late postmaster at Woodruff, South Carolina; and

A bill (S. No. 715) for the relief of Samuel H. Canfield, postmaster at Seymour, Connecticut.

Mr. BRADLEY. The last bill reported is designed as a substitute for House bill No. 212 of similar title.

Mr. BRADLEY also, from the same committee, reported bills of the following titles; which were severally read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying reports, ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 4136) for the relief of Charles E. Fahnestock, of Glasford, Illinois, (substitute for House bill No. 919;)

A bill (H. R. No. 4137) for the relief of Sidney F. Oviatt, postmaster at Orange, Connecticut, (substitute for House bill No. 688;) and

A bill (H. R. No. 4138) for the relief of Edwin A. Clifford, of Evanston, Illinois.

Mr. BRADLEY also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 2471) for the relief of J. A. Murray; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRADLEY moved to reconsider the various votes by which bills reported by him were respectively referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calender or laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEFENSE OF FRONTIER OF TEXAS.

Mr. MILLS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House, if not incompatible with the public interests, whether any increase in the cavalry force of the Army on the Mexican and Indian frontier of Texas has been made as authorized by act of July 24, 1876, and whether any troops have been removed from the frontier of Texas and from the post of Fort Sill on the Kiowa and Comanche reservations; and whether, if so, their places have been supplied by other forces.

Mr. MILLS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE MONONGAHELA RIVER.

Mr. FAULKNER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4139) to authorize a further appropriation to continue the public works now in the course of construction upon the Monongahela River, in the State of West Virginia; which which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

GOVERNMENT WORKS, MONONGAHELA RIVER.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for consideration at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the loss and injury which have resulted to the Government works upon the Monongahela River from failure at the last session of Congress to make the appropriation recommended by the Secretary of War, and also into the causes and reason of the failure to make said appropriation; and further, to inquire into the expediency of repairing the injury, if any, resulting from the discontinuance of said works by an immediate appropriation for that purpose.

Mr. HOLMAN. This a matter of inquiry, to be sure, but still I do not think that my friend from West Virginia should insist upon it.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana object?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not.

Mr. FAULKNER. It is a simple resolution of inquiry.

There being no objection, the resolution was adopted.

VETO MESSAGE.

Mr. BANNING. I desire to report back from the Committee on Military Affairs a veto message of the President of the United States, and to move that it be laid upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman that the manner of treating a veto message is provided for in the Constitution.

Mr. HALE. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that he had better withdraw his report and submit it in another form.

Mr. BANNING. I will then withdraw it for the present.

PORTRAIT OF HON. H. H. STARKWEATHER.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks notified the House that that body had passed a bill (S. No. 1057) to provide for the engraving and printing of the portrait of the late Hon. Henry H. Starkweather, of Connecticut, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope, by unanimous consent, that bill will be taken from the Speaker's table and acted on at once.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] yield for that purpose?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection; and the bill is taken up for action at this time.

The bill, which was read a first and second time, provides that such sum as may be necessary is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to have engraved and printed a portrait of Hon. Henry H. Starkweather, of Connecticut, deceased, late a member of the House of Representatives, as authorized by the resolution of the House of May 5, 1876, and concurred in by the Senate May 20, 1876; such portrait to accompany the eulogies ordered to be printed by the same resolution.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then (at one o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday next at twelve o'clock m.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. J. H. BAGLEY: The petition of Henry S. Van de Carr and Elsie M. Reynolds, administrator and administratrix of the estate of Rennselaer Reynolds, deceased, and Gordon B. Reynolds, of Stockport, New York, for an extension of letters-patent for brakes for power-looms, to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. BANNING: A letter from J. S. Keefe, first lieutenant Nineteenth United States Infantry, Fort Dodge, Kansas, complaining of the violation of section 1204 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the promotion of Army officers, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, the petition of hospital stewards of the United States Army, for increased compensation, to the same committee.

By Mr. DENISON: The petition of C. D. Penniman, and 15 others, for the repeal of the check-stamp tax, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. EAMES. The petition of the officers of Redwood Library of Newport, Rhode Island; of the officers of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, and of officers of the following-named libraries: Boston Public; Amherst College; Chicago Public; Literary Company of Philadelphia; Fletcher, Burlington, Ohio; Public, Leeds, England; Public, Indianapolis, Indiana; Academy of Natural Sciences, Philadelphia; Free, Germantown; Cooper Union, New York; Mercantile, Philadelphia; Apprentices', New York; Public, Haverhill, Massachusetts; State Law, Rhode Island; Grosvenor, Rhode Island; Sawyer Free, Gloucester, Massachusetts; Public, Cincinnati; American Catalogue, New York; Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania F. A. M.; Pennsylvania Hospital Medical, Philadelphia; Public, Worcester, Massachusetts; American Antiquarian Society of Massachusetts; Rockford Public; Mercantile, of New York and of Baltimore; Young Men's Christian Association, New York; Young Men's Association, Buffalo; Free, Newton, Massachusetts; Yale College; Friends' Historical Association, Philadelphia, for the purchase by the United States of the papers of General Count de Rochambeau, to the Joint Committee on the Library.

By Mr. HOLMAN: The petition of Charles W. Garrett, of Wayne County, Indiana, late a cadet at the United States Naval Academy, and who was dismissed therefrom on the charge of "hazing," for an inquiry into the facts upon which the court-martial acted that found him guilty, and that he may be re-instated in said Naval Academy, to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. HUNTON: The petition of F. E. Shepperd, of Casanova, Virginia, for the removal of his political disabilities, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. PIERCE: The petition of the officers of the Boston Free Trade Club, that the merchant shipping of the country be relieved from the onerous restrictions now resting upon it by the preventing of citizens of the United States buying ships built out of the United States and sailing them under the nation's flag, and for changes in the tariff laws, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. SCALES: A paper relating to the establishment of a post-route from Buchanan, Granville County, North Carolina, to Roxborough, Person County in the same State, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads

By Mr. STEVENSON: The petition of Charles S. Keller, of Washington, District of Columbia, for compensation for services rendered the United States at the United States arsenal at Charleston, South Carolina, to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. WOOD, of New York: The petition of Tassel Conklin, late corporal Company K, One hundred and seventy-third New York Volunteers, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, December 11, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

JOHN B. GORDON, from the State of Georgia, appeared in his seat to-day.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. HAMLIN. I wish to say that I was absent on Friday from the Senate on account of severe indisposition. If I had been present I should have voted to sustain the ruling of the Chair on what is called the twenty-second joint rule.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DAWES. I present the petition of Mrs. Sarah J. Spencer, president of the board of trustees of the Girls' Reform School of the District of Columbia, on behalf of the board and other citizens of the District, praying for aid in providing for the immediate necessities of the unfortunate females for whom that institution has been established. I desire, at the request of these petitioners, to have their petition referred to the Committee on Appropriations. As the chairman of that committee [Mr. WINDOM] is now in the Senate he will permit me to invoke the early and earnest consideration of the committee to the prayer of this petition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WEST presented the petition of Samuel Jamison, of New Orleans, Louisiana, praying compensation for property used by the United States in New Orleans from July, 1862, to October, 1865; which, together with the papers on the files of the Senate relating to this case, was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CHAFFEE presented eight petitions of citizens of Colorado, praying for the creation of an additional land district in that State, to be located at Lake City, Hinsdale County, and named and known as the San Juan land district; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented resolutions of the Board of Trade of Denver, Colorado, asking that Denver be made a port of entry; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ALCORN presented the petition of Dr. Robert J. Turnbull, late of Mississippi, praying compensation for property taken by United States troops during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the petition of J. E. Johnston, praying the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PATTERSON presented the petition of M. L. Bonham, of South Carolina, praying the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ELECTORAL VOTE OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. BOGY. I wish to present to the Senate, so that it may be printed, the report of the five democrats who were invited by the returning board of Louisiana to be present at the counting and canvassing of the votes given at the late election in that State. It is a very able document, very dignified, and contains a great deal of information. As the report from the other side was printed the other day, I hope there will be no objection to having this report also printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the paper?

Mr. INGALLS. I suggest the reference of the motion to print to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to know what it is before it is received. I do not know whether it is a petition or what it is.

Mr. BOGY. I will state again that it is the report of the five democrats who were invited to be present by the returning board at the counting of the votes given in Louisiana at the late election. We have received and printed the report of five gentlemen on the other side which was sent to this body by the President; and now I desire and they desire that this report be printed, so that the facts may go before the country.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the Senator allow me to ask if it is addressed to the Senate?

Mr. BOGY. No, sir, it is not.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then it should not be here.

Mr. BOGY. It is a report not addressed to the Senate. The report of the other men was not addressed to the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The other was a message of the President of the United States.

Mr. BOGY. The other was addressed to the President, and transmitted to the Senate, and in that way it was printed. At the time the printing of that document was obtained by a vote of the Senate it was stated by more than one Senator that the opposite statement would also be printed when received. It was understood that there would be no objection made to printing it. I will say of this document that it is respectful, perfectly so. If it were not so, I would not offer it to the Senate. It is a dignified and an able document, and contains not one word offensive to the Senate or to anybody. I repeat that it was understood, as far as an agreement of that kind can be called an understanding, that this document should also receive publication. I would not like to detain the Senate by reading it as part of my speech, which if I claimed the right I could do; but I think the Senate will with great propriety, as the other statement was published, order that this be printed also.

Mr. EDMUNDS. To whom is the paper addressed?

Mr. BOGY. It is a report made to Mr. HEWITT, chairman of the democratic national committee, because those gentlemen, like myself, went to New Orleans at the request of Mr. HEWITT. Of course he had no right to send us there, no official authority, but I think, as far as that is concerned, he had as much authority as the President, although not holding a position equal to the Presidency. Both were unofficial and outside of official duty.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Of course the Senator must be aware, and undoubtedly is, that it is the settled rule of the Senate not to receive papers which do not accompany something that is before the body or which are not addressed to the Senate. The objection to the paper is that it violates all the rules we have hitherto observed in respect to receiving and acting upon documents that are not addressed to us. I certainly have not the least objection, for one, to the thing being printed at the expense of the Senate, or at the expense of anybody else, provided it reaches us in a way that is in accordance with the ordinary method of legislative proceeding. If the Senator will turn the report into the form of a petition to the Senate, asking us to make an inquiry or to set forth any facts, and it is signed by these gentlemen, of course he has a right to present it, and I should be very glad to see it printed.

Mr. BOGY. I presume I have no right to make such a change myself.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator can get the authority in a few hours undoubtedly.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like the Senator from Missouri to state again the nature of the paper he presents.

Mr. BOGY. It is a report made by the five democratic gentlemen who were invited to be present by the returning board in New Orleans at the counting of the votes. It is of the same character as the report made by yourself and others on the other side. I will state now for the benefit of the Senator who was not in his seat a while ago what I stated before, that when the other paper was printed it was understood that any report from this side would, when received, also be printed without objection. If it is improper to print it I will read it as part of my speech, for it sustains in the same manner in which my speech did all the positions which are advanced in answer to the gentleman from Ohio. This paper does beyond a doubt, I think, establish the fact that the returning board of Louisiana had no control legally over the question of the election of presidential electors. The point is argued with ability and with dignity; and I advanced the same position the other day in answer to my friend from Ohio. He contended that they had control; I contended that they had not. This point is very clearly made in this very able paper; and if it be proper I will read it as part of my remarks, and in that way get it before the country.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think the Senator from Missouri should adopt the suggestion made by the Senator from Vermont. I should vote for the printing of that paper now and at all times when it shall come properly before the body; but the Senator from Missouri will see while he may read it as a part of his speech and incorporate it in the RECORD the Senate cannot well order it to be printed. It is in violation of its rules. If any old almanac of the last century should be offered here and the Senate be asked to reprint it, it would conform just as much to the rule as a motion to print this statement. If the gentlemen who signed the paper should address their statement to the Senate it would come in the nature of a memorial or remonstrance or whatever you choose to call it. It would then be properly before us and I certainly would vote to print it; but I cannot vote to print it in its present condition, because it would be in violation of all rule and would open the door so that anything in the world might be offered to print, while our rules prescribe precisely what shall be printed. To come within the rule and meet the unanimous consent of the Senate, I take it, one day is not a consideration, and I presume the gentlemen will so shape their paper as to bring it properly before us.

Mr. SHERMAN. I not only desire to vote for the printing of this paper, but I desire to see it, and we cannot have an opportunity of seeing it properly unless it be put in the form of print. The suggestion made is perfectly fair, that it ought to be put in a form so that, according to the rules of the Senate, it may be printed; for instance, the form of a memorial. These gentlemen may address their memorial to the Senate, and that authority no doubt can be got by telegraph in two hours, and then I think it ought to be printed. Besides that, I think these gentleman ought to furnish us copies of testimony that they have in their possession, taken before the returning board, especially the cross-examination of some of their witnesses, which throws great light on this whole matter. I think they ought in justice to themselves, because they have ours, to furnish that testimony. They have in their possession copies of depositions of witnesses selected by the democratic electors and cross-examined by the republican electors, and that testimony I am as anxious to see as is the Senator from Missouri to see the paper in print that he presents this morning. I will vote for printing this report in any form in which it is presented, according to the rules of the Senate, and also for printing the testimony taken by the democratic electors. I think it important, because we have before us the consideration of that matter.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator refers to testimony taken before the board?

Mr. SHERMAN. I mean all the testimony before the board.

Mr. BOGY. I do not know that I would be justified in making the alteration. A letter accompanied this report signed by all these gentlemen, telling me that it is sent to me to be presented to the Senate, sent for that purpose, and as the other document had been printed they also want this document printed. I have that letter.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. BOGY. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. We shall all agree that this paper as presented is not within the rules of the Senate. The Senator from Missouri at this moment is seeking a mode of making it conform to the rules of the Senate. If the signers of the paper are not accessible and he has no authority competent in his own estimation to change this paper, any single citizen I think may address to the Senate a memorial of his own in which memorial he may incorporate the paper as a part of it. Thus it would be within the rules and within the suggestion made by the three Senators who have called attention to the fact that it is not now in such conformity. Any single citizen I take it has a right to address to one or both Houses of Congress a petition or memorial, and he has a right to make this paper if it be, as I have no doubt it is, as described by the Senator, respectful and proper in its terms, a part of the memorial he presents; he refers to it; he adopts it. That brings it I think within the rules of the Senate and that will save the Senator all trouble of telegraphing and also all delay in assuring himself of his authority.

Mr. BOGY. I should like to ask my friend a question.

Mr. STEVENSON. If my friend from Missouri will accept a suggestion from me, I will join him in a memorial to the Senate, as we were both on that committee, asking that the accompanying document, which we will make a part of our memorial, shall be printed, setting forth in the memorial what the document which we ask to be printed is. I have no doubt that that will reach the suggestion. I will join with the Senator myself. This is a matter of too much importance to stand on a mere technicality, and I have no doubt every Senator desires to see it printed.

Mr. MCDONALD. I will unite with the Senator from Kentucky in subscribing a memorial embracing the paper. As to the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio in reference to the testimony taken, I will say that I have no doubt before the close of this week it will be properly brought forward and be printed for the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am glad to hear it, because I assure the Senators that I think it is just to the Senate and to the people of the United States that the testimony in the hands of these gentlemen, or at least in the hands of the democratic candidates claiming to be electors of Louisiana, shall be published. I think, under our laws in Ohio, we should be entitled to have copies of it, because the republican electors through their counsel did cross-examine witnesses introduced by the democratic electors, and they would have a right to copies of those depositions to be made a part of the case.

Mr. MCDONALD. There will be no difficulty about that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It will be certainly within the power of the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections, now acting under a resolution of the Senate, to invite these gentlemen who send this left-handed memorial to come with their papers before the committee and exhibit them, and I hope it will be done if there is any reluctance on the part of anybody to print it.

Mr. BOGY. My intention, when I rose a moment ago, was to ask the Senator from New York a simple question, which may not be necessary now: whether it would be proper for me to present a memorial and make this document a part of my memorial.

Mr. CONKLING. I have no doubt about it, Mr. President. The Constitution guarantees to every citizen, as I understand, the right of petition. The Senator, although Senator, is a citizen. I take it if he or Mr. HEWITT, who is a member of the House, or any other person in whose custody this paper is, present in form addressed to the Senate a memorial of which the paper constitutes a part, either by being incorporated in it or referred to as part of it, that is an appropriate paper, the right to present which nobody will, nobody can, deny; and if the Senators from Kentucky and Indiana who seem to be so engaged just now, should make that their memorial, or any single citizen should make it his, I cannot see what doubt there would be as to the right of the Senator to present it to the Senate.

Mr. BOGY. So as to conform to the rules of the Senate, which I presume are altogether proper, I will adopt the suggestion of the Senator from New York, and will prepare, with my friend from Kentucky [Mr. STEVENSON] and my friend from Indiana, [Mr. MCDONALD,] who were also there, a memorial, and make this document a part of the memorial. I will accept that suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper is withdrawn by the Senator from Missouri.

ELECTION INVESTIGATION IN SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. WINDOM. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4121) to provide for the expenses of certain special committees, to report it back with amendments, and ask for its present consideration. I suppose there will be no objection to it.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It appropriates the sum of $21,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to defray the expenses of the three special committees charged, respectively, with the investigation of the recent elections in the States of Louisiana, of South Carolina, and of Florida, the appropriation to be added to the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, and to be disbursed upon vouchers approved by the chairmen of the respective committees.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

The first amendment was to insert after the word "committees," in line 7, the words "from the House of Representatives;" so as to read:

To defray the expenses of the three special committees from the House of Representatives, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the following as an additional section:

SEC. 2. That the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expenses of the Committee on Privileges and Elections in making the investigations directed by Senate resolution of December 5, 1876, in the several States named therein, said appropriation to be paid into the contingent fund of the Senate. And the disbursing officer of the Senate shall advance such parts of the sum above appropriated to the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate as the chairman of said committee shall, in writing, direct, for the purpose aforesaid; and the Sergeant-at-Arms shall, as soon as practicable, make a detailed report of the expenditure thereof, with proper vouchers, which, when so made, shall be received by said disbursing officer and returned with his accounts to the proper officer of the Treasury Department.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like the amendment relating to the House committees reported again. I know it has been acted upon, but I should like to hear it.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "committees," in line 7, insert "from the House of Representatives."

Mr. COCKRELL. How much is the amount appropriated in the House bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Twenty-one thousand dollars.

Mr. COCKRELL. Twenty-one thousand dollars to three committees of the House and $50,000 to one committee of the Senate!

Mr. WINDOM. The Committee on Appropriations were guided in their judgment as to the amount necessary by the unanimous action, as they are informed, of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Upon a consultation among themselves it was agreed that this was the smallest sum that would be sufficient, and upon their judgment, they having canvassed it carefully, the Committee on Appropriations reported the amount asked for.

Mr. MORTON. I will state that the Committee on Privileges and Elections canvassed this question of expense in view of the duties imposed upon them and the extent of the investigations which they are required to make. They came to the conclusion that it would require in the neighborhood of $50,000 to do the work; but if it does not require so much the money will not be used. There will be no more money used, I presume, than is necessary. I think the committee will be conducted as economically as it can be, but we came to the conclusion that it would cost in the neighborhood of $50,000 to conduct this investigation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. DAVIS. When this matter was discussed in the Committee on Appropriations, it was believed that $21,000 was too small a sum for the House committees, and that the House would probably amend the bill so as to provide for an increase. I name it now, so that when the amendment comes here the Senate may not be taken by surprise at the fact that there is an additional sum required on the House side.

The amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act to provide for the expenses of certain special committees of the House of Representatives, and of the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate."

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1061) making a further appropriation toward construction of canal and locks at Cascades of Columbia River; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1062) to provide for the redemption of the greenback currency; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WINDOM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1063) for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOWE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1064) for the relief of L. H. & G. C. Schneider; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1065) for the relief of William T. Duvall; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LOGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1066) to increase the pension of Amasa J. Finch and First Lieutenant George W. Fitch; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ELECTORAL VOTE OF OREGON.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred the resolution relating to the electoral vote of Oregon, have considered the same and instructed me to report it with amendments, and ask its adoption. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read, and the Chair will put the question.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to which was referred the resolution relating to the electoral vote in Oregon, having considered the same, have instructed me to report that the said resolution be amended to read as follows, and they recommend its adoption: Strike out all after the word "whereas" in first line and insert the following in lieu thereof: "It is alleged that at the late election for electors of President and Vice-President for the State of Oregon the people of said State by a majority of over one thousand votes elected W. H. Odell, John C. Cartwright, and J. W. Watts.

"And whereas it is also alleged that the governor of said State did subsequently, in violation of law and in defiance of the expressed will of the people, issue a certificate of election to one E. A. Cronin instead of to said J. W. Watts;

"And whereas it is also alleged that said E. A. Cronin did, in violation of law, upon some pretext, assume to select for his colleagues one J. N. T. Miller and ——— Parker in lieu of said W. H. Odell and J. C. Cartwright;

"And whereas it is further alleged that said Cronin, Miller, and Parker have assumed to cast the vote of Oregon for President and Vice-President and to certify the same to the President of the Senate: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections is hereby instructed to inquire into the eligibility of said J. W Watts, and investigate the facts attending the appointment of said electors and pretended electors and report the same to the Senate, and for this purpose may employ a stenographer, send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and examine witnesses."

Mr. COOPER. Is that up for consideration?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is about to put the question whether the Senate will proceed to its present consideration.

Mr. COOPER. Will one objection carry it over?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. One objection will carry it over under the rules.

Mr. COOPER. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution goes over until to-morrow.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move that the resolution, as amended, be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

ELECTORAL VOTE OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That ——— extra copies of the letter of the President, with the accompanying documents, on the election of Louisiana, be printed for the use of the Senate.

EMPLOYMENT OF DEPUTY MARSHALS.

Mr. BAYARD. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be, and he is hereby, directed to communicate to the Senate the total number of deputy marshals employed throughout the United States in connection with the election held on November 7 last, stating the number so employed in each State and at each voting precinct respectively, and the length of time they were so employed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I want to offer an amendment to that resolution to-morrow, and I should like it to go over till then. I wish to get a little more information than the resolution seems to contemplate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over.

Mr. BAYARD. Does the Senator object to its being printed?

Mr. EDMUNDS. To its being printed, I have no objection of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the printing will be ordered.

JAMES L. HIGH.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask that the bill (S. No. 604) for the relief of James L. High, reported at the last session by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] adversely from the Committee on the Judiciary, be restored to the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill will be restored to the Calendar with the adverse report. The Chair hears no objection.

COMMITTEE ON PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS.

Mr. MORTON. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the several subcommittees of the Committee on Privileges and Elections authorized and instructed by the resolution offered by Mr. EDMUNDS (being Senate Miscellaneous Document No. 1, of this session) to inquire and report concerning certain matters relating to elections, and any other subcommittees into which said first-named subcommittees may be subdivided, shall be committees of the Senate, so that the chairmen thereof shall be authorized to administer oaths under the provisions of section 101 of the Revised Statutes.

The purpose simply is to authorize the chairmen of subcommittees to administer oaths as the chairmen of committees under the general law; and, for that purpose, to treat them as committees of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that is the law now, although the statute says "committees." The original resolution provided for the appointment of subcommittees so as to give them this power; but there is not the slightest objection to removing all possible doubt, as this resolution does.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHRISTIANCY] I believe examined the law, and also the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. WADLEIGH,] and they thought it might not be broad enough, that there might be a doubt of it. Hence we deemed it proper to have this resolution adopted.

Mr. WADLEIGH. It is proposed that the subcommittees be divided into other subcommittees. That is the difficulty.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I see.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, when additions were made to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for the special purpose of acting under the resolution introduced by the Senator from Vermont, it was understood by me, and I think by the chairman of the committee, that the work to be done under that resolution would be done in the city of Washington. The committee are of the opinion that it is necessary to visit the several States. I ask the Senate to excuse me from service on that committee on that ground. I have already spent some time in the same business, but should not urge that as a reason for asking to be relieved now; but I am a member of what is called the silver commission. The subject referred to that commission is important; we are considering it; and the material work of the committee is to be done in the next twenty or thirty days. I ask the Senate to excuse me from service upon the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I submit that motion.

The motion was agreed to, and the President pro tempore being by unanimous consent authorized to fill the vacancy, Mr. OGLESBY was appointed.

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business the Chair will call up the unfinished business of Friday's session, which is the joint resolution (S. R. No. 10) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution, as introduced by Mr. EDMUNDS on the 22d of March last, is as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of each House concurring therein) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which when ratified by three-fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid as a part of the Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE XII.

That the twelfth article of the amendments of the Constitution be, and the same is hereby, abrogated, and in the place thereof the following be, and the same is hereby, ordained and established, namely:

The electors shall meet in their respective States, and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and for all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each; which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the presiding justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. And the Supreme Court, at a time and place to be fixed by law, shall publicly open all the certificates and count the votes, and the person having the greatest numberof votes for President, considered by the court to have been lawfully given and certified, shall be President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors lawfully appointed; and if no person have such majority, the state of the votes shall be immediately certified to the House of Representatives, and then, from the persons having the highest number, not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by a viva voce vote, the President; but the vote shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote; and if the votes of any State shall not show a majority for any one candidate, the vote of such State shall not be reckoned. A quorum of the House of Representatives for the purpose of such election shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice; and if, on the first vote, there shall be a failure to elect, further votes shall immediately continue to be taken until a President shall be elected.

And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President, when the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the fourth day of March next following, then the Vice-President shall act as President, as in the case of death or other constitutional disability of the President. The person having the greatest number of votes for Vice-President, to be counted and determined as in case of President as before provided, shall be Vice-President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed. And if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list, the Senate shall choose a Vice-President; a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necesary to a choice. But no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice-President of the United States.

SEC. 2. No person holding the office of a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States shall be eligible to be elected as President or Vice-President until the expiration of two years next after he shall have ceased to be such justice.

The joint resolution was reported by the Committee on the Judiciary on the 12th of May with amendments.

The first amendment was in line 14 of section 1, before the word "vote" to insert "each elector shall;" in the same line, after the word "vote" to strike out the words "by ballot" and insert "viva voce;" and in line 16 after the word "with" to strike out "themselves" and insert "himself;" so as to read:

The electors shall meet in their respective States, and each elector shall vote viva voce for President and Vice-President, one of whom at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with himself.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the same section, line 17, after the word "name" to strike out "in their ballots;" after the word "and" at the end of line 17, to strike out "in distinct ballots" and insert "separately;" in line 20, after the word "and" to strike out "for" and insert "all;" and in line 21, after the word "each" insert "and of the electors voting for the same;" so as to read:

They shall name the person voted for as President, and separately the person voted for as Vice-President; and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted, for as President, and all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each, and of the electors voting for the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 29, after the word "be" to insert "the;" so as to read:

And the person having the greatest number of votes for President, considered by the court to have been lawfully given and certified, shall be the President, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "appointed" in line 31, to insert the following words:

But the court shall, in the discharge of the duties herein provided, disregard errors of form, and be governed by the substantial right of the matter.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I think such an amendment as that ought not to be adopted without some consideration. This amendment will give to the Supreme Court a boundless jurisdiction. There is no limit to it.

But the court shall, in the discharge of the duties herein provided, disregard errors of form, and be governed by the substantial right of the matter.

I think that would authorize the court to do almost anything, perhaps to go and count the votes in the State of Vermont. It is such a jurisdiction as ought not to be conferred upon any tribunal without very grave consideration. This makes the Supreme Court a returning-board authorized to do the very right in the matter, to disregard all matters of form, to go behind every kind of document and do what they think is right. I certainly think that is a very dangerous power to confer on any tribunal.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Indiana is right in his suggestion as to the scope of this amendment, I should agree with him entirely; but the object of the committee was—and if we have not attained that we certainly desire to attain it—to authorize the court not to exercise a boundless discretion, or to go forward to count the votes of citizens, or to retry any question that the State authorities had, according to their laws under the Constitution, tried and determined, but to do exactly what the Supreme Court of the United States and the circuit courts and the district courts of the United States and the courts of all the several States are authorized by the laws of the United States and the several States to do in the matters which the courts are called upon to try, and that is to disregard defects of form and decide according to the matter of right in the cause as it shall appear. The language is almost literally that in the act of Congress of the 24th of September, 1789, establishing the judicial courts of the United States, which says that in all matters coming before them—

The said courts respectively shall proceed and give judgment according as the right of the cause and matter in law shall appear unto them, without regarding any imperfections, defects, or want of form, &c.

And they may amend all such defects. The language that we used we supposed imported simply the authority in the Supreme Court in performing this duty, to disregard such a technical effect, for instance, as that which on an occasion only a few years since occurred, I believe, in reference to the State of Arkansas, whose vote was not counted, or at least was objected to—I do not remember what became of it—on account of some difficulty in the seal of the State attached to the certificate of the governor showing who were the electors; the difficulty being, if I rightly remember the circumstance, that the seal of the secretary of state was used as distinguished from the great seal of the State—of course a matter of no practical consequence whatever, and one that would give everybody who was obliged to decide upon such a question, and bound to follow the exact letter of the law in that mere matter of form, great regret to be obliged, if we had the authority, to reject the vote of a State on such a ground. The object of this amendment, the only object, and the only construction that I can see which can be given to it, is to enable the Supreme Court, guided by what is said before as to what their duty is, that is, to ascertain what electoral votes have been lawfully given and certified, taking up the elector from the time of his creation, to perform that duty without being bound to follow mere matters of form, but being bound only by matters of substance. Of course that increases the power of the tribunal as the power of all the courts of the United States and now of all civilized countries is greatly increased. Although the laws of all such countries regulate the forms and methods of procedure, yet they nevertheless all of them, in the interest of justice and civilization, give the court a power and impose upon it the duty, when a matter is before it, to follow the substance and not to allow the letter to defeat the spirit of the law it is called upon to administer. If there is any other phrase which my friend can suggest, either now or by and by, as we are now in committee, this can be postponed.

Mr. MORTON. I will say to the Senator that, before the Senate is called upon to vote on this important amendment, I think we ought to hear the Senator on the general merits of the proposition. I have no doubt he is prepared to speak, and I should like to hear him on the general proposition before we are called upon to pass on this particular amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Well, sir, I am perfectly willing to state now the little I have to say. I am, of course, prepared to speak in the same sense that I and all the other members of every committee of the Senate are prepared when they report a matter, to explain briefly the grounds and principles upon which it rests. I shall be very happy to do it at this time rather than after the amendment is adopted, if that course is agreeable to Senators.

The substantial point, Mr. President, in this proposed amendment to the Constitution is to change what is said, and what has been said for many years on all sides of political opinion, to be an uncertainty in respect of the present state of the Constitution of the United States on this most interesting topic into a certainty as far as constitutional provision can produce certainty about anything. I wish to say, also, that this is not a device, as some of the newspapers have intimated, and as has been suggested in some letters that I myself have received, to use the vernacular, "to swap horses in crossing a stream," but it is an amendment to the Constitution of the United States that was introduced into the Senate on the 22d of March, almost a year ago, and was reported favorably by the then Committee on the Judiciary on the 12th of May, with the changes of phraseology that will be found in the print.

Now, of course, the first ground on which we should enter in considering this question is, what is the present state of the constitutional law upon this subject? And, having ascertained that, if we can, or having ascertained that there is no unanimity of opinion as to what the present state of the constitutional law is, is it desirable to reach a state of constitutional law in the interpretation of which all statesmen and legislators and judges can agree, as far as such a thing is ever possible? Secondly, whether the particular method of certainty that the committee propose is the best one attainable under the present condition and probable future condition of the Republic.

It is a singular circumstance, Mr. President, that the language of the existing Constitution should have paused exactly where it did. The Constitution of 1789, article 2, taking up this question just where this proposed amendment does, after the State has appointed its electors, just as now, "in such manner as the Legislature shall direct," proceeds to say that the electors—

Shall make a list of all the persons voted for and of the number of votes for each; which list they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Represent atives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes shall be the President," &c.

That, the Senate will observe, is the provision of the Constitution of 1787, of the government which went into force on the 4th of March, 1789, and not the provision now in force, which I shall come to presently.

The first thing that took place, of course, in respect of this provision was its being proposed and considered in the Federal convention. I have searched through the debates and the journal of that convention to find some light, however faint, that would enable me to perceive precisely what the makers of the Constitution intended in respect of the powers of any body when these certificates should have been opened; and I am unable for one, to find in the proceedings of the Federal convention anything that throws light upon it. That language, so far as I have been able to discover, was not made the subject of criticism or comment or debate. It may be that it was; but I have not been able to find it.

Immediately after this, and during the first term of President Washington, Congress was called upon to pass a law to put this provision of the Constitution into more perfect effect in respect of the time when the electors should be voted for and the time when the electors should give their votes, and so on. So the act of 1792 was passed to carry out these provisions of the Constitution relating to the election of President and Vice-President of the United States. And again it is a singular circumstance, although there is a considerable body of debate upon the passage of that law, that this particular point of where the power resided, if there was any power at all, to count these votes, the extent of that power, by whom to be exercised, under what methods, was left entirely without a single word of comment or criticism or debate. There was no allusion to it that I can find. The debate ran chiefly as to the proper time to fix of distance between the votes of the people and the votes of the electors, some thinking the electors ought to vote the next day almost, if it were possible to guard against their being influenced by machinations and cabals and all that sort of thing. But when you come to the passage of this first law, which was to put these provisions of the Constitution about the election of President and Vice-President into effect and provide for future elections, the first one being provided for by an ordinance of the convention that has been already referred to and which contains a very strong implication apparently in the direction of the power, whatever it may be, residing in neither House of Congress, but residing in the President of the Senate, this question was untouched. I do not mean to say that this ordinance of the convention defined the extent or the limit of the power of the presiding officer of the Senate, but it seems to imply that the thing to be done, the whole thing to be done in the presence of the two Houses, was to be done by the presiding officer of the Senate; and on that occasion, on that first election, the resolution of the Senate and the attendance of the House of Representatives in this Chamber proceeded apparently evidently upon that theory. The presiding officer of the Senate did everything. Since that time, as we know, that method has not always, perhaps not generally, been pursued; and in what I say now I do not intend to express any opinion as to the true construction of the Constitution. If we are forced to define what is the true construction of the Constitution, I wish to do it for myself after further reflection and deliberation, and after I shall have heard the subject more fully discussed. The principle upon which the committee proceeded in respect to this proposed amendment to the Constitution is not based, if I correctly understand the views of the committee, upon any determination that we have made as to precisely what is the true construction of the present Constitution, but rather upon the well-known fact that, for many years at least, there has been, among getlemen of all parties, a considerable difference of opinion as to the true interpretation of the Constitution; and, in order to escape from that difficulty and to solve that doubt, not by interpretation, but by a fresh act of three-fourths of the States of the American people, we thought it was desirable to do it in this way, and for other reasons that I shall come to by and by.

Mr. President, under this provision of the Constitution of 1787 the act of 1792, as I have said, was passed which throws no light at all upon the construction that Congress in the passage of that act gave to it. It simply provides that the two Houses shall be in session on the second Wednesday in February, and that the certificates shall be opened and the result ascertained in the manner provided by the Constitution. It goes directly back to that; and as I say it went back without any comment at all that I can find upon what sort of power resided anywhere on such an occasion.

The next time and place that one might fairly look for light upon the subject was in the year 1800, and in Congress when there was introduced into the Senate, and passed, a bill providing for disputed presidential elections. You will observe that that was under the first provision of the Constitution. That bill provided, in substance, as it left the Senate—I have the original files down-stairs and will send for them, but I think I can state the substance with accuracy without referring to them—that there should be a joint committee of the two Houses of Congress, selected in a particular way which I need not now go into for that was a matter of detail, which committee when appointed should be actually a single committee, not like many of what are called joint committees—an equal number of gentlemen of the two Houses meeting together for convenience and if they all agreed very well, and if they did not each committee stood on its own feet—but a tribunal composed of equal numbers from each House of Congress to whom, when the certificates were opened, as provided by the Constitution by the presiding officer of the Senate, all the certificates and all petitions, memorials, depositions, papers, complaints to be made with a certain formality that the bill provided for otherwise, upon the subject of that election, should be committed; and that that committee should consider, substantially under such limitations as we have provided for the Supreme Court in this joint resolution, not how many votes were given in a particular State, not hunt all over all the States to count up and see how many had voted honestly and how many dishonestly and how many had been rejected and so on, but looking to those electors and ascertaining first whether they were the persons they purported to be, whether they were the individuals whom the States had as provided by their Legislatures appointed, that is looking into the regularity and legality of their commissions and not into the measurement of the number of votes that each had got going behind the State machinery, but looking to see that that had been complied with. Then that committee thus having examined any disputed case was to report its opinion and that opinion was made the law for that occasion. I believe they were to be sworn; I am quite sure they were. They embraced in fact all the characteristics that the Senate at that time could impute to a selected body of judges to pass upon a specific question of the application of the Constitution to the state of facts that the papers and other evidence laid before them raised. It went over to the House of Representatives. The House of Representatives entirely reversed the method and at first proposed not to the Senate—I am now giving a general sketch of the proceedings—but it was first proposed in the House that this joint committee, instead of having a power to decide, should only have the power to inquire and report to the two Houses; and that their functions should end by furnishing to the two Houses, just as any other committee's functions end by furnishing the two Houses the facts that they had ascertained, the testimony upon which they had ascertained them, and their opinion, leaving the two Houses perfectly free either to follow that opinion, or to reverse it or to do something else. But finally the House of Representatives agreed upon an amendment which was in substance a substitute for the whole bill, providing simply and finally for leaving the matter to the decision of the Senate and the House of Representatives acting separately just like two judges on the bench having equal powers, and provided that the vote of a State shall be counted unless the two Houses concurred for the reasons appearing on the depositions or on the face of the papers in rejecting the certificates of that State; and with that condition in substance, with all the necessary machinery which I will not take up your time to go through, they sent the bill back to the Senate of the United States. The Senate, after consideration, amended the amendment of the House by striking out the form of rejection and inserting the form of admission so as to make the law, if the Senate amendment to the House amendment were agreed to, a law substantially like the twenty-second joint rule that once existed in this body, if it ever had a constitutional existence anywhere upon which I express no opinion, because as I say, I am not pressing this amendment upon the Senate upon any theory that I may be supposed to have as to what the present Constitution is, but upon a different one. The Senate and the House then met finally in this attitude upon those two amendments, the Senate insisting upon what was the substance of the twenty-second joint rule that nothing should be received that the two Houses did not agree to receive, the House insisting upon what was the substance of the bill of my honorable friend from Indiana that nothing should be rejected that the two Houses did not agree to reject, and finally each House adhered to its respective opinions and the bill fell as a matter of course.

That ended the attempt of 1800, which the Chair will see was first on the part of the Senate, an effort very largely concurred in by the votes that passed the bill, to provide for a joint committee, who, being sworn as judges, should pass upon all disputed questions finally, and the two Houses agreeing to stand by that opinion upon the theory, as it was stated somewhat in the debates, that there would be less danger from the bias of party, the heat of passion, excitement, and so on, to have any disputes settled by a limited body of selected persons from the two Houses, specially sworn to perform that duty, than to open the question at large to all the combinations of politics and the heat of party and so on and so on. But the House having changed that entirely, the Senate apparently receded from that attitude without any serious resistance and finally agreed that the two Houses at large should determine any disputed question, but insisting that nothing should be received, as I have said, that the two did not agree to, while the House insisted that everything should be received that the two did not agree to reject.

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Senator be kind enough to indicate the volume in which the record of those proceedings, to which he has referred, exists and the pages at which they will be found?

Mr. EDMUNDS. All this will be found about this bill that I am now speaking of, the bill of 1800, in the proceedings of the Sixth Congress, Annals of Congress, 1799 to 1801. It runs through a large number of pages.

Mr. BAYARD. Which volume of the Annals?

Mr. EDMUNDS. They are not numbered by volumes, but by Congresses, the Sixth Congress, 1799 to 1801. After that came the election of Mr. Jefferson as President of the United States, and that celebrated tie of the vote between himself and Mr. Burr, which was made manifest on the second Wednesday of February, 1801; and with that, of course, everybody is familiar. The Constitution as it then stood, as the Chair and Senators are perfectly well aware, provided for a particular method, where there were votes for several persons, of picking out the particular person who was to be President, inasmuch as the electors were not authorized to distinguish who they were for as to President and Vice-President, but were to vote for two persons. Then it was proposed to change the Constitution. I ought to have said before coming to that, that in the debates about this bill of 1800, providing a mode of settling disputes about President, there is reference to the true construction of the Constitution in the course of the debate, and one of the chief and leading debaters, Mr. Charles Pinckney, of South Carolina, insisted with great vigor, and certainly with great ingenuity, if not with soundness—on which as I say I do not intend to express any opinion at all—that not only this bill of 1800, but even the act of 1792, was unconstitutional; that the act of 1792 went clear to, if not beyond the verge of congressional power, and that this act, which actually undertook in terms to provide for a disputed case to be acted upon either by law or by either House under the law, was wholly outside of constitutional power, and that the people of the United States in agreeing to the Constitution never intended, could not be supposed to have intended, to repose, particularly in a legislative body that in a particular contingency, dependent upon its own action, was to have the right to choose a President, any power at all over the subject. He said in substance that it would be monstrous to suppose that the States in adopting this Constitution had intended first to leave it to the House of Representatives under any circumstances to determine whether a President had been elected, and then, if in a particular state of parties with heat and excitement they should choose to determine that a particular President had not been elected, take the thing into their own hands, and elect one themselves. Whether that was sound or not, as I say, I express no opinion; I am only endeavoring to point out to the Senate as briefly as I may the course of legislation and of discussion on the subject that has already occurred in the earlier times of the Government.

That bill, as I have said, failed for the reason I have stated. Then it was proposed to amend the Constitution, and in 1803 the two Houses agreed on an amendment to be submitted to the people, which is now article 12 of the amendments, which, so far as this present question is concerned, although it requires the electors to vote distinctly for some person for President and some person for Vice-President, as the first provision did not, when you come to the respect about which this proposition of the Committee on the Judiciary acts and speaks, adopts literally the language of the old article. Although there had been fourteen years, nearly fifteen years, since the Government went into operation four elections of President of the United States under the old article, although there had been in the debate three years before in the preceding Congress a great difference of opinion as to what the language meant, where was the limit of constitutional power in Congress if any existed at all, and what was its nature, yet, when the two Houses of Congress proposed to the States this fresh amendment to cure the difficulties that had arisen in 1800, they took exactly the same language that the convention had taken before in respect of the disposition of the votes after the electors had given them and provided that the lists should be signed and certified and transmitted, sealed, "to the seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate," and—

> The President of the Senate shall, in presence of Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

Making no provision for what had already been drawn into dispute and discussion as to the exercise of that power, and no specific direction as to the person or authority by whom it was to be exercised, or the limit of the jurisdiction of that person or power. There was a very extended debate on the subject of that amendment to the Constitution, which went through and was adopted, as I have said; and although I have not yet been able to read it all, I think I have read it so far that I feel safe in saying that that debate on this change in the Constitution makes no reference to the force of the words declaring that the certificates shall be opened "and the votes shall then be counted." It is entirely dark, so far as I can discover, though it is possible something may yet be found. We can draw no light from the discussion on this new amendment in respect of the true import of those words.

From that time to this, as everybody knows, exactly what has been done has been somewhat various. For a period of sixty-one years, from 1803 to 1864, there was no provision of law except the act of 1792, which does not touch at all the subject that we are now speaking of, because it merely says the thing shall be done according to the Constitution, whatever that means; there was no provision of law at all, and there was no provision in any joint rule or other proceeding of the two Houses, that I know of, which undertook, either expressly or by implication, to carry out that provision of the Constitution except by the mere mechanical presence of the two bodies, with tellers to sit at the tables to do the clerical work. The first instance that I know of when any question was made was in 1857, when the electors of Wisconsin failed to meet on the day that the act of 1792 required they should: so that, if the act of 1792 were constitutional in that respect, and that requirement was a requirement of substance, a mandate instead of a direction, the vote of the State of Wisconsin had not been given in accordance with the Constitution. But the certificate was received by the then President of the Senate, Mr. Mason, of Virginia, and was opened and was reported by the tellers in the regular way with all the others. On the President announcing that vote, somebody rose and questioned the right of the presiding officer to determine whether that was the constitutional vote of the State of Wisconsin or not, and the presiding officer, it is stated, declined to entertain the question of order or to submit it to the bodies or people, whatever they might be called, who were before him, and retired from the Chair and with the Senate came back to the Senate Chamber.

Mr. MORTON. And said the only thing in order was to count the votes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And he said the only thing in order was to count the vote. Then in each House a resolution on the subject was immediately proposed; and, after some discussion in each House, the whole thing was dropped without throwing any light on the matter further than the event itself shows. That was under the law, and upon a point that the law explicitly provided for. In other cases, those of Indiana and Missouri and Michigan, connected with their condition as States in the Union or out of it, whether they were entitled as States, in each instance I believe, to cast the vote, questions were made, and certain forms of resolutions of the two Houses were in all or the most of them adopted. That in respect of Missouri was simply providing that the result should be stated contingently. Inasmuch as it was understood before hand that it did not make any difference whether the State of Missouri had so far become a sovereign State on the day of the election as to be entitled to vote for President and Vice-President or not, it was simply provided that the thing should be read contingently: "If Missouri be counted, the vote will stand so and so; if Missouri be not counted, the vote will stand so and so." In the case of Indiana, I believe the vote was actually counted; nobody finally made any objection.

Mr. STEVENSON. There was an objection to the Indiana vote, and the Houses separated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, there was an objection to Indiana, and the Houses separated; and apparently without any decision by the two Houses, so far as I now remember, the count went on. My friend from New York [Mr. CONKLING] says the House of Representatives voted to count Indiana, and sent a message to the Senate; the Senate returned and it was counted. I remember that it was counted, but I had forgotten how the thing was reached. Then in the case of Michigan there was the same difficulty, and the same sort of steps were taken.

Then when we come down to 1864, the particular condition of the country at that time seemed to require that some measure should be resorted to, if already under the Constitution the law was not complete, to provide for the contingency of our southern brethren in the confederacy sending votes to the President of the Senate that should be entirely adequate to reject Mr. Lincoln and put in General McClellan, who was supposed to be more favorable to their views than Mr. Lincoln was, to secure what little there was left of the Union at that time to the peaceable and quiet enjoyment of its own rights, in its own way; and so, in that abnormal condition of things, the two Houses passed a joint resolution declaring in substance, as I remember it, that these States having gone into the rebellion, and put themselves outside of all healthy organizations, as the saying is, or used to be, in the democratic party—I never knew exactly what it meant—but being entirely out of the range of being able to perform any constitutional function in the way of controlling the destinies of this Republic, that they should not be treated as entitled to cast any vote at all. Mr. Lincoln signed that joint resolution and returned it to Congress with a message in which he stated, if I correctly remember it, that he signed it out of deference to the opinions and wishes of Congress; but he wished to put on record his statement that he did not consider that the President of the United States had anything to do with the subject at all, either under the form of a law or otherwise; and that the Constitution had not made it the subject of the exercise of the law-making power; and that the two Houses or somebody, certainly not he, and not the law, must take whatever fate the Constitution gave them, without any interference on the fact of the President.

Mr. COCKRELL. What was the date of that joint resolution?

Mr. EDMUNDS. February, 1865. I do not remember the exact date.

Mr. CONKLING. February 8.

Mr. EDMUNDS. February 8, I think. Just as the joint resolution was thus on the verge, when it was not known whether Mr. Lincoln would finally veto it or sign it, this twenty-second joint rule, now happily, as everybody has said before this session of Congress, among the things of the past, sprang into existence one morning in the Senate here. Nobody knew exactly who the father of it was. I think I have seen it stated that the Senator who contrived it, a few years afterward, expressed his great astonishment that any such thing should ever have been presented and adopted. A very distinguished Senator, once the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary of this body, indeed for a very long time, and still a prominent statesman in the central part of the continent, expressed his infinite surprise that such a thing as that should be in existence; and yet, on looking it up, it turned out that he was the identical person who wrote it and put it through. But on looking at the record there does not seem to have been any debate on the subject of the power of Congress to pass it, or the wisdom of making that particular sort of provision, or any reference to the fact that it settled one way what had been that bone of contention in 1800 when Congress had tried to pass a law on the subject under the Constitution, which required the President as well as the two Houses to assent, and decided it in favor of the then view of the Senate, and against what was almost the unanimous view of the House of Representatives; for, although those were high party times in 1800, when it came to this question as to whether everything should come in that both Houses did not agree to reject or whether everything should stay out that both did not vote to receive, on the vote, after debate, in the House of Representatives, the state of parties appeared to have been broken up altogether, and the vote was very heavy, embracing gentlemen of all sides, in favor of standing by the House notion, that nothing should be rejected that both Houses did not agree to reject. Under the twenty-second joint rule, everybody knows what we have done.

Mr. BOGY. I would inquire of the Senator if the twenty-second joint rule was not reported from a joint committee raised by both Houses, to provide a mode of counting the votes? Was not the joint rule the report of that committee?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, I think that is so. It was reported by Judge Trumbull, if I recollect rightly, then chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, and one of the members of the joint committee which, according to the usual course of like ceremonious occasions, had been from time to time appointed on every occasion when the count was to be had and a President to be declared to arrange the ceremonies. No, I should not say "on every occasion," because in 1801, when that usual committee of the two Houses appointed in the same way that it always had been and ever has been since, came to consider how the thing should be done, on that occasion, when Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Burr, the two chief candidates, were on the poise, they were unable to agree, and the committee reported to each House the fact that they were unable to agree, and thereupon the Senate passed a resolution to inform the House of Representatives that on the second Wednesday in February, being two or three days subsequent to the time of the passage of the resolution, the Senate would be ready in its Chamber to receive the House of Representatives in accordance with the Constitution that both might be present at the opening and counting of the votes, which, of course, was obviously the only possible thing that could be done, unless the two Houses could agree. Inasmuch as the Constitution imposed upon the President of the Senate, officially, who has only one place and that is the chair he occupies in presiding over the Senate, to have the custody of those certificates and to open them, if the Constitution were to be observed at all, unless it could be arranged that the Senate as a body, with its presiding officer, should meet in some other place than its own Chamber, it was indispensable, of course, that if the two Houses could not agree, the House of Representatives should attend here. They could not find the President of the Senate anywhere else. As everybody now knows after this great lapse of time, there was then intense excitement, the same sort of prophecies that we see now in many newspapers and in the letters of some men were uttered, that the country was on the verge of destruction and that civil war would imbrue our hands everywhere in a very short period of time; human language was exhausted, as it has been on more recent occasions and is being now, on the subject of the danger of the Republic, and the House of Representatives was one way politically and the Senate was the other; and yet when that resolution of the Senate went over to the House, the patriotic good sense that, after all settles down upon us at last, led the House of Representatives by a unanimous vote, without debate, or disagreement, or a word of objection, to send a message to the Senate that they would attend in the Senate Chamber on the day fixed by law, being the second Wednesday in February, to be present, and that they had appointed A B and C D the two tellers, according to the usual custom, to sit at the Clerk's desk, just as the Senate had informed them that it had appointed a teller to sit at the Clerk's desk to keep the minutes of what was going on; and so the country came out clear and safe, as I hope it will and believe it will on this occasion.

That, Mr. President, briefly and in quite an imperfect way of stating it, because it takes too much time to state with detailed precision all these things, is the history of what we have done; and it left the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom this subject was referred, in the attitude, looking it all over, of seeing that there was a difference of opinion as to the true import of the Constitution in respect of where this power is lodged, and what sort of a power it is, and what are its boundaries if it be a power at all except a ministerial one. Then it left us also to face another question. Granted that the power named in the Constitution is purely ministerial and that the Constitution really reads that the President of the Senate, in the presence of the two Houses, shall open and count the votes whatever they may be, and that he, and nobody else, has the power to do anything but the simplest ministerial duty of spreading out to the public gaze everything that he has got, then we ask ourselves where does that leave us? Suppose he has three sets from a State, all signed by the same governor, and under the same seal, if you please, signed by the same electors voting different ways, does his ministerial power include the right to take out number one rather than number three? We did not know whether it did or not. Then, we being satisfied that that would not be an agreeable way to leave it in respect of the orderly administration of this Government, because on that theory neither he nor anybody else had any power to do anything except to empty the basket in the presence of the representatives of the American people, and leave it to luck, or to revolution, or to the law in the contest for title to the office, or, to use one sweeping phrase, to the future, to find out who was elected President, the next alternative was to assume that the President of the Senate has more than ministerial power and that the Constitution has vested the power in him to hear, try, and determine the question upon the face of the papers—I do not now mean "determine" in the sense of a final judicial decision, but determine just as a canvassing officer having full powers under a State to determine who had been elected a judge of the county court or a governor in the State, still subject under the constitution and laws of that State to a dispute between two individuals as to the title to the office in the proper way. Assuming that the presiding officer of the Senate had power, more than ministerial, but quasi judicial, giving certainly a prima facie title to the person in whose favor he should decide, then we said, is it wise for the security of this country in the long run, when some distant day comes when Presidents of the Senate are not as good as they are now, but when in the normal condition of things the President of the Senate is always the Vice-President of the United States, who, like Mr. Jefferson, might be a candidate himself, and frequently would be, and always wanted to be, I believe; is he to be left with quasi judicial power to determine whether he is elected himself to an office? It appeared to us that that would be an alternative that we ought to take refuge from in some better plan, if we could find it, as soon as possible.

Then we were faced in the third place by a third phase that might be put on the Constitution; that the Constitution had intended, although it did not say so, that the two Houses of Congress might by law regulate the matter, and provide some species of tribunal to act, after the certificates should be opened, and between the time of their opening and the time when, in a certain contingency, the House of Representatives might be entitled to elect a President. It is true that the Constitution says nothing of that sort in that place, but still in another place it gives general powers of legislation to carry all the provisions of the Constitution and all the powers under the Constitution into effect and to regulate their exercise; and, therefore, granting for the sake of the argument, as was early denied by Mr. Pinckney and others, that there was the constitutional power to legislate and form a tribunal for the occasion, what sort of tribunal can you form by law? We had tried the experiment only a few years ago of having introduced and sent to the Law Committee of this body, and I believe afterward, on another occasion, the Committee on Privileges and Elections, a proposition to establish a particular judicial or quasi-judicial tribunal which was to decide disputes arising afterward between individuals; but a majority of the committee were of opinion that we had no constitutional power to impose that duty on the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States at any rate, and doubted greatly whether we had the constitutional power to establish such a tribunal at all; at least many did. That did not come to anything.

Then, to recur again to this immediate subject, what were we to do in the way of a law? We had found that seventy years ago Congress had endeavored to pass a law and that after great deliberation the two Houses had separated upon a radical difference, the most radical of any that could possibly be stated probably, as to the treatment that a disputed certificate was to receive, one side by a great strength of votes and with a great show of reason contending that nothing ought to be admitted into this most vital function of the Republic except what the two great powers of the Republic, the House of Representatives and the Senate, should agree to admit. The other said at the other end of the Capitol, by a still greater number of votes and with an equal show of reason, that exactly the reverse ought to be the case; stating it in their way, that no sister in this Republic of States should have her voice excluded from the performance of this most interesting and important function unless the two great powers of the States and of the people should agree that she ought to be rejected. Of course, anybody who philosophizes can see that there is a fallacy in the statement of both propositions, one that is most ineradicable, for the reason that both of them rest on the foundation that here are two independent judges who are to have an independent voice upon the question, and hence it requires a unanimity one way or the other in order to agree upon anything. That was not an agreeable condition to leave it in.

And so it appeared to us, Mr. President, that in a matter of such grave consequence, and not for this present election that is now just past—for it was long anterior even to the nominations of the candidates or to the formation of the particular issues on which it was expected that parties might divide—but for all the centennial future of the Republic, until some better means could be adopted, that the safest repository of this power must be, first, for legal reasons, in order to get at a decision, a tribunal that had a single, solid, united existence, not a duality, half with independent power and the other half with independent power, but one tribunal, so that that tribunal in almost every practically conceivable case, being usually of an unequal number of persons, must be able to come to some solution of the problem, to say yes or no to any question arising about a certificate.

Then the question was, what tribunal is the best? We had flattered ourselves, I think all of us, that philosophically considered such a tribunal, however extensive or however limited its powers might be, must for the time being be the best, just as single tribunals, when anything is to be done or decided, as distinct from making laws, where checks and balances are required for the preservation of liberty and so on, would as a matter of necessity, we supposed, be conceded by everybody to be the best. What one then? If you were to form the two Houses of Congress into one grand committee to meet in the Hall of the House of Representatives or here, under a particular presiding officer, no matter who, and were to have questions of this character respecting whether a particular State had in the constitutional way expressed her voice on the election of President, then in times of high party excitement we had every reason to expect, as all human experience has proved, that just in proportion as you increase the number of men who compose such a single tribunal, some of them elected for short periods, some for long ones, and having such diverse kinds of constituencies, just in proportion as you increase the number of such judges, just in that proportion you increase the danger of a decision being reached, based not upon the case, but upon the wish of each individual member of that body. We all know, and the world knows, and I need not take your time, Mr. President, to state it, that if you take a thousand citizens of a city and take twenty of them at a time separately, and ask them to decide a question of public moment, there is that lack of magnetic heat which is pretty apt to lead them to preserve order, decency, deliberation, and as far human nature is capable of it under the best conditions of coming to a result that they intellectually believe in, although that result might be colored by their prejudices, or changed possibly; but in respect of fidelity to themselves, we could say that the mass of them everytime would decide according to conscience, and upon the case, and not upon wish. If you multiply that twenty men in the city by five hundred and make it a thousand, even if they are clergymen, and bring them together to decide identically the same question, all human experience goes to prove that you have got what is substantially a mob; you have not a deliberative body; prejudice, passion, anger, everything that ought not to enter into the consideration of such a subject, as excluded from the minds of those same men, individually virtuous and honest, would intrude themselves; everything by which they ought to be enabled to measure and dispose of the subject that is before them would be lost sight of. You would have such a result as that.

It seemed to us, therefore, that a power of this character ought not to be reposed, if we could avoid it, in a single political body composed, as if you make a political body of the great mass of the Senators and Representatives in Congress, and especially so as in the event of an inability to find that any one person has a majority of all the votes, one of those political bodies immediately comes into the exercise of a very important, and under certain circumstances a very pleasant, jurisdiction. Where were we to look then? We found that under the Constitution of the United States there exists at the seat of Government a tribunal that is single, is perpetual, whose existence and term of service do not depend upon changes in Presidents or in politics or changes of the law—a tribunal sufficiently numerous not to be under the control of any one or two men, and sufficiently limited in numbers not to be the subject of that excitement which a great mass of men always feel; a tribunal whose members are continually changing by the course of nature and by the course in respect of their politics of those gradual changes that arise from changes of administration when one party or another is in power when a vacancy occurs; so that it was almost certain, we thought, that there would be in all the future in that tribunal a representation of the general shades at least, if not of the smaller colorings, of the various political parties of the country, so that whatever of bias and prejudice should grow out of political opinion, although the man himself could have no interest in it, would be a large degree offset one against another in the various judges.

In the next place, of course these gentlemen are always trained presumably, and taking the history of the Republic I think we may say as a fact, that this great tribunal has always been composed of men trained to a careful, systematic knowledge of constitutional law, and of the laws of the various States where they hold their courts; and therefore they would bring to the consideration of whatever question should be left to them minds as well-fitted to the performance of that duty as those of any that could be selected, if we were to do it, by some grand committee or otherwise on each particular occasion; but that method, of course, has its objections and great ones, for the reason that if you selected a grand committee, even of a few persons for a particular occasion to compose it, as you must, of gentlemen of different political opinions, they are charged more or less with the excitement and the wishes of the hour, and are, therefore, presumably very largely affected in their judgments by the state of public feeling and their own wishes more than these gentlemen who are not selected for that particular object, but who, coming in from administration to administration, one at a time, now of this party now of that, make a permanent mass of citizens, small in number, trained to the law, always here, and who, therefore, presumably would bring to the discharge of whatever duty you impose upon them the greatest amount of impartiality and respect for orderly government that could be found in any tribunal that might be selected.

That led us to think that whatever power it was necessary to repose anywhere in such a case had better be reposed in the Supreme Court of the United States. We were not blind to the fact that many objections can be stated to this. The most common one that I have heard is, "You are committing the liberties of the people to the decision of nine men," which is the number that now compose the court. Well, sir, if the liberties of the people must be committed in a government of law to the decision of somebody, is it not safer to commit them to the decision of nine men thus selected than it is to the decision of three hundred and seventy men, who are, from the very nature of their positions, Senators and Representatives, more or less partisans, and whose judgments, therefore, must be, be they as pure as human nature ever is or can be, affected by the views and wishes they entertain of what they would like to have done. It seemed to us, therefore, that this very argument as to danger to liberty and to the peace and security of the Government, the avoidance of despotism or aristocracy, or by whatever you may call those forms of government that steal the power of the people away from them, was much more strong for the security of liberty in having a question that must be decided by somebody decided by such a body, rather than by such another body as I have described.

There are various other objections, Mr. President, that can be urged which are entitled to more or less weight; but it appeared to the committee on the whole that the great mass of reasons in favor of this selection would countervail those that seemed to tend against it; and, as in all human affairs, we of course were entirely sensible that no scheme of government and no step in a scheme of government can be suggested to which there cannot be rightfully made some ground of philosophic or practical objection, and we are obliged in this imperfect world to put the objections and the reasons in favor of a thing fairly together, and give to that course the preponderance to which the general weight of reason seems to entitle it.

Then the question was, what sort of power should be confided to the Supreme Court, and that brings me somewhat nearly to the amendment to which my friend from Indiana objected. It appeared to us all, I think, that it was not desirable to give to the Supreme Court, or to any other tribunal that was to act upon this subject, the power of going into the several States and counting up the numbers of citizens who voted one way or another; it would be totally impracticable as a fact, and in my opinion totally wrong in principle upon any well-considered scheme of government; but to give them the power to take these certificates, or papers claiming to be certificates, as they should come from the authority of the several States, as they are now to be sent under the Constitution, and determine, having these papers before them, openly and publicly, as they hear and determine causes, that person President who has the greatest number of votes considered by the court to have been lawfully given and certified—electoral votes that are sent from the States. Now connect that with the present Constitution. The present Constitution says that there shall be a number of electors, appointed in such manner as the Legislatures of the several States shall direct, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives in Congress, and that those electors, so having been appointed, shall proceed to vote in a particular way and send forward their certificates. What, then, is committed to the Supreme Court to decide? Not whether one elector got more votes than another; but they are to find out, looking at the title which that elector claims to his office, whether, under the law of the State, he has been appointed an elector, leaving it to the State, just as now, to make the appointment and provide for it in its own manner and in its own way, and determine in its own manner and its own way whether the appointment had been made. Then it comes to the Supreme Court of the United States; and if a question arises as to whether the appointment of that elector is in accordance with law, whether he is the person whom the Constitution says the State shall appoint, and appoint in its own way, the Supreme Court ascertains it. They ascertain whether he is the person whom the Constitution of the United States says may hold such an office at all. If he be a Senator they find that he has not been appointed in accordance with the laws of the State and the Constitution of the United States. If they find that he has given a double vote, of course one of those votes at least cannot have been lawfully given.

Then we go on to say (which brings me to the amendment that my friend from Indiana questions the correctness of) that in doing this duty of canvassing these electoral votes—not the votes of citizens—the Supreme Court should disregard mere errors of form, and being guided by the preceding lines as to what their powers would be, in exercising those powers they should follow the right, adopting the substance or the language of the act of 1789 in respect to courts of law and of equity, disregarding matters of form where the substance of the law and justice require them to so disregard them. We did not think in proposing that, that we were giving an unlimited discretion to the Supreme Court of the United States, at all. We thought that we were only reposing in them that duty which, in every system of civilized jurisprudence that I know of, is imposed upon every court of judicature guided by the law as to the rights of parties, not to allow the form of procedure, or a defect in the form of procedure, to overthrow the very substance of the thing they are called upon to do. We thought that discretion might be safely, ought indeed to be, reposed in that body or any other that you are to select to do such a duty; for how painful would it be, Mr President, in a matter of this moment, a thousand times more than in the private cause of a private citizen, for this is the cause of all the citizens—how painful it would be for any tribunal, be it yourself, or this body, or the other House, or all three of them, to be obliged to reject the vote of a State known to have been fairly given, by an unquestioned and undisputed majority of free citizens, voting according to their own free will, and all of them voting, and whose votes have been counted out advisedly, fairly, and truly, and whose electors have attempted to perform, and have in substance performed, the duty that the Constitution has imposed upon them, but it happens when the paper gets here that it lacks a seal, or, as in the case of Arkansas, has the wrong seal, or something of that kind! I think that even if we had the power we should be inclined to stretch the point a good deal before we should lead ourselves to deny to a State this great right that it has, upon any such technicality as that. Perhaps we should be obliged to do it. I am not discussing that question. I am only saying that now making a scheme we thought it was desirable, and even essential to justice, and good order, and to peace, that this tribunal should be authorized, in the narrow and limited duty that is given to it, to stick to the substance rather than to the shadow; and so we have proposed this amendment.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator from Vermont permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAXEY. In 1837, if I remember correctly, a committee was appointed by the Senate, consisting of Mr. Grundy, Mr. Clay, and the third member I do not remember, on the very question——

Mr. BOGY. Mr. Wright.

Mr. MAXEY. On the very question of counting the vote of a disputed elector. At the conclusion of that report, with which the Senator is doubtless familiar, they recommend that permanent provision be made to meet a question of that kind. Now, while the Senator is on this subject, I should be very glad indeed to have his views on the question, whether or not permanent provision can be made to meet the question by an act of Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I am entirely familiar with the joint committee of which Mr. Grundy in the Senate and I believe Mr. Cambreleng in the House were the chairmen in 1837. That committee was appointed by a double resolution adopted at the same time, but a resolution of two parts. The first was the mere ceremonious appointment that had always taken place to arrange for the getting together of the two Houses. Then on motion of Mr. Clay there was added a resolution that that committee inquire into the expediency of ascertaining whether any of the persons that had acted as electors were in anywise constitutionally ineligible, and, if they were, what ought to be done about it, and so on, there being on that occasion, as it turned out by their report, some six or seven postmasters, pension agents, &c., who had voted for Mr. Van Buren. They made a report stating that that was the fact in substance. They said they had not taken proof of the identity of the individuals, but they had not any doubt about it; but they did not consider that it was material to the result of that election, as it was not, to determine what ought to be done about it. They said that of course it was a thing the Constitution did not tolerate and that something ought to be done about it; but, as it would not make any difference at that particular time, they proposed to do something about it at some other time when the people should have performed, as they already had indeed, what they were told not to perform, and the votes were here to be counted, and they were counted without any apparent objection on the part of anybody, and they did recommend, in the very language almost of the Senator, a permanent provision; but they did not say in their report, and appeared to be careful not to say, what they thought the form of that permanent provision ought to be nor where the power resided to make it.

Mr. MAXEY. That was precisely the point. They simply recommended that permanent provision should be made, but made no suggestion. Now I should like to have the benefit of the Senator's judgment whether or not it can be done.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They did not suggest the power that was capable of making that permanent provision. They were entirely shy upon the subject whether Mr. Pinckney in 1800 was right or whether the opposition to his views were right in reference to the power of Congress over the matter at all. They said it was evident that a permanent provision ought to be made; but just at that time, when the very event had occurred, as they found, which required a permanent provision and which showed how difficult, not to say dangerous, such a question might become, they passed it silently by, merely saying that there ought to be a permanent provision made sometime by somebody. Now the Senator wishes my opinion, Mr. President. I stated when I began this statement of mine, which has been longer than I intended it to be, that I had wished and I thought the committee when we reported this resolution had wished, that the merits of this constitutional amendment might be considered independently of any individual views that any Senators might have in respect of where the power at present resides, or whether there is a complete legislative remedy for it or not, for the reason that in all those respects, first as to where the power resides, if there be one, and second whether a legislative provision can be made in respect to regulating its exercise even, there always has been and there undoubtedly is now a difference of opinion. We could not find out, in the sense of a general concurrence of gentlemen of all parties, what the Constitution does mean; and it appeared to us that it would not help the consideration of this subject to go into a discussion, either by a written report or otherwise, of what probably on the whole might appear to a majority of the committee the true view of the present Constitution to be. It appeared to us that there was enough, more than enough, to move this body to deliberate diligence in acting upon this one way or the other, in the circumstance that in the minds of many men having equal means of information there is a wide difference of opinion, and of course I think we should all agree that a question of this importance ought not to be left to changing interpretations, as they would be if you fix it by legislation, as parties and sentiments change from time to time, and still more to changing interpretations without a law, which might be largely affected by the particular emergency when it was to be decided.

So it appeared to us, to sum it all up, that it was desirable that the Constitution itself should speak, independent of all parties and seasons of heat, above legislation, and speak to a tribunal that existed permanently under the Constitution itself, its powers measured and defined, and rendered itself absolutely impartial in respect of interest in the matter by the additional section (to which I now have only to refer upon the substance of it) which provides that:

No person holding the office of a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States shall be eligible to be elected as President or Vice-President until the expiration of two years next after he shall have ceased to be such justice.

That removes from that august tribunal any such ambition as it is said has sometimes led some of its members, without their consciousness of course, to decisions upon topics verging into political considerations differing from that which they otherwise might have held and which has led, in public estimation sometimes, that court or some members of it not to have that high respect and confidence that their merits as citizens and their learning as lawyers and judges would otherwise have entitled them to.

There only follows, Mr. President, before I sit down, so far as I have anything to say, the amendment which I proposed to offer on my own responsibility, and not that of the committee, which simply provides that:

This article—

That is all that precedes—shall, if it be ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States on or before the 1st day of February, A. D. 1877, operate upon the opening and counting of the votes and the ascertaining and declaring the result of the last election by the Supreme Court; and in case of such ratification the President of the Senate shall deliver all the lists of votes, certificates, packages, and papers in his possession relating to the election of President and Vice-President for the term beginning on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1877, to the Presiding Justice of the Supreme Court, to be proceeded with as in this article provided.

As I have said, this proposition is not formed for this occasion, but for all the future until some better means can be found; for, even if the proposition of my friend from Indiana, to change the method of election, were to be adopted, and the people were to vote directly, there must still be somewhere a method of consolidating all those votes and getting them together, and determining such disputes as may lawfully arise, and which must be lawfully determined. I do not say that in such an event as the adoption of his proposition the exact language of this amendment, as it now stands, would cover it, because this speaks of electoral votes; but I do say that if such a proposition as his were to be adopted there must be, at last, some power to have the votes and returns all brought together, and the result ascertained, in some way. As I have said, Mr. President, this last amendment offered by me is designed to apply this constitutional amendment, if adopted in season, to the existing state of affairs, which I am sure gentlemen of all parties will say is not a pleasant state of affairs. I do not share in what is so often said and reported to be said by people who ought not to say it, that there is any serious danger of a civil convulsion of force in this Republic. There ought not to be any such danger. There will not be any such result unless it be driven by the excitements produced by men who care more for what they can make out of the fortunes or misfortunes of their country than they do for its peace and good order, followed under the methods of the law; for if it were possible to imagine that the two Houses of Congress cannot agree, if they have any power to agree, upon what shall be the result of this last election, it does not follow that wise men and patriotic men will feel called upon immediately to resort to their muskets. There will be some peaceable and just way out of such a difficulty, as there ought to be, and in society well regulated there always is out of what are apparently irreconcilable difficulties between private citizens. I do not think, therefore, that the good sense of this nation and its love of law will allow its peace to be imperiled out of any dispute that can arise between two men and their friends as to which of them is for four years to appoint the postmasters and sign the appropriation bills. Somewhere under the Constitution there will be found a power broad enough, serene enough, and majestic enough to settle by peaceable and lawful methods any such contingency; but, nevertheless, that circumstance is not an argument against our going on, if this proposition be right, without it. It is extremely desirable to avoid entering upon an unknown and untried path, although our faith in the Constitution and in Providence may not lead us to believe, as it does me, that it will finally be a way of pleasantness, and a path of peace.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I am sorry for one that this debate is precipitated upon the Senate at this time. I have not carefully considered this particular proposition until this morning; but I have been studying this subject more or less for five or six years, and I have very decided opinions in regard to it.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] says we are not now to adopt a proposition for a particular occasion, but one for all time. In that point of view we ought to be very sure that this proposition is the true one, and one under which we can afford to live for all time; and we may rest assured that if we adopt this constitutional amendment no other one will be adopted for many years to come, until some sad accident or disaster to the country shall have forced a new one upon us.

Mr. President, there are in my mind a number of fatal objections to this amendment. In the first place, it is proposed to transfer the counting of the vote to the Supreme Court, giving to that court very plenary power. That makes it a political body; it makes it the great returning board of the Government; and, though its decision may be conducted with entire purity and integrity, it will be placed in a position where its motives will always be impugned. I insist that no returning board in any State that has ample powers given to it can so discharge its duties as not to be subjected to the severest abuse and condemnation; and when you vest the Supreme Court of the United States with this great power of determining who shall be the President of the United States and what party shall have the administration of this Government for four years, and perhaps for many years, you make it subject to political influences, and you give its members political powers which must excite their ambition and hopes.

It is true one clause of this amendment provides that supreme judges shall be ineligible to be elected President or Vice-President until two years after they have resigned. A supreme judge who may have had the casting vote in the court in determining who shall be President could lay the foundation for future candidacy by resigning at the end of two years after that time. We may say that is not very probable, but it is made possible under this proposition.

I call the attention of the members of the Senate to this proposition. It is a re-enactment of the twelfth article of the amendments with just three changes. First, it requires that the electors shall vote viva voce and not by ballot. In the next place, it transfers the count of the votes to the Supreme Court. In the third place, it provides that the supreme judges shall be ineligible to be President or Vice-President within two years after their resignation. It is the re-enactment of the twelfth article of the amendments with these changes. It leaves the electoral college with all its abuses. Now, I do not believe that though we propose it ever so much the people of these United States will ever re-enact the electoral college. It has wholly failed to answer the purpose for which it was created. Its office has been exactly the reverse of what it was intended to be by the framers of the Constitution. It is full of dangers and troubles, some of which are now at our very door, and which are not removed at all by this proposed amendment. I say it leaves this rubbish of the electoral college, this rock in the channel upon which we are more likely to split than any other. This joint resolution does not take away the dangers; it does not take away the difficulties. It simply transfers the count to the Supreme Court, but it leaves this electoral difficulty, obstacle, and danger, with all its terrors, just as we have it now.

Mr. President, two years ago I had the honor to report to this body from a committee upon this very subject, and I want to read to you an extract from my report which expresses my views better than I can do it to-day:

> There is imminent danger of revolution to the nation whenever the result of a presidential election is to be determined by the vote of a State in which the choice of electors has been irregular or is alleged to have been carried by fraud or violence, and where there is no method of having these questions examined and settled in advance—where the choice of President depends upon the election in a State which has been publicly characterized by fraud or violence, and in which one party is alleged to have triumphed and secured the certificates of election by chicanery or the fraudulent interposition of courts.

It seems to me this fits what has happened within the last six weeks very well.

> Such a President would in advance be shorn of his moral power and authority in his office, would be looked upon as a usurper, and the consequences that would result from such a state of things no man can predict. But it may be compared to what has so often occurred in history, where the successor to the crown in a monarchy was believed by a large part of the nation to be illegitimate, or not to be rightfully entitled thereto under the laws or usages of the nation.

Again in speaking on this subject I said:

> The more complicated the machinery is, whether in politics or in the arts, the more liable it is to get out of order. In the complex system of electing a President which we now have, contingencies may arise which cannot be foreseen, which may lead to civil war and disaster. The simpler the machinery of government, the more easily it is understood and the less liable to accident.
> Not only has the result been that the electors are not left free to select a President and Vice-President, they being in all instances pledged in advance, but it has unquestionably been a blessing that this has been so, for experience has demonstrated that small bodies of men intrusted with such vast powers as the choice of the Chief Magistrate of the Republic are liable to the arts of corruption, cabal, and intrigue, while the great body of the people cannot be reached in that way.
> Mr. Benton once declared that "the only effectual mode of preserving our Government from the corruptions which have undermined the liberty of so many nations is to confide the election of our Chief Magistrate to those who are furthest removed from the influence of his patronage; that is, to the whole body of American citizens." His patronage would be ample to reach every elector in every State, but it cannot reach the whole body of the people. This danger has in effect been avoided by pledging the electors in advance to vote for particular persons. But this pledge in advance defeats the very purpose for which the electoral college was created, and converts it into a body of agents, who are to execute their powers according to strict instructions given before their appointment.
> The electoral colleges have turned out to be wholly useless. Every reason given for their original establishment has absolutely failed in practice. But while they are powerless for good, they may be potent for evil. In their election errors may easily be committed, and in very many instances have been. While nobody would mistake the name of Grant or Greeley, changes in the names on the long list of electors may occur from errors in printing or fraud sufficient to reverse the vote of a State.

We have recently had cases where through errors the names of some of the electors were left off, and others where they were ineligible. People never know the electors, they care nothing about them. They are perfectly indifferent as to who they are; they are persons pledged in advance to execute a certain trust and hence their names are sometimes left off; they are often mispriuted, and persons are put on who are ineligible because nobody attaches any importance to it, and their ineligible condition is not known perhaps until after the election takes place.

Mr. SHERMAN. Their names are usually not printed until the tickets are printed?

Mr. MORTON. No, sir, the names of the electors are not usually printed until the tickets are printed. Now, to show the absurdity of the whole electoral business, I may refer to the vote of Kentucky. I do not see the Kentucky Senators here. I believe in Kentucky they vote viva voce. The practice has been, I believe, when a voter comes to vote, to say, "I vote for Tilden and Hendricks," or "I vote for Hayes and Wheeler." He never mentions the names of the electors; they are not known; probably he never heard of them; and then the clerk of the election puts down one for each one of these electors. That is the way, as I am advised, the election was conducted in Kentucky the other day; and it shows the absurdity of the whole business.

If you submit to the people of this country at this time the question of re-enacting, for that is what this proposed amendment does, the electoral college without a single improvement except to require them to vote viva voce instead of by ballot, I do not believe they will ever ratify that amendment. I doubt whether you can find five States that will agree to it. I think the current of public opinion is now that this electoral college is a total failure, that it is dangerous, and that it ought to be abolished. It is not a party question. It is above all party questions. It is a system full of danger to this country. It is antirepublican, antidemocratic in the true sense of the word.

As the law now stands I cannot vote for a man for President that I want. I can only vote for some men as electors and if there are not enough men of my way of thinking to have a convention and nominate electors and put them into the field, I cannot vote at all. In other words it makes the caucus indispensable; it makes the convention necessary to enable me to vote. If I want to vote for my friend from Illinois, [Mr. OGLESBY,] I cannot do it unless there are enough men in my State to come together in a convention and nominate fifteen electors who are pledged to vote for him. We saw the way that operated in 1860. While there were men scattered all through the South who wanted to vote for Mr. Lincoln they could not do it; there were no electoral tickets formed. Men did not dare to come together in conventions to form electoral tickets, and the men who wanted to vote for Mr. Lincoln in the South could not do it because there were no electors put in nomination for them to vote for. It might be that a man would get a strong vote in some sections of the country or in a particular State, and perhaps none in another. He might not have friends enough in that State to come together and form an electoral ticket, and yet he might have many friends who wanted to vote for him, while perhaps he was strong in other States; and thus he is deprived of that vote and they are deprived of the right to vote. In other words, no man can vote for President until first there has been a convention or a caucus of some kind that has put an electoral ticket in nomination.

The original purpose of the electoral college was to form a body of independent, intelligent men, who should come together and deliberate and elect a President. The theory of the electoral college was that they were to be wholly uncommitted, left perfectly free, and to enable them to be independent the Constitution provided that they were to vote by ballot, so that one elector should not let another one know how he voted, that he might give a vote in strict secrecy even so far as his colleagues were concerned. That was the theory of it and the purpose of it, but that purpose is entirely destroyed by this amendment, which requires that they shall vote viva voce, so that it may be known how they vote. I confess if you have it at all you might as well have it that way, because the original purpose has failed, for in every instance these men are committed in advance. It would be infamy to a man to violate his pledge and vote for a different candidate.

I will not take the time this morning to go over all the dangers and all the evils of this system. I may perhaps before this discussion is over take another opportunity. But now I want to call the attention of my friend from Vermont to another part of his joint resolution, and that is that it re-enacts the election of a President by the House. If no one gets a majority of all the electors appointed, then the election goes to the House and the House votes by States. It is a re-enactment of the old system, and I say now that in my opinion the election of a President by the House of Representatives is the most dangerous provision in the Constitution of the United States. It is not republican in any sense. It gives the State of Nevada, with 42,000 people, the same voice in electing a President that New York with one hundred and fourteen times the amount has got. It does not express the sentiments of the people.

Suppose now that we fail to elect the next President by the people, if you please; that the election goes to the House and they will elect the President. That body is composed of members elected two years ago who do not represent the sentiment of the country to-day at all, members who would not be returned and many of whom were not returned at the last election. The election would devolve upon members of Congress two years old who do not represent, perhaps, the sentiment of the country at all; and who would elect a President directly opposed to the sentiment of the great body of the people. It is a burlesque to talk about that being an election by the people. I would like to call the attention of the Senate to some of the dangers attending an election by the House of Representatives, for now, mark you, we are called upon to re-enact and again declare in favor of the monstrosity of electing a President by the House of Representatives. If we come to look at the history of that clause in the Constitution we will find that it was the last one put there, and that it was put there, as it turned out, without deliberation and without debate, after they had puzzled themselves, I believe for weeks, in order to contrive some method of electing a President.

In the first place we came near making shipwreck, at least once by this method of electing a President, in 1801, when they balloted, I think up to the thirty-seventh ballot, some eleven or twelve days, and there was danger of an interregnum; they were approaching the 4th of March. We know the influences resorted to finally to bring about the result that was obtained. We know that practices were resorted to, and that pledges and promises were given which finally brought about that result, which would utterly damn any political man, any statesman, at the present day. We have heard much said about the American people having become corrupt and about the degeneracy of public morals, but I say to you that the arts which were resorted to in order to bring about the election of Mr. Jefferson in 1801 would utterly damn any public man of this day.

The plan of electing a President by electors or by the House of Representatives presents the strongest inducements for corruption where you bring it down to the election by a few men who are entirely within the power of the patronage of the candidate, a number so small that all can get offices, and big offices, and where one man, or half a dozen men, have the balance of the power in their hands, and can change the vote of a great State or of a small State. Consider what temptations they are under; what temptations there are to buy them; what temptations they have to sell. We expose our public men to corruption and to temptation by presenting to them this opportunity. It was so in 1801, when a President was elected upon a pledge made by him that three men should be continued in their offices, and that certain other measures should be adopted that the parties prescribed in advance.

How about the electors? The election of the President is referred to a few men. It may turn out that one man has the result in his hands. That has happened very lately. What enormous temptations to buy! Nothing but the infamy of a man betraying the party that elected him will secure us from that kind of danger; and yet that very pledge in advance is in direct violation of the theory of the electoral college, because the theory was that they were to be independent and uncommitted: an independent body of men who should meet together without pledges and there elect the best man to be President. That is the theory upon which that college was created, but it has turned out that they were all pledged in advance, and that pledge in advance is all the security this Government has against the purchase or the sale of electors. Whether it will always be sufficient, I do not know.

Mr. President, I want to show to you very briefly some of the dangers and the inequalities and something of the injustice of electing a President by the House of Representatives, each State to have one vote. We are now called upon to pass upon this proposition again. We are, at the end of a hundred years, required now to indorse this most unequal, iniquitous, and dangerous system of electing a President of the United States. I have entertained these sentiments for years and I will read what I said upon a former occasion, for I cannot put it in better language to-day:

In the election of a President in the House of Representatives under the present apportionment, each State having one vote, forty-five members out of the two hundred and ninety-two may make the election, as follows:

Forty-five members—

Delaware, Nebraska, Nevada, and Oregon have each one member, and four members would cast the votes of those four States; Rhode Island and Florida have each two, and four members would cast the votes of those States; Minnesota, New Hampshire, West Virginia, Vermont, and Kansas have each three members, and two votes in each, or ten members; in all five, would cast the votes of those five States; Arkansas, California, and Connecticut have four members each, and three in each, or nine in all, may cast their votes; Maine and South Carolina have each five members, three of whom in each, or six in both, may cast their two votes; Maryland, Mississippi, and Texas have each six members, and four in each, or twelve in all, may cast the votes of those three States. This makes nineteen States, or a majority of the States in the Union, and forty-five members may cast their votes and elect a President of the United States against the wishes of the other two hundred and forty-seven members of the House of Representatives. Again, these nineteen States have an aggregate population by the census of 1870 of a fraction over eight millions of people, while the remaining eighteen States have an aggregate population of about thirty millions. So that nineteen States, having scarce more than one-fifth of the entire population of the United States, may elect a President in the House of Representatives against the wishes of the other four-fifths; and this, by courtesy, has been called republican government!

Such a combination and result as above exhibited may not be likely to occur; but they are possible under the present system of electing a President in the House of Representatives by a majority of States; and no system admitting such possibilities should be tolerated. In 1825 it did happen that Mr. Adams was elected in the House over General Jackson, who had received a larger proportional majority of the popular vote than has any President elected since that time; and who had also a large plurality of the electoral votes.

There is always danger to a country in an injustice in its institutions, and the danger increases as the injustice is aggravated.

When the smallest State is made equal to the largest in the choice of the President of the United States, the gross inequality becomes offensive, and must become dangerous to the country whenever the power is exercised. Surely every patriot who looks forward with anxiety to the future peace and perpetuity of the Republic must earnestly pray that it may never again be exposed to the trial of electing a President by the House of Representatives under the present provision of the Constitution; and, most of all, should the small States ask to be delivered from the exercise of a power so grossly unequal and offensive.

Another absurdity in the election of a President by States in the House of Representatives is found in the fact that the election is to be had by members elected two years before, without reference to the election of President.

Members not elected for that purpose, not chosen by the people with a view to the election of the President, members chosen perhaps upon some local and temporary issue which has passed away, members chosen two years ago, who would not, as we now know, a large portion of them, be returned to the next Congress.

If there is any use in having a President elected every four years, it is that the public sentiment of the country may find expression; that a man may be chosen to represent that sentiment; but when the election is committed to the members of the House, who were elected two years before, and whose political sentiments may have been expressly repudiated at the last election, we can understand how completely this system is calculated to baffle and defeat the popular will.

Two years ago I had the honor to report from a committee the following proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Secretary read as follows:

As a substitute for the foregoing provisions, the committee propose the following joint resolution:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of each House concurring therein,) That the following article is hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as a part of the Constitution, to wit:

"ARTICLE —.

"I. The President and Vice-President shall be elected by the direct vote of the people in the manner following: Each State shall be divided into districts, equal in number to the number of Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress, to be composed of contiguous territory, and to be as nearly equal in population as may be; and the person having the highest number of votes in each district for President shall receive the vote of that district, which shall count one presidential vote.

"II. The person having the highest number of votes for President in a State shall receive two presidential votes from the State at large.

"III. The person having the highest number of presidential votes in the United States shall be President.

"IV. If two persons have the same number of votes in any State, it being the highest number, they shall receive each one presidential vote from the State at large; and if more than two persons shall have each the same number of votes in any State, it being the highest number, no presidential vote shall be counted from the State at large. If more persons than one shall have the same number of votes, it being the highest number in any district, no presidential vote shall be counted from that district.

"V. The foregoing provisions shall apply to the election of Vice-President.

"VI. The Congress shall have power to provide for holding and conducting the elections of President and Vice-President, and to establish tribunals for the decision of such elections as may be contested."

"VII. The States shall be divided into districts by the Legislatures thereof, but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter the same."

Mr. MORTON. In my opinion any amendment that is made upon this subject ought to refer the election of a President directly to the people, and provide that any man can vote for any man as his candidate without being under the necessity of first having a convention and putting electors in the field, who may cheat him, or in regard to whom errors or mistakes may be made. All that machinery has been shown to be utterly worthless and entirely dangerous; but now, at the end of a hundred years, we are called upon to re-enact it, and what is worse to re-enact this terrible mockery of an election by the House of Representatives.

I have a calculation here in regard to the electoral college by which I showed upon a former occasion that the electoral college had never come within 16 per cent. of representing the popular vote, and had differed from it more than 37 per cent. It does not represent the popular vote. Under the present system of general tickets in the States a majority of one may carry the vote of the State of New York and throw it all in one direction to the entire subversion of any representation on the part of the minority. Then the minority is not represented. A great fraud in one place will carry the vote of the State and control the whole State, as in 1868 a great fraud in the city of New York carried the vote of that State for Seymour, when it is well known, as has been demonstrated since that time, that but for that fraud the vote of the State would have been given for Grant. That fraud all occurred in the space of two miles square. Outside of the city the republicans elected nineteen members of Congress, but the votes were overcome by a single fraud committed in the city of New York.

I should much prefer, so far as I am concerned, to elect the President by a direct vote of the people, without regard to State lines, but I am satisfied the smaller States would never agree to that proposition. Therefore, I proposed this amendment which was reported by the committee. I have proposed that the States should be laid off into districts, equal in number to the congressional districts, and to be of contiguous territory, as nearly as possible of the same population; that the man who gets the highest vote of a particular district for President shall have one vote; that the people shall vote for him directly, and the man who gets the most votes in that district gets the vote of the district, and that counts one. Then to preserve the autonomy of the States, so that the smaller States should not lose the power they now have, it was proposed that the man who got the largest number of votes in the State at large should have two votes from the State at large, representing the senatorial electors now; but they shall be given to the man who has got the most votes in the State at large. This is the nearest that we can come to a direct election by the whole mass of the people.

Mr. OGLESBY. May I ask the Senator from Indiana a question on that point?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. OGLESBY. Has the honorable Senator made any provision either in his proposed amendment to the Constitution or by a mental reservation for settling contests between electors in the States under the plan which he now suggests?

Mr. MORTON. I will state to my friend from Illinois that in this proposed amendment the sixth section reads as follows:

> The Congress shall have power to provide for holding and conducting the elections of President and Vice-President, and to establish tribunals for the decision of such elections as may be contested.

You could not put the particular method into the Constitution; it would be too tedious; but we give to Congress here the power to pass a general law applicable to all the States providing for holding the election; that they shall be under the control of the national Government, that is, under the protection and direction of it, and that they shall provide a tribunal to decide all contests that may arise in a particular State or district as to the question of who is elected. It would thus enable Congress to provide a carefully considered law regulating the whole matter, just as the States now regulate the contests of elections for governors and other subordinate officers. We could not put the specific provision into the amendment because it was too tedious and involved too many details; but we authorize Congress to provide for it by law. As the matter now stands there is no law in any State for contesting the election of electors. The election may have been obtained by fraud or by violence; but there is no law except in those States where they have returning boards that can canvass and pass upon elections which are alleged to have been brought about by fraud or violence.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I assume that it is not proposed to come to a vote upon this amendment to-day; and if I shall vote in favor of it, of which I have some doubts, I wish here to say that I do not intend by such vote to indicate that in my opinion Congress has not now, without any amendment, full power to legislate on this subject.

I suppose that we will all agree to this one proposition, namely, that the Constitution confers upon the General Government the power to count the vote. To that proposition there should be no dissent.

If the Constitution directs how and by whom that vote shall be counted and we wish to change the Constitution in that regard, an amendment is of course necessary.

If the Constitution does not say how or by whom that power, which is clearly conferred on the General Government, shall be executed, we do not need a constitutional amendment to enable us to determine how the vote is to be counted; that we can effect by legislation. Therefore, at the very threshold of the inquiry whether this amendment is necessary, we meet the question whether the Constitution has specified how and by whom the vote should be counted.

What the Constitution says on the subject is that "the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted."

It seems to me that a convention of men who knew how to use the English language, and who wanted to employ such an expression as would merely confer a power upon the General Government without designating by whom or how the power was to be executed, leaving that to legislation, could hardly have employed more appropriate words than these, "and the vote shall then be counted." The power of counting the vote as conferred by the Constitution upon Congress is simply a power to legislate on that subject.

There was no necessity whatever that the Constitution should have provided as it does, that—

> The Congress shall have power * * * to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or officer thereof.

There was no necessity in having that provision in the Constitution. It is merely declaratory of powers which would have existed without the provision by simply conferring a power upon Congress. There was no necessity in making the amendments to the Constitution that we should have provided that Congress should have power by appropriate legislation to enforce the foregoing amendment. On that point let me read from Story on the Constitution. In speaking of the clause which I have read, to wit, the provision that Congress may pass all necessary and proper laws for carrying into effect the powers granted by the Constitution, Story says:

> This clause is merely declaratory of a truth which would have resulted by necessary implication from the act of establishing a National Government and investing it with certain powers. If a power to do a thing is given, it includes the use of the means necessary and proper to execute it. If it includes any such means, it includes all such means; for none can, more correctly than others, be said exclusively to appertain to the power, and the choice must depend upon circumstances, to be judged of by Congress.

And further on he says:

> If it should be asked why, then, was the clause inserted in the Constitution, the answer is, that it is peculiarly useful, in order to avoid any doubt, which ingenuity or jealousy might raise upon the subject. There was also a clause in the Articles of Confederation, which restrained the authority of Congress to powers expressly granted, and, therefore, it was highly expedient to make an explicit declaration that that rule of interpretation, which had been the source of endless embarrassments under the confederation, should no longer prevail.

So that the mere granting to Congress a power carries with it the right fully to legislate in reference to that power. And if this Congress is invested simply with the power to count the vote and is not restricted as how the count shall be made, it is invested with the power to adopt all necessary and proper legislation to effectuate that end. If, however, the power to count the vote is conferred upon the two Houses, or if it is conferred upon the President of the Senate, and we wish to change that procedure, then I admit that an amendment to the Constitution is necessary so as to vary the existing fundamental law. Therefore, to my mind, the very first question to be settled is that which I think was avoided in the otherwise very clear and able statement of the question made by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I want to read an extract from my report which I omitted, and I should be glad to have the attention of Senators to what it contains:

> The following statement of the result in the different presidential elections from 1872 back to 1844 will establish the truth of what we have said:
> In 1872 General Grant received 55 per cent. of the votes of the people; in the electoral college he received 84 per cent.
> In 1868 General Grant received 52 per cent. of the popular vote, and 73 per cent. of the electoral vote.
> In 1864 Mr. Lincoln received 55 per cent. of the popular vote, and 91 per cent. of the electoral vote.
> In 1860 Mr. Lincoln received only 40 per cent. of the popular vote; he received 59 per cent. of the electoral vote.
> In 1856 Mr. Buchanan received only 45 per cent. of the popular vote; he received 59 per cent. of the electoral vote.
> In this election Fillmore received 25 per cent. of the popular vote, and only 2 per cent. of the electoral vote; but fourteen of his friends were elected to Congress.
> In 1852 Pierce received 51 per cent. of the popular vote, and 85 per cent. of the electoral vote.
> In 1848 General Taylor received 47 per cent. of the popular vote, and 56 per cent. of the electoral vote. At this election Mr. Van Buren received about 10 per cent. of the popular vote, and received no electoral vote; but three of his friends were elected to the House of Representatives.
> In 1844 Mr. Polk received not quite 50 per cent. of the popular vote. He received 62 per cent. of the electoral vote.
> To illustrate the operation of the district system, we will consider the comparative results of the elections for President and for members of Congress, in the four States of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, from 1860 to 1872.
> These States voted solidly for Mr. Lincoln in 1860, casting 74 electoral votes. At the same election they returned 66 members of Congress, of whom 24 were democrats.
> In 1864 the same States cast 76 electoral votes for Mr. Lincoln again, and elected the same year 68 members of Congress, of whom 16 were democrats.
> In 1868 the same States threw 76 electoral votes solidly for General Grant, and elected 68 members of Congress, of whom 22 were democrats.
> In 1872 the same States again voted solidly, giving 85 electoral votes to General Grant, and elected 71 members of Congress, of whom 25 were democrats.
> In these four States the democratic strength, as compared with the republican, has been about as 9 to 10, but under the operation of the general-ticket system they had been wholly unrepresented in the electoral college; but in the House of Representatives, under the district system, they have had an average of nearly one-third of the members.
> Take the State of New York alone for the same period. In 1860 New York cast her 35 electoral votes solidly for Mr. Lincoln. At the same time she elected 33 members of Congress, of whom 9 were democrats.

I simply read this to show how utterly the electoral college comes short of representing the body of the people or the public sentiment of the whole nation.

Mr. MERRIMON. I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana how the plan reported by him, the substitute which he offers, obviates the difficulty of giving the small States too large a power in the election of President. Take for example the case of Colorado. Suppose the people vote directly for President under the plan proposed by the Senator, Colorado would have the same power and weight in the election of President as now. The only difference would be that each congressional district under the Senator's plan would elect an elector to suit its wishes.

Mr. MORTON. Not an elector.

Mr. MERRIMON. Not an elector, but each district would count one vote.

Mr. MORTON. Colorado would have three votes. She would have two votes for the State at large, now represented by the senatorial electors, and she would have one vote representing her Representative; but the votes would be cast directly by the people. The people would vote for the candidate directly.

Mr. MERRIMON. Still the State would have the same weight in the election that it has now?

Mr. MORTON. That is what I say, the State would have the same relative weight, according to her population.

Mr. MERRIMON. Then I put it to the Senator whether it is not true that the State may provide that the electors for President shall be elected just as he provides that the people shall give three votes in Colorado?

Mr. MORTON. No, sir. The State may provide how the electors shall be chosen. The Constitution provides that they shall be chosen as the Legislature directs, and the Legislature may refer the matter to the people or they may choose these electors themselves, as was done by South Carolina up to the time of the war.

Mr. MERRIMON. The point I make is that it is perfectly competent now for the Legislature to provide that each congressional district in the State shall elect its own elector. Then I want to ask the Senator another question. Suppose under the plan that he proposes no candidate shall receive a majority of all the votes of the several States, how does he propose to solve that difficulty?

Mr. MORTON. It is proposed in that case to let the man who has the plurality of votes be elected. We propose to adopt that rule in regard to the President of the United States that is now adopted in every State of the Union but one or two, perhaps. I think there are one or two States where the governor is required to receive a majority of the votes cast; but in all the other States a plurality elects. In those few New England States, I think New Hampshire is one, where the governor is required to receive a majority of all the votes, if he fails to do that, it is then referred to the Legislature; but in Indiana, in North Carolina I believe, and in every other State the candidate for governor who has a plurality is elected; so is the candidate for Congress; so is the candidate for supreme judge. No trouble has ever come out of it. But this proposition is, because a candidate fails to get a majority of all the electors appointed, or of all the presidential votes, then he is not elected and it must go to some tribunal that does not represent the people at all. Take for example the case of the election of John Quincy Adams by the House of Representatives. General Jackson got the largest proportion of the popular vote ever given to any President before or since that time except in the first election of General Washington. He not only had the largest popular majority as compared with Mr. Adams, but he had a large plurality of the electoral college; yet the election was thrown into the House of Representatives. It was alleged that a bargain was made; I presume that is not so; but the popular belief was that a bargain was made; and the men who were inculpated in that bargain never recovered from that belief. It is said that the result of that bargain decided the result of the presidential election in the House in 1825. It is known that a bargain decided the result of the election in 1801.

Mr. MERRIMON. Then under your plan a candidate receiving, it might be, a considerable minority, could be elected?

Mr. MORTON. It would be a plurality.

Mr. MERRIMON. That might be a large minority.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator from Indiana what his plan would be in the case, acting upon the plurality system, where two candidates had an equal and still the highest number of votes, but neither a majority?

Mr. MORTON. I am glad my friend has called my attention to that point, because we provided for it as near as we could. In the consideration of that question, which was, perhaps, one of the chief difficulties of the committee, we provided:

IV. If two persons have the same number of votes in any State—

That is, two presidential votes for the State at large—

If two persons have the same number of votes in any State, it being the highest number, they shall receive each one presidential vote from the State at large.

Suppose there are two candidates for President and there is a tie in the State, then each one has a presidential vote for the State at large:

And if more than two persons shall have each the same number of votes in any State, it being the highest number, no presidential vote shall be counted from the State at large.

Suppose there are three candidates and each receives the same number of votes in the State of Indiana, then neither of them gets any benefit from the vote of the State at large:

If more persons than one shall have the same number of votes, it being the highest number in any district, no presidential vote shall be counted from that district.

In other words, if the vote for two or three candidates is a tie in a district, then the vote is not given to anybody because you cannot divide up the vote. The district has but one vote, and therefore if two or three persons have a tie vote in that district no vote is counted from that district; but if two persons have a tie vote in the State at large, inasmuch as the State at large has two votes, then each one can get a vote.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That I can understand, but that does not reach the point I was asking about. Suppose when you have got the votes of all the districts and the States together in districts and States where there was no tie, on the plurality system, and when you foot them all up by somebody somewhere, there is a tie between two candidates for President on all the votes, what are you going to do then?

Mr. MORTON. I do not know whether this amendment provides for that contingency or not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the contingency that caused the disturbance in 1801.

Mr. MERRIMON. If the Senator from Vermont will allow me——

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator from North Carolina will be kind enough to wait a moment until I hear the answer from my friend from Indiana; I do not ask this question for the purpose of controversy or debate, but to get at the idea that my friend's report is supposed to contain.

Mr. MORTON. Since my friend speaks of it and I come to think about it, the reason of the committee was that that difficulty can always be avoided by taking an unequal number of districts, that is to say that there shall not be three hundred, but three hundred and one or two hundred and ninety-nine.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I respectfully submit that would not solve the difficulty because in the scheme that has been already stated about ties in districts it would happen in the course of chances, it might happen every time, that the number of votes actually got, the number of districts actually having a voice, taking out those where there is a tie between the highest, and where there would be no vote at all, would be perfectly even. Then you run right into the difficulty that exists under the present system, if you call it a difficulty; but there the Constitution does provide for a mode of solving it, and that is by the representatives of the people in the House of Representatives acting as the representatives of States in that respect, which was an idea that entered into the very groundwork of this Government—the rights of States, political communities, and not the old Athenian democracy that vibrated from the wildest excess of democracy to the severest tyranny of kings or tyrants, but a Government of co-ordinating and co-checking powers. That body of men are selected in that emergency to make the selection. It may be in a given case that they do not represent what is called the popular majority at that particular moment. They may represent what was the popular majority two years before and what turns out to be the popular majority two years afterward. You cannot tell, because you do not know, in a free and democratic country and in an intelligent country, as light increases and wisdom is gained by experience, how often people will change their opinions. Therefore I submit to my friend, without going into an argument about it now, the objection that he makes that it is monstrous that the House of Representatives should be authorized to fill the office of President for four years, voting by States, because the persons voting on the particular February may not be the sort of people whom a majority of the people at the last election have elected members of the next Congress, does not prove anything; because the very fact implied in his observation that the will of the people has changed also implies (if you are not to have a pure democracy where every day the change of the will of the people is a change of the Government) that in another year or two the judgment of the people as to the selection of their public servants will again change, so that on the whole, in the average of twenty years, you have got the average of the public sentiment of all the people.

Mr. MERRIMON. I regret that about a matter of so much moment the Judiciary Committee did not deem it necessary to make a written report upon this proposed amendment to the Constitution. I hope therefore that the chairman of the committee will allow me to trouble him with one or two questions explanatory of it. I beg to ask him whether or not it is understood by this provision touching the Supreme Court that any other than ministerial powers are conferred upon the court, or whether they are to exercise judicial powers. In order to make the point of my question more plain, I will suppose that the electors in the electoral college or any of them should be bribed to vote for one person or another, or suppose they or any of them should be intimidated. In that case am I to understand that the Supreme Court is charged with power to inquire into that question and determine as the right may be, or must they simply count the vote and certify it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I cannot speak for the committee, because this matter was reported so long ago that I do not remember the particular views of the committee upon exactly such a case as my friend has stated. I will answer that I believed myself, and I think the committee believed, that we did give to the Supreme Court more than ministerial powers in the strict sense of that term. We used the language:

And the person having the greatest number of votes for President, considered by the court to have been lawfully given and certified, shall be the President.

Consideration implies judgment, deliberation. Therefore I should say that the court have a ministerial duty. It is claimed that in this body or in its Presiding Officer, or somewhere under the present Constitution, there is only the duty to count everything that comes. There must be the duty of identification which in a certain sense is ministerial and in a certain other sense is judicial. Therefore I do not think I can lay down for the committee any precise definition or rather description of where ministerial power ends and where judicial power begins; but the committee did design by this language, as carefully selected as we were capable of selecting it, to give this tribunal the power to know and to determine for the time being whether a particular paper presented was the paper authorized by the laws of States and according to the forms that the States prescribed, instead of going into an inquiry as to whether the people who performed those duties were performing them from good motives or from bad ones. That power we did intend to give. When it comes to the illustration that my friend names, of in the one case bribery and in the other intimidation, I should say, speaking for myself alone, that it would not be within the competence of the Supreme Court to refuse to count a vote that the elector had been bribed to give, because there it is his vote, given freely, from a corrupt motive, and it would be just like the vote of any other elector given from some other corrupt motive, as a selfish and wicked belief that if he voted for A B for President of the United States he would presently have a fat office that he very much coveted. That goes into the region of the motives which influence the electors who are casting their votes (as motives always influence men, good or bad) to give their votes, but the vote of each is the free act of his will. If, on the other hand, an elector, to use the other illustration of my friend, votes under what he calls intimidation, by which I suppose he means to use a term that all we lawyers can readily understand the meaning of, duress——

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I should say, speaking for mysef and nobody else, that the Supreme Court would reject a vote that was given by duress, because it was not the vote of that elector, it was the vote of the superior coercion that through his fingers, if you please, put it into the box without his voice.

Mr. MERRIMON. How would they get at the facts?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know. You might as well ask me how a circuit court of the United States would get at the fact in a patent cause. How will they get at the fact that a particular elector ineligible by the Constitution of the United States, being a Senator, is a Senator? You may say in that particular case that the Supreme Court are bound to take notice judicially of who is a Senator. Then they have got to identify the man as a question of fact. They know that my friend, admit that they do—I doubt whether judicial knowledge will go quite as far as that, but take it for granted—is one of the Senators from the sovereign State of North Carolina; but when it comes to be ascertained as a fact, if a gentleman named Merrimon appears as voting there, whether that is the MERRIMON who is a Senator of the United States, there is a question that must be ascertained upon proof, and that proof implies consideration pro and con, the weighing of evidence, and the determination of it. So in respect of the question my friend has put. If he asks me how a tribunal is going to get at the fact, I can only say if they are authorized to get at the fact at all they must get at it by those simple and general means that are known in civilized countries in the course of jurisprudence.

Mr. MERRIMON. If it is uncertain it ought to be made certain. Upon reading the proposition, my mind was impressed with the notion that this simply conferred ministerial power, and I was more impressed with that notion because in line 28 I notice that the word "considered" is used instead of the more definite and technical term "determined:"

> And the person having the greatest number of votes for President, considered by the Court to have been lawfully given and certified.

"Considered" is something that precedes judgment; "determined" is to put an end to a question, to come to a conclusion about it.

Then I beg to ask the honorable Senator another question. I notice that this amendment, wherever it can be made to do so, runs upon the language of the Constitution as it now stands; that very much the same language is adopted, but in this phraseology one word is interpolated. I read from line 29 down to the word "appoint" in line 31:

> Shall be President if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors lawfully appointed.

The word "lawfully" is added here. I beg to ask the Senator why the word "lawfully" is inserted. Furthermore, I would ask this other question which is more important—it may be a practical question as things now stand before the Congress of the country—whether what is meant there by the majority of the whole number of electors lawfully appointed, embraces all the electors that are allowed by law, whether they were appointed or not. For example, suppose in the present contest the vote of one of the States should be cast out, if it were a fraud. In that case is the majority counted against that State as it might have had electors, or if a candidate gets a majority of the votes counted is he elected?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I can only say that, in the particular to which the Senator from North Carolina now refers, the committee supposed, whether rightfully or wrongfully, that they had taken the clearest language of which the subject was susceptible in order to show that the whole number necessary to a choice was not the whole number equal to the number of Senators and Representatives to which all the States should be entitled in Congress at that time, but was the whole number of those persons whom the people of the States, in the manner provided by their Legislatures, had chosen to appoint and if a particular State did not choose to make any selection at all it should not be counted, as in the case during the rebellion when eleven States did not undertake to participate in the election for the head of what they then regarded as a foreign government, and yet the other States that still kept up the Government here maintained that the Government was not dissolved, that there were just as many States as there were before, that the fact that there were a great number of States that did not appoint electors at all should not throw the election into the House of Representatives. But in the event of a failure to get a majority of the whole number lawfully appointed, that is, in the manner provided by the Constitution of the United States, which is, as the Senator and everybody else well knows, that the Legislatures, in a manner selected by themselves, shall make the appointments or provide for their being made, the court would have the power, in my judgment and in that of the committee, as I understand, to ascertain in making up the aggregate the whole number of votes given, just as canvassers would on an election in my friend's town or my own. The whole number of votes necessary to a choice is so many; that is, the whole number of lawful votes represented in the ballot-box. If a person has a majority of those he has got the election. If he has not, then the contingent provision applies.

Mr. MERRIMON. My question, though, goes further than that, but on the same line, however. Suppose, in the count which is to take place in February next, for some reason, some consideration, the vote of a State that is entitled to vote shall be cast out. I take it that case would be the same as if the State had not voted at all. It is an adjudication of the fact by Congress. Congress is to count the vote.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not say anything upon that subject. If this present proposition were the supreme law of the land, then I should say that this language, as it now stands here, would be exactly what the Senator says he takes it the Constitution is now; but I do not say that I take it so or do not take it so.

Mr. MERRIMON. Then I beg to ask the Senator one other question, why the manner of casting the vote in the electoral college was changed from the method by ballot to that of viva voce.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that all of the committee were of the opinion that upon the true principles of republican government, wherever a duty is devolved upon an agent of the people, that agent should publicly perform that duty. I do not speak of reflection and of reading a book as a judge does when he is trying to determine what sort of an opinion he shall render; but when the public servant renders the act which is intrusted to him it ought to be an act which he is to perform in the eyes of all his principals who have intrusted him with that duty. Therefore I think we all concurred in the idea that this action of the chosen agents of the people should be public, upon the individual responsibility of each agent, so that there would be no dispute or concealment in respect of the question whether he had fulfilled the trust which had been committed to him or whether he had betrayed it, and in a manner in which he could not be found out.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator from Vermont yield to me a moment that I may make a suggestion?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. There was another reason which I think has escaped his recollection. The Constitution as it stands now provides that the electors shall vote separately for President and Vice-President, one of whom shall not be a resident of the same State with themselves. This provision, effectuating, as the committee thought, the design of the old provision, ordains that each elector shall vote for a candidate for President, not resident in the same State with the candidate for Vice-President. Now, if ballots were to be cast and no declaration viva voce, it might be difficult, indeed impossible, to ascertain whether the Constitution in that regard had been observed or not. Therefore I think a sufficient reason was found in requiring each elector to denote openly for whom he voted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from New York is entirely correct. His statement brings the matter clearly to my recollection, and he has stated it with the precision with which he states all questions, so that I need not comment upon it at all, except to add what has occurred in respect of debates hitherto upon these questions as to whether the whole vote of a State, as in 1837, should be thrown out, it being by ballot, because one single one of the electors happened to be ineligible, and you could not tell whether he had voted for one candidate or the other, unless it happened that all the electors voted for one candidate; and so it was a serious question in the report of Mr. Grundy about the ineligible democratic postmasters and pension agents, &c., in 1837, how hard it would be to throw out the vote of a whole State, given beyond dispute by a clear majority for a particular candidate, because some one of those persons casting it, without anybody knowing it, happened to be a person who was not entitled to act at all; and that is an illustration entirely of what the Senator from New York says.

But, Mr. President, I had not designed, of course, to press this important subject to a decision to-day, because I should hope that Senators would carefully reflect upon it in the light of the whole history of the Government, which I have so briefly and imperfectly stated, about the doubt that now exists and the attitude that the two Houses have hitherto occupied upon the subject, and be prepared, within the course of a day or two, or as soon as we can with propriety, after careful consideration, to vote. Certainly there is great occasion, if this is a just thing, for acting upon it now. If it be not, of course the sooner it is put out of the way in order to let us resort to some means of knowing where we stand, the better.

Mr. MERRIMON. I have to suggest to the Senate that after to-morrow the Senate will lack twelve or fifteen or twenty of its members who are going off on committee duty; and for one I should be glad to vote on this question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Perhaps we can get to a vote to-morrow. I shall certainly be ready myself to vote to-morrow, if gentlemen all around are reasonably ready.

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg to give notice of an amendment that I shall offer at the proper time. I shall offer at the proper time an amendment to section 2, by adding after the word "Vice-President," in line 69, these words:

Or appointed to any office under the United States until the expiration of four years next after he shall have ceased to be such justice.

So that the section shall read:

SEC. 2. No person holding the office of a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States shall be eligible to be elected as President or Vice-President, or appointed to any office under the United States until the expiration of four years next after he shall have ceased to be such justice.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope that amendment may be printed. It may be a proper one. I now move, if no other gentleman wishes to speak, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

FEES OF WITNESSES.

Mr. MORTON submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the rule for paying witnesses summoned to appear before the Senate, or either of its committees, shall be as follows: For each day a witness shall attend, the sum of four dollars; for each mile he shall travel in coming to or going from the place of examination, the sum of five cents each way; but nothing shall be paid for traveling when the witness has been summoned at the place of trial.

Mr. SHERMAN and Mr. COCKRELL submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them to the above resolution; which were referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

COMMITTEE ON PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS.

Mr. MORTON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the sum of $5,000 from the contingent fund of the Senate be transferred to the use of the Committee on Privileges and Elections; the same to be reimbursed to such fund out of any appropriation to be made for defraying the expenses of said committee in inquiring into the alleged abridgment of the elective franchise in certain States of the Union as provided by the resolution of December 5, 1876.

NATHANIEL M'KAY.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4186) for the relief of Nathaniel McKay; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The call of States and Territories was then completed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced the passage of a bill (H. R. No. 4121) to provide for the expenses of certain special committees, with amendments; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

JAMES MADISON WELLS.

Mr. BANNING. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution for adoption at this time:

Whereas the President having sent to this House what purports to be a report of certain gentlemen sent to Louisiana to be present at the canvass of the electoral vote of that State in which the returning board is indorsed and sustained as a board made up of gentlemen of patriotism and integrity, and referring to James Madison Wells, president of the board, as follows: "Two of them, Hon. James Madison Wells, president of the board, and General Thomas C. Anderson, next senior member, are southern-born, and of old and highly respectable families. The father of the former was Hon. Levi Wells, of the parish of Rapides, who in 1812 represented it in the convention called to frame the constitution of the State of Louisiana. The son received a liberal education and was early engaged in the care of the planting and other interests of his father. He was a Union man from the time the war broke out, and although he suffered greatly by it in the loss of property, he never faltered in his devotion to the Union cause. Under the Banks reconstruction scheme he was chosen lieutenant-governor on the ticket with Hon. Michael Hahn, who was elected governor, and upon the election of the latter to the Senate, a year after, Mr. Wells became governor of the State, to which office he was almost unanimously re-elected under the reconstruction plan of President Johnson. His experience in public life has been great and varied, and his capacity to discharge the duties assumed cannot be questioned:" Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to forward to this House copies from the War Department of all reports, orders, correspondence, telegrams, indorsements, and memoranda connected with the removal of James Madison Wells from the governorship of Louisiana by General Sheridan in the year 1867.

Mr. KASSON. I object to the resolution.

Mr. BANNING. Then I move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution.

Mr. HALE. And on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 141, nays 81, not voting 68; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, John H. Bagley, jr., Banning, Bell, Bland, Blount, Boone, Bradford, John Young Brown, Samuel D. Burchard, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. Walker, Walling, Ward, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Wigginton, Wike, and Woodburn—68.

So (two-thirds not having voted in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended and the resolution was not passed.

ELECTION INVESTIGATIONS.

Mr. MACDOUGALL moved to suspend the rules and pass the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of nine be appointed to proceed to the cities of New York, Brooklyn, and Jersey City, to examine into the alleged fraudulent registration and fraudulent voting for presidential electors and Representatives in Congress at the late election in each of said cities; also, a committee of five to proceed to the State of Virginia, to examine and report whether election frauds have been committed, or intimidation of voters used, in the second and fourth congressional districts of said State at the recent election for presidential electors and Representative in Congress; also, a committee of nine to proceed to the State of Mississippi, to examine and report whether any frauds have been committed, or intimidation of voters used, in the recent election for presidential electors and Representatives in Congress; also, that a committee of five be appointed to proceed to the city of Philadelphia, to examine into and report whether there was fraudulent registration and voting in said city previous to and at the recent election for presidential electors and Representatives in Congress; also, a committee of three to proceed to the State of Alabama, to examine into and report whether any intimidation was used, or illegal votes cast, at the recent election for presidential electors and Representative in Congress in the fourth congressional district of said State; and that each of said committees have power to send for persons and papers, to employ a stenographer, and be attended by a deputy sergeant-at-arms, and that they have the privilege to report at any time.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I ask, by unanimous consent, that the gentleman from New York shall also include San Francisco and Oregon.

Mr. COX. Is the resolution divisible?

Mr. SOUTHARD. I hope the gentleman from New York will not object to include at least an investigation into the alleged frauds in the election at San Francisco.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the resolution, under the motion to suspend the rules, cannot be divided.

Mr. COX. I have never heard there was any allegation about New York in this connection.

Mr. WILLIS. We want an examination into New York.

Mr. COX. Certainly there is no objection to that.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I rise for the purpose of asking a question of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. Only a parliamentary question is in order.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. It is a parliamentary question strictly. My question is whether any gentleman can offer in this House a resolution which in its effect will leave the House without a quorum?

The SPEAKER. That is for the House to judge.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. The resolution proposes to send away forty or fifty members.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Only thirty-one.

The question being taken on suspending the rules and adopting the resolution, the Speaker declared that, in the judgment of the Chair, two-thirds had not voted in the affirmative.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask that the resolution may be again read.

The resolution was again read.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 123, nays 89, not voting 78; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Ainsworth, Anderson, Bagby, George A. Bagley, John H. Bagley, jr., John H. Baker, William H. Baker, Ballou, Blair, Bradley, Buckner, Horatio C. Burchard, Burleigh, William P. Walker, Walling, Ward, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Wigginton, Wike, and Woodburn—78.

So (two-thirds not having voted in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. DURHAM. My colleague from Kentucky, Mr. BLACKBURN, has paired with Mr. ROBINSON, of Indiana, on all political questions.

Mr. WILLIS. My colleague from New York, Mr. BLISS, is detained unavoidably from the House. If present, he would vote "ay."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

NARROW-GAUGE RAILWAY TO SAINT LOUIS AND CHICAGO.

Mr. STONE. I move to suspend the rules and take from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union House bill No. 2798, entitled "A bill to authorize the Washington, Cincinnati and Saint Louis Railway Company to construct a narrow-gauge railway from tide water to the cities of Saint Louis and Chicago," and make it the special order for consideration in the House, as in Committee of the Whole, on Wednesday next, immediately after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of.

The question being taken, there were ayes 21, noes not counted.

So (two-thirds not having voted in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

ELECTION INVESTIGATIONS.

Mr. COX. I move that the rules be suspended and that the following resolution be adopted:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to proceed to the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Brooklyn, and Jersey City, to examine into any alleged fraudulent registration and fraudulent voting for presidential electors and Representatives in Congress at the late election in each of said cities.

Mr. LYNCH rose.

Mr. COX. I object to debate.

Mr. LYNCH. I ask the gentleman if he will not include Mississippi in the resolution?

Mr. COX. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The question being taken, the rules were suspended (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) and the resolution was adopted.

CIRCULAR LETTER TO UNITED STATES MARSHALS.

Mr. GOODE. I move that the rules be suspended and that the following resolution be adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and are hereby, instructed to inquire and report upon the legality of the circular letter issued by the Attorney-General during the late presidential campaign to the marshals of the United States in relation to their powers and duties in the election then pending; and that said committee also report what legislation, if any, is necessary upon the subject-matter of said circular letter.

Mr. KASSON. I ask that the first four lines of the resolution be again read.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be again reported.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not think there is any objection to that. I do not see any.

The question being taken, the rules were suspended (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) and the resolution was adopted.

CONTRIBUTIONS OF FEDERAL EMPLOYÉS TO ELECTION FUND.

Mr. SPENCER. I move that the rules be suspended and that the following resolution be adopted:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be instructed to investigate and report what, if any, intimidation or coercion has been practiced upon employés of the Federal Government during the late presidential campaign to compel said employés to contribute to the election fund of any political party, and to report to this House what action or legislation may be necessary to protect said employés from such exactions for political purposes; that said committee have power to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman if he will not include in his resolution the voters of the State of Mississippi?

Mr. COX. That is not germane.

Mr. SPENCER. I do not admit any amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman will admit that amendment I think there will be no objection to the resolution.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 128, noes 62.

Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. CONGER called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let me say again to the gentleman from Louisiana that if he will include Mississippi we will have no objection to the resolution. Committees have been appointed to go all round; put in Mississippi and there will be no objection to the resolution.

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 135, nays 74, not voting 81; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, John H. Bagley, jr., Banning, Bland, Blount, Boone, Bradford, John Young Brown, Buckner, Samuel D. Burchard, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. B. Walker, Walling, Ward, Warren, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Wigginton, Wike, Willard, and Woodburn—81.

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended and the resolution was not adopted.

MANNER OF CALLING THE ROLL.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I move that the rules be so suspended as to adopt the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Speaker be, and he hereby is, respectfully requested to direct the Clerk in calling the roll of the House to call out the surnames of members with the prefix of "Mister," except where there are two or more of the same name, in which case he will call the name of the State, and that he will only call the Christian names of members where there are two or more of the same name from the same State.

Mr. KASSON. I think that had better go to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is an important principle involved in that resolution——

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. If there is any general opposition to adopting this resolution at this time, I will consent that it be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The resolution was accordingly received, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Rules.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the gentleman to yield to me that I may introduce a resolution.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order! Regular order!

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I have no objection to yielding to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. There is objection, and the question is upon the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at three o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 12, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

REFERENCE OF ANNUAL REPORTS.

Mr. HAMLIN. I submit a motion in the nature of an order that the annual report of the Postmaster-General be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I make a similar motion in regard to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances, that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BOGY. I present to the Senate a memorial prepared by myself and Senators MCDONALD and STEVENSON, which was referred to yesterday, in relation to the counting by the returning-board, of the votes of the people of Louisiana for the appointment of presidential electors on the 7th of November, 1876. I ask that the same be received and that it be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to printing this memorial? The Chair hears none and it is so ordered.

Mr. HITCHCOCK presented the petition of Henson Wiseman, praying compensation for losses and damages to his property and family sustained by Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

CHANGE OF NAME OF A BANK.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3693) changing the name of the First National Bank of Amesbury to the First National Bank of Merrimac, to report it favorably, and I ask for its present consideration. There can be no objection to it.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like the Senator from Massachusetts to state the local reasons why this change should be granted. They are known to me, but I should like to have them on the record, so that the case may be understood.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The sole reason for the passage of the bill is that the town of Amesbury has been divided and a new town made by the name of Merrimac out of a part of the old town. The place of business of this bank is in that portion of the town which is now the town of Merrimac.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1067) to establish a post-route from Barron to Clayton, in Wisconsin; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANTHONY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1068) to repeal certain provisions of the Revised Statutes of the United States relative to advancement in the Navy; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MERRIMON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1069) to amend section 146 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to vacancies in the offices of President and Vice-President; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DORSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1070) for the relief of Andrew J. Jones; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1071) for the relief of H. E. Woodhouse & Co., of Brownsville, Texas; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1072) making an appropriation for continuing the improvement of the Monongahela River, in the States of West Virginia and Pennsylvania; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1073) making an appropriation for continuing the improvement of the Great Kanawha River, in the State of West Virginia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. OGLESBY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1074) to amend the act entitled "An act providing for the sale of the Osage ceded lands in Kansas to actual settlers;" which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILLS.

Mr. MERRIMON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That the following be added to the rules of the Senate:

"All bills providing appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors, and all amendments thereto, shall be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and before reporting the same back to the Senate, the committee shall send the same to the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers, who shall make inquiry and report upon the extent, expediency, and necessity for the proposed improvements; and such report shall be made a part of the report of the committee to the Senate."

REPAVEMENT OF STREETS IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. DORSEY. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be, and hereby is, directed to inquire into the necessity and expediency of repaving or otherwise improving all or any portion of the streets and avenues named in the schedule hereto annexed, and to ascertain as near as may be the cost of such work and the proportions to be borne respectively by the United States, the District of Columbia out of its general revenues, and the property-owners along said streets and avenues, and to report by bill or otherwise.

I certify that the above is correct:

J. W. PHILLIPS,
Overseer.

Mr. COOPER. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution will lie over.

Mr. DORSEY. I ask that it be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire the schedule printed also?

Mr. DORSEY. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution and the schedule will be printed, if there be no objection.

EMPLOYMENT OF DEPUTY MARSHALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further resolutions, shall the morning hour be declared concluded?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wanted during the morning hour to ask to have the resolution of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] which was laid over at my request yesterday, taken up. I dare say he would like to have it disposed of, and, if it is agreeable to the Senator from Delaware, I will ask that it be taken up.

Mr. BAYARD. Yes, sir; I desire that it be taken up.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to take it up.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. BAYARD yesterday:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be, and he is hereby, directed to communicate to the Senate the total number of deputy marshals employed throughout the United States in connection with the election held on November 7 last—stating the number so employed in each State and at each voting-precinct, respectively—and the length of time they were so employed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the resolution by adding after the word "employed," at the close, the following words:

With a full statement of the causes and necessity of such employment, the object thereof, what duties they were to perform, how far they performed duties, and the nature thereof.

The object of the amendment is to get complete, full information of all the transaction of the employment of such deputies, if any were employed, so as to have the full picture, so far as the Attorney-General can give it to us, of the state of the situation.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not know that I object to the amendment. It of course increases the labor and will delay the return of this information for a while, but I shall not object to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

HOT SPRINGS RESERVATION.

Mr. OGLESBY. There is pending before the Committee on Public Lands a bill (S. No. 821) authorizing the sale and disposition of the Hot Springs reservation, in the State of Arkansas, and for other purposes. It is a matter of some considerable importance, as the title to the lands where the springs are has been held by the Court of Claims to be in the United States. I have a communication addressed to the Committee on Public Lands, from the judges of the court, upon that subject, which I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands to ask to have printed. I move, therefore, that the communication be printed for the benefit of the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be printed under the rule.

Mr. OGLESBY. I move that the paper be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

CAPTAIN JOHN T. M'GINNISS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the favor of the Senate to take up House bill No. 2257, which has been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs. It is very brief and will take but a moment, I think.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 2257) for the relief of John T. McGinniss, captain of Thirteenth Infantry, United States Army. It relieves J. T. McGinniss, captain of the Thirteenth Infantry, United States Army, from the responsibility of commissary funds, amounting to $380.79, the property of the United States, which were stolen from an office safe in a tent at Fort Shaw, Montana Territory, October, 1867.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there a report?

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a report, I think a House report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will not ask for the delay that will be caused by sending for the report. I see it is a very small sum, and I dare say the chairman of the committee has looked into it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to a third reading.

Mr. WITHERS. Let us hear the report read.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Clerk has the report now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. BANNING, from the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives, May 13, 1876:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill H. R. No. 2257 and accompanying documents, make the following report:

On or about the 29th of September, 1867, a small iron office-safe, belonging to the Government, for which Captain N. S. Constable, acting quartermaster, United States Army, was responsible, was stolen from the headquarters at Fort Shaw, Montana Territory.

A board of examiners, consisting of three Army officers, was convened by Special Orders No. 93, at Fort Shaw, October 9, 1867, to inquire into and report upon the loss of said safe and its contents.

The board found that the safe had been taken by a person or persons unknown to the responsible parties or to the board.

The examiners also found as follows:

"In said safe were $380.79, subsistence-funds, for which First Lieutenant J. T. McGinniss, assistant quartermaster Thirteenth Infantry, acting commissary of subsistence at Fort Shaw, Montana, is responsible.

"In said safe were $798.51, regimental funds of the Thirteenth Infantry, and $294.93 post funds; also, $27.14 regimental band Thirteenth Infantry, and $300 private money, for which First Lieutenant Thomas J. Lloyd, adjutant Thirteenth Infantry and post, is responsible."

The board of examiners further found that the safe had been turned over to Lieutenant McGinniss a few days previous to the theft; that a clerk slept in the office; that the safe was kept by McGinniss in the same manner it had been kept by his predecessor, and that it had probably been stolen by deserters from the Army.

The following certificate of Lieutenant J. B. Guthrie, of the Thirteenth Infantry, fully presents the case, and shows that the loss was not the result of any negligence of McGinniss.

Lieutenant Guthrie's statement.

"I hereby certify that, on or about the 20th day of September, 1867, I transferred, to date August 31, 1867, to Captain N. S. Constable, assistant quartermaster United States Army, a small office safe, (iron.) I retained the keys of the safe for the time being, and on the 27th of September I transferred them, (the keys,) together with what subsistence funds I was responsible for, $380.97, to First Lieutenant J. T. McGinniss, regimental quartermaster Thirteenth Infantry, who was ordered to relieve of duties in the subdepartment at this place. On the 30th of September I received from Brevet Major-General John W. Turner, commissary of subsistence at Saint Louis, Missouri, the sum of $10,000, which I transferred to Lieutenant J. T. McGinniss on the 1st day of October. On receiving this money Lieutenant McGinniss first discovered the safe had been stolen from the office. Search was immediately instituted, but without success. I know this safe contained a large amount of money, part of which was the amount I transferred to Lieutenant McGinniss a few days previous, and part of which money in the safe was deposited by Lieutenant Lloyd, regimental adjutant. Lieutenant McGinniss was not responsible either for the safe or its loss and contents. The safe had always remained in the office and no danger was apprehended of its being stolen. The exact amount of subsistence funds lost I cannot state.

"J. B. GUTHRIE,

"Second Lieutenant Thirteenth Infantry, United States Army."

The committee therefore recommend that H. R. No. 2257 be amended as follows: Strike out the words "fifty-six dollars," in the sixth line, and insert the words "eighty dollars and seventy-nine cents;" and that the bill, thus amended, be passed.

Mr. WITHERS. Has our Military Committee reported on the bill favorably?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a favorable report from the Military Committee of the Senate.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

JOHN S. LOGAN AND W. L. SHADWICK.

Mr. WRIGHT. I reported from the Committee on Claims on the 2d of June last Senate bill No. 890, for the relief of John S. Logan and W. L. Shadwick. It is for the payment of but a thousand dollars and I think there will be no trouble about it. There is a report that I send to the Clerk, to be read if necessary. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 890) for the relief of John S. Logan and W. L. Shadwick. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to John S. Logan and W. L. Shadwick, of Missouri, the sum of $1.000, in full for so much money advanced by the Western Bank of Missouri for the use and benefit of United States troops, under the command of Colonel John Edwards, in 1861, of which claim Logan and Shadwick are now the owners.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELECTORAL VOTE OF OREGON.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the resolution reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections with reference to the electoral vote of Oregon.

Several SENATORS. Let it be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The resolution was reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, with an amendment to strike out all after the word "whereas" in the first line and insert in lieu thereof the following:

It is alleged that at the late election for electors of President and Vice-President for the State of Oregon the people of said State by a majority of over one thousand votes elected W. H. Odell, John C. Cartwright, and J. W. Watts;

And whereas it is also alleged that the governor of said State did subsequently, in violation of law and in defiance of the expressed will of the people, issue a certificate of election to one E. A. Cronin instead of to said J. W. Watts;

And whereas it is also alleged that said E. A. Cronin did, in violation of law, upon some pretext, assume to select for his colleagues one J. N. T. Miller and John Parker in lieu of said W. H. Odell and John C. Cartwright;

And whereas it is further alleged that said Cronin, Miller, and Parker have assumed to cast the vote of Oregon for President and Vice-President, and to certify the same to the President of the Senate: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections is hereby instructed to inquire into the eligibility of said J. W. Watts, and investigate the facts attending the appointment of said electors and pretended electors, and report the same to the Senate, and for this purpose may employ a stenographer, send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and examine witnesses.

Mr. WHYTE. I have no objection to voting for the resolution; but, really, I think that the preamble ought not to pass in its present shape; and if it remains in its present shape I cannot vote for the resolution, because the very first proposition is that these three men were elected. I have no objection to saying that a majority of a thousand votes was cast for these three persons, but one of them being ineligible I can hardly agree to say that he was elected. If that amendment were made to the resolution I should have no hesitancy in voting for it. As it now stands I shall vote against it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the resolution for consideration. Is there objection to taking it up? The Chair hears none, and it is before the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I do not think there can be any serious objection to this preamble so far as that is concerned. I do not desire at this time, or intend, to go into any discussion, so far as I am concerned, of the questions involved in the case of the Oregon electoral vote. These questions will be discussed at length by abler men before the close of this session.

It is not often that the country is startled as it has been startled by so plain a violation of law by the chief executive officer of a State as seems to be clearly presented in the case of Oregon. The constitution of the State of Oregon, in section 10 of article 5, in specifying and defining the duties of the governor, reads as follows:

He shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed.

The constitution of the State of Oregon also provides, in section 16 of article 2, under the head of "Suffrage and Election," as follows:

In all elections held by the people under this constitution, the person or persons who shall receive the highest number of votes shall be declared duly elected.

Section 2 of the act of October 24, 1864, of the State of Oregon, provides as follows:

The electors of President and Vice-President shall convene at the seat of government on the first Wednesday of December next after their election, at the hour of twelve of the clock at noon of that day, and if there shall be any vacancy in the office of an elector, occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise, the electors present shall immediately proceed to fill, by viva voce and plurality of votes, such vacancy in the electoral college, and when all the electors appear, or the vacancies, if any, shall have been filled as above provided ors shall proceed to perform the duties required of them by the Constitution and laws of the United States.

It is the next section, however, that I desire more particularly to read at this point, section 3 of the same act, which provides as follows:

The votes for the electors shall be given, received, returned, and canvassed as the same are given, returned, and canvassed for members of Congress. The secretary of state shall prepare two lists of the names of the electors elected, and affix the seal of the state to the same. Such lists shall be signed by the governor and secretary, and by the latter delivered to the college of electors at the hour of their meeting on such first Wednesday of December.

This, Mr. President, it will be perceived, provides that the votes for the electors shall be received, returned, and canvassed as the same are given, returned, and canvassed for members of Congress. Now what is the provision on that point? It is to be found in section 33 of the act of January 11, 1854, and reads as follows:

The county clerk, immediately after making the abstract of the votes given in his county, shall make a copy of each of said abstracts, and transmit it by mail to the secretary of state, at the seat of government, and it shall be the duty of the secretary of state, in presence of the governor, to proceed, within thirty days after the election, and sooner, if the returns be all received, to canvass the votes given for secretary and treasurer of state, justices of the supreme court, member of Congress, and district-attorneys; and the governor shall grant a certificate of election to the person having the highest number of votes for either of such offices, and shall also issue a proclamation declaring the election of such person.

So that the "laws" referred to, or at least a part of the "laws" referred to in that section of the constitution of the State of Oregon, which declares that it shall be the duty of the governor to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed," provide in plain, unambiguous, emphatic terms that it shall be the duty of the governor of the State of Oregon to issue his certificate to the person having the highest number of votes.

The constitution of the State provides, as I have already shown, the same thing. The statute provides in terms, that that shall be his duty. Nowhere does the law provide that the governor of the State shall exercise judicial functions, that he shall have jurisdiction to enter into the question as to the eligibility of this man or that man that a majority of the people of the State may have selected for this office or that office in any election by the people. He therefore has no jurisdiction whatever to enter upon that subject at all, to entertain it, to adjudicate upon it. It is not the case, therefore, which sometimes is presented, which very frequently is presented, where an officer having jurisdiction commits an error in judgment; it is a case where the chief executive officer of the State has taken jurisdiction not only in absence of law giving jurisdiction, but in the face of the law which says that he has not jurisdiction, because the law declares positively that it shall be his duty to issue a certificate to the person receiving the highest number of votes; and in this connection I call special attention to the clause of the constitution of the State to which I referred a moment ago. I allude to section 16 of article 2:

In all elections held by the people under this constitution the person or persons who shall receive the highest number of votes shall be declared duly elected.

By whom? By the governor, by the secretary of state, by the canvassing board; the ministerial officers provided by law for the performance of that duty. Then, when that is done, if any question arises as to the eligibility of the person so declared to have been elected, that is for another tribunal.

As I said, I do not intend to argue the questions involved. I simply wish to call the attention of the Senate to these provisions of the constitution of the State of Oregon, and to these provisions of the law of the State of Oregon under which this action has been had, for the purpose of showing in a few words to the Senate and to the country how plain a violation of law the chief executive officer of the State of Oregon has been guilty of, because that requires no investigation so far as his action is concerned, there is no mistake—it is conceded by all. That seems to me requires no investigation. There are circumstances connected with the whole matter that require investigation; but it seems to me, with the law before us of which we all take notice, with the conceded facts before us in reference to the action of Governor Grover, that there will be none here or elsewhere, now or at any other time, at the present or in the future, statesmen or mere politicians, who will have the hardihood to defend the action of Governor Grover in issuing his certificate to Mr. Cronin, or in refusing to issue it to Mr. Watts. That is all I desire to say. I do not want to argue the question. That I will leave to other Senators.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the other day when what may be called the Oregon question was before the Senate I produced some authorities, but others that I had collected were not here, and there was no time to send for them. I desire this morning very briefly to present these authorities.

Allusion was made in that discussion to a decision in California; and I understood the Senator from North Carolina to say that the supreme court of California had decided that where the majority candidate was ineligible the minority candidate would be elected.

Mr. MERRIMON. I did not state exactly that. It will be remembered that it was a running debate and I said, in the hurry of the debate at the moment, that a volume of reports of that State had been placed in my hands in which I understood the gentleman who handed it to say there was a decision directly in point. I looked at the case afterward and found it did not go as far as I supposed it did from what he said on the subject.

Mr. SARGENT. If the Senator from Indiana will allow me, I hold in my hand and will place at his disposal a decision made upon the 13th of November of this year, since the election, by Wallace, chief-justice of our State, who is a life-long democrat, in the case of Crawford vs. Dunbar. Delivering the opinion of the court, in it he refers to the case in 13 California which has been already cited. This affirms distinctly the case in 13 California, and cites from it quite largely, and this clearly states that the ineligibility of a person receiving the highest number of votes in no way promotes the election of a person receiving a less number; that the person receiving the less number could not take the place notwithstanding the other was ineligible.

Mr. MERRIMON. It is due to myself also to say here that I did not on that occasion take either side. I simply said there were respectable decisions both ways, and that there was no ground for imputing corruption either to the governor of New Jersey and the electoral college there or to the governor of Oregon. I simply meant to say that there were decisions both ways, and that so far as the mere decision went there was no ground for imputing corruption.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator all the while, however, should take into consideration the powers of the board and the powers of the governor under the laws of Oregon in considering that question.

Mr. MERRIMON. I said nothing about that at all. I simply repelled an imputation that I thought the Senator from California was making.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator from North Carolina was simply mistaken about it. I did not suppose for a moment that he took the ground that the minority candidate was elected, and I took occasion to hunt the authority up. I want to read the authorities.

Mr. MERRIMON. I tried to hand the book to you at the moment you were speaking.

Mr. MORTON. This is 13 California Reports, the case of Saunders vs. Hayne, and I shall read from page 153. The court say:

It will be observed that the point of this defense is, that the votes cast for Turner, supposing he received the highest number, were nullities, because of his assumed ineligibility. But we do not so consider. Although some old cases may be found affirming this doctrine, we think that the better opinion at this day is, that it is not correct.

The celebrated controversy in the British Parliament between Wilkes and Luttrel has given rise to much discussion; and the opinions of jurists and statesmen have been somewhat divided. But the prevailing opinion, English and American, of modern times, seems to be against the precedent established in that case. In the case of Whitman and Melony, (10 Cal.,) Mr. Justice Field clearly intimates his opinion in favor of the principle that the votes given for an ineligible candidate are not to be counted for the next highest candidate on the poll. In the State of Wisconsin vs. Giles (1 Chandler, 117) the same doctrine is held; and it is enforced by the judges of the supreme court of Maine, in their opinion, to be found in 38 Maine Reports, 597.

Our legislative precedents seem to be the same way. Upon principle we think the law should so be ruled. An election is the deliberate choice of a majority or plurality of the electoral body. This is evidenced by the votes of the electors. But if a majority of those voting, by mistake of law or fact, happen to cast their votes upon an ineligible candidate, it by no means follows that the next to him on the poll should receive the office. If this be so, a candidate might be elected who received only a small portion of the votes, and who never could have been elected at all but for this mistake. The votes are not less legal votes because given to a person in whose behalf they cannot be counted; and the person who is the next to him on the list of candidates does not receive a plurality of votes because his competitor was ineligible. The votes cast for the latter, it is true, cannot be counted for him; but that is no reason why they should, in effect, be counted for the former, who, possibly, could never have received them. It is fairer, more just, and more consistent with the theory of our institutions to hold the votes so cast as merely ineffectual for the purpose of an election than to give them the effect of disappointing the popular will, and electing to office a man whose pretensions the people had designed to reject.—13 California Reports, Saunders vs. Haynes, 153, 154.

Now, I will in connection with that ask the Senator from California to read a very recent decision of the supreme court of the State of California, as he is familiar with it.

Mr. SARGENT. The facts are stated as follows:

1. The office of inspector of customs at Stockton, in the San Francisco collection district, to which there is annexed a salary of $1,000 per annum, is a lucrative office within the meaning of section 21, article 4 of the constitution of the State, and if the defendant, Dunbar, held that office in September, 1875, then he was ineligible to the office of school superintendent in the county of San Joaquin, which is a "civil office of profit under the State," the salary thereof being $1,500 per annum.

2. It is settled here that a mere de facto incumbency of the inspectorship of customs would not render Dunbar ineligible to the office of school superintendent under the disqualifying clause of the constitution referred to. He must have been inspector de jure in order to work that result. (People, ex rel. Attorney-General, vs. Turner, 20 Cal., 142.)

3. The case made upon the part of the contestant established that Dunbar, on the first Wednesday of September, 1875, was de jure as well as de facto inspector of customs at Stockton. It appeared from the evidence adduced by the contestants that upon the nomination of the collector of customs, and with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, Dunbar had been appointed such inspector of customs and had taken the oaths, two in number, prescribed by law, and had entered upon the discharge of his official duties, pursuant to his appointment. His appointment and the taking by him of the prescribed oaths of office, the last of them on the 6th day of April, 1875, was established by the records thereof in due form, which, or copies of which, duly certified, were produced from their proper custodian, and it was proven and found by the court below to be the fact, that, pursuant to his appointment, Dunbar, thereafter and on or about the 10th day of April, 1875, took possession of all the public property belonging to the office of inspector of customs of Stockton theretofore under the control of his predecessor, and then and there entered upon the discharge of the duties pertaining to said office, and that he had not resigned nor been removed therefrom.

The court then discuss a question of evidence, which is not material to this point, and proceed:

5. It further appears by the findings that at the regular election in question, the respondent, Dunbar, received 1,702 votes, the contestant Crawford (the next highest vote) 1,182 votes, and Jenny Phelps 830 votes.

Upon these facts the contestant claims that he is entitled to the office and should have judgment here to that effect. This claim is in argument put upon the ground that Dunbar, being ineligible, the votes cast for him, though amounting in number to a plurality, were mere nullities, and that the respondent received a majority of the votes over Jenny Phelps, the only other eligible candidate for the office. But this position cannot be maintained. This was directly ruled here, and adhered to upon a petition for a rehearing, in Saunders vs. Haynes, (13 California Reports, 145.) In that case the court said—

And then they go on and quote the portion which the Senator from Indiana has read from their opinion, and they conclude by saying:

It results from this view that the judgment of the court below must be reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to render judgment vacating the office.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, allusion has been made in the report that I read to the case of Wilkes, and that has been referred to by others. I desire to read a mere statement of the Wilkes case in connection with the English authorities, to which I will now refer:

Wilkes had been expelled from the House, January 19, 1764, had fled to France, and upon his return was elected four several times. Each time he was rejected and a new election ordered, because the Commons considered him personally disqualified. At last their patience was exhausted. Wilkes had become a popular idol, and the excitement was so great as almost to endanger the safety of the kingdom. The attorney-general justified the action taken by the House in giving the seat to Luttrell, upon the ground that each time a writ of election was issued to the sheriff of Middlesex Wilkes's disqualification was expressly stated, so that the people knew they voted for a man who would not be permitted to take his seat when elected. Lord North justified the act rather upon the ground of public expediency than upon its legality.

And now, Mr. President, it has been said that under the English doctrine the minority candidate would be elected if the majority candidate was ineligible at the time of the election. In every instance under the English doctrine which I have been able to find, the minority candidate has not been held to be elected except where the electors before the election had positive affirmative notice of the ineligibility of the other man—notice both as to the fact and as to the law. In no instance, as far as I can find, has the English doctrine gone beyond the case where positive affirmative notice was given, before the election, of the fact and of the law, which made the majority candidate ineligible. In the case of Wilkes, he had been elected three times in defiance of the decision of Parliament, which made him ineligible to re-election, and the writ under which the second, third, and fourth elections were held each contained a statement of his disability to be re-elected, so that in that case the voters had positive affirmative direct information in regard to the fact and in regard to the law.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. MORTON. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. I think, Mr. President, that the case of Wilkes is altogether too much brought into this consideration, if the Senator will pardon me for saying so. Wilkes was declared ineligible by the House of Commons alone, and not by any act of Parliament at all, and largely upon that ground was it that thirteen years afterward the Commons not only reversed their decision in reference to Wilkes but also expunged from their records the proceedings which declared him ineligible. He was declared ineligible simply by the House of Commons, and it was, if I recollect aright, the general judgment of all the courts and of all the lawyers of England that, however an act of Parliament might make a man ineligible to sit in the House of Commons, no resolution of the Commons was competent to do that.

If the Senator will allow me a moment more: after the action of the House of Commons upon the case of Wilkes, a man who was ineligible by act of Parliament to a seat in the House from a university offered himself as a candidate, and the opposing candidate stood at the polls and as every voter cast his vote informed him personally of the ineligibility of the other candidate. The man so stated to be ineligible, however, received a majority of the votes. The man receiving the minority, accompanied with personal knowledge to every voter as he cast his vote, applied for the seat in Parliament upon the principle that the honorable Senator is now discussing, and Parliament, although they unseated the man who had a majority, specifically declared the place vacant and the man having the minority not entitled to the seat. This was after the case of Wilkes.

Subsequently to that, a man who was holding the office of sheriff of a county, which by an act of Parliament makes him ineligible to a seat in Parliament, offered himself as a candidate. On that occasion the opposing candidate standing at the polls gave personal notice to every voter; and although the man holding the office of sheriff received the majority of the votes and took the seat, yet upon a contest made by the man receiving the minority of the votes, the House of Commons declared not only the man receiving the majority not entitled to the seat but that the man having the minority was not entitled to the seat and declared the seat vacant.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] a few days ago called attention to a case in Cowper's Reports before the act of Parliament of which I then spoke. It is true that there was a case in Cowper's Reports long before that act of Parliament. There were cases, however, in direct conflict with that, and the common law of England was unsettled altogether until the case of Wilkes came up, which excited so much attention in England as to produce the result which I stated a day or two ago.

I am very much obliged to the Senator from Indiana for permitting me to make this statement at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. DAWES. I ask pardon of the Senator.

Mr. SARGENT. I trust the pending business will be temporarily laid aside in order that the Senator from Indiana may conclude his remarks.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If it only takes a little time I do not wish to interfere with it, but I do not desire to have the unfinished business postponed too long.

Mr. SARGENT. Let this go on subject to a call for the regular order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not to displace the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to continuing the consideration of this resolution, not to displace the unfinished business? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I have referred, I believe, to all the English cases which have been quoted, to show that where the majority condidate is ineligible the minority candidate is elected, and in every one of them I find that there was positive, affirmative notice given to the electors before the election took place, and that the courts in every instance placed it upon that ground. In every case, I believe, except perhaps three, it was an election in a corporation where the number of electors was very small, in some cases twenty, in some cases fifty, and perhaps in others one hundred and fifty, so that all could be and were personally informed before the election took place that the candidate was ineligible under the law, and they were informed as well as to the law as to the fact.

Now I make this further statement that, under the law in England, the presumption that every man is presumed to know the law, does not apply to a case of this kind. Ignorance of the law will not excuse a man in the commission of crime or an assault, nor will it release him from the binding obligation of his contract; but in regard to a matter of this kind, he is not presumed to know the law, he is not bound to know the law, but he must be informed personally and affirmatively as to what the law is as well as to the fact. I will refer to the fiftieth volume of New York Reports, where a decision was made in which the English doctrine was summed up and stated very fully. It is the case of the People ex rel. Furman et al. vs. Clute:

In the multitude of cases in which the question has arisen, we think that up to this point there is no essential difference of result. All agree that there must be prior notice to, or knowledge in the elector of fact and law, to make his vote so ineffectual as that it is thrown away. But some say that if there be a public law declaratory that the existence of a certain fact creates ineligibility in the candidate, the elector having notice of the fact is conclusively presumed in law to have knowledge of the legal rule and to be deemed to have voted in persistent disregard of it. Others deny that the maxim "Ignorantia juris excuset neminem," (even with the clause of it, "quod quisque scire tenetur," not often quoted and of which we are reminded by the very thorough brief of the learned counsel for the relator,) can be carried to that length and insist that there does not apply to this question the rule that all citizens must be held to know the general laws of the land and the special law affecting their own locality.

That maxim, in its proper application, goes to the length of denying to the offender against the criminal law a justification in his ignorance thereof; or to one liable for a breach of contract, or for civil tort, the excuse that he did not know of the rule which fixes his liability. It finds its proper application when it says to the elector, who, ignorant of the law which disqualifies, has voted for a candidate ineligible, "Your ignorance will not excuse you and save your vote; the law must stand, and your vote in conflict with it must be lost to you." But it does not have a proper application when it is carried further, and charges upon the elector such a presumption of knowledge of fact and of law as finds him full of the intent to vote in the face of knowledge, and to so persist, in casting his vote for one for whom he knows that it cannot be counted, as to manifest a purpose to waste it. The maxim itself concedes that there may be a lack of actual knowledge of the law. For it is ignorance of it which shall not excuse. Then the knowledge of the law to which each one is held is a theoretical knowledge; and the doctrine urged upon us would carry a theoretical knowledge of the statute further than goes the statute itself. The statute but makes ineffectual to elect the votes given for one disqualified. The doctrine would make knowledge not actual, of that statute thus limited, waste the votes of the majority and bring about the choice to office by the votes of a minority. We are not cited to nor do we find any decision to that extent of any court in this State. The industrious research of the learned counsel for the relator has found some from courts in sister-States. Gulich vs. New (14 Indiana, 97) is to that effect. Carson vs. McPhetridge (15 id., 331) follows the last-cited case. Hatcheson vs. Tilden (4 Har. and McH., 279) was a case at nisi prius, and is to that effect. With respect for these authorities, we are obliged to say that they are not sustained by reasoning which draws with it our judgment. Commonwealth vs. Read (2 Ashmead, 261) is also cited. But that was a case of a board of twenty, assembling in a room to elect a county treasurer. On motion being made to elect viva voce, a protest was made that the law under which they were acting prescribed a vote by ballot. Thus, actual notice of law and fact was brought directly to each elector before voting. Nineteen persisted in voting viva voce. These were held to be wasted votes. One voted by ballot; and his vote was held to prevail, and the person he voted for to be elected. Commonwealth vs. Cluley (56 Pennsylvania State Reports, 270) is also cited. But the language of the court there is: "The votes cast at an election for a person who is disqualified from holding an office are not nullities. They cannot be rejected by the inspectors or thrown out of the count by the return judges. The disqualified person is a person still, and every vote thrown for him is formal." And that was the case of one who was ineligible by reason of having held the office of sheriff of a county, and became a candidate in the same county for the same office before the lapse of time prescribed by the constitution; a case in its facts quite like this in hand.

The relator also cites many instances of the action of legislative bodies and their committees. As to these, a respectable authority on these questions has remarked "that they cannot be said to afford any precise or useful principle," (1 Peckwell, 500;) and learned counsel, arguing in support of the principle now claimed by the relator, has conceded that "no fixed principle is established by the decision of committees," (Galway Election Cases, 2 Moak English Cases, 714;) and it may safely be said that they are not so conclusive and satisfactory as judicial determinations, as it is difficult to arrive at the exact principle upon which the votes of so many as constitute a legislative body are put. Besides that, they are not uniform, but quite diverse in their results, as appears from the citations of the counsel of the relator, and the instances noted in 56 Pennsylvania State Reports, (supra.)

We have consulted many of the authorities cited to us from the English books, and in them it will be found, we think, that where it was held that votes for an ineligible person would be treated as thrown away, it was not extended beyond cases in which there was actual notice of fact and of law to the voters before their votes were cast.

The voter was not presumed to know the law, not bound to know it; but in every case there must be actual notice given before the election of the law and of the fact. The court says:

And there are American authorities which hold that if a majority of those voting, by mistake of law or fact, happen to cast their votes upon an ineligible candidate, it by no means follows that the next to him in poll shall receive the office. (Saunders vs. Haynes, 13 California, 145; State vs. Giles, 1 Chandler, [Wisconsin,] 112; State vs. Smith, 14 Wisconsin, 497.) And in Dillon on Municipal Corporations, (page 176, section 135,) it is stated that unless the votes for an ineligible person are expressly declared to be void, the effect of such person receiving a majority of the votes cast is, according to the weight of American authority and the reason of the matter, (in view of our mode of election, without previous binding nominations, by secret ballot, leaving each elector to vote for whomsoever he pleases,) that a new election must be had, and not to give the office to the qualified person having the next highest number of votes. And this view is sustained by a preponderance of the authorities cited by the author in the foot-note, some of which are cited above.

Now I come to a late English case, which is here referred to thus:

And in the Queen vs. Mayor, &c., (3 Law Reports, [Queen's Bench,] 629,) after holding that though the electors had actual notice of the fact which had been adjudged by the courts to disqualify, yet knowledge or notice in the elector of the adjudication could not be presumed. It is further said: it is not enough to show that the voter knew the fact only; but it is necessary to show sufficient to raise a reasonable inference that he knew that the fact amounted to a disqualification.

That he knew the law which made the fact a disqualification.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me to call his attention to one fact? I presume he has seen the letter of Governor Grover, in which he states that a greater number of persons voted for Mr. Watts than his actual majority of votes who had had business relations with his office and knew the fact that he was postmaster.

Mr. MORTON. I did see that letter and I was astonished at it in more ways than one. In the first place we all know that no attention is paid to the fact who are electors on the ticket by either party. It is a matter of form. Perhaps there was not one person in ten thousand who knew or who remembered that it disqualified a man to hold a Federal office; he may have read that some time, but it was not present in his mind. Perhaps there was not one man in the convention that placed that electoral ticket in nomination who knew that Watts was a postmaster, or if he did, who knew the law that that disqualified him to be an elector. That is what these authorities go to—they go to the point that the voters knew the fact, that is to say, that he was a postmaster, and they must have known affirmatively that that made him ineligible; in other words, their attention must have been called to the law or to the Constitution that made him ineligible.

My friend spoke of the letter of Governor Grover. Governor Grover claimed in that letter that his conduct was sustained by the New York authorities and by the English authorities. It is enough to say that he was absolutely wrong in regard to both assertions. His conduct was not sustained by either, for I am on that very point. The English authorities do not go any further than where actual notice was given of law and of fact to the elector before he cast his ballot or gave his vote, and I am just reading on that very point. I am now reading from an English decision:

"It is not enough to show that the voter knew the fact only; but it is necessary to show sufficient to raise a reasonable inference that he knew that the fact amounted to a disqualification. It cannot be said in all cases that the mere knowledge of a fact, which in law disqualifies a candidate, must be taken to be knowledge of all the accompanying circumstances."

The New York court of appeals, after this citation, go on to say:

We think that the rule is this: The existence of the fact which disqualifies and of the law which makes that fact operate to disqualify must be brought home so closely and so clearly to the knowledge or notice of the elector as that to give his vote therewith indicates an intent to waste it.

All the English authorities on this subject put it upon this ground: that the electors, having absolute notice of the law and the fact, thereafter voted for an ineligible candidate and thereby showed that they intended to waste their votes. In other words, they voted wantonly for a man whom they had been informed was ineligible. Every one of the English authorities speaks of it as showing the intention to waste the vote. It would have to be presumed, then, that the whole republican party in Oregon intended to waste their votes.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator allow me to call his attention to the fact that the attention of the voters of Oregon was called by the democrats to the ineligibility of Mr. Watts as an elector?

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me right here to ask this question? and I should like him to consider it: Suppose it to be the case that all the voters in Oregon were notified of his disability and of the law and of everything connected with it, does that elect the other man under any authority in the United States?

Mr. MORTON. That is just where the difference between the English and the American authorities comes in. It has been held in England that where the voter has been informed affirmatively and directly of the fact and of the law which makes the candidate ineligible, there he is to be regarded as throwing away his vote and the minority candidate is elected; but in America it is held that even such direct and affirmative information in regard to the law and the fact does not have that effect, but that there is no election. That is the difference precisely, and neither doctrine will cover the nakedness of Governor Grover. He is just as clearly unprotected and indefensible under the English doctrine as he is under the American doctrine.

Mr. MAXEY. I will ask the Senator from Indiana, if his position be correct that the American doctrine is that, in the event that ineligibility is brought home actually to the notice of the voter and he casts his vote for the ineligible person after that notice, the party having the minority is not elected, would not the result of that be that Mr. Watts would not be elected? Although Mr. Cronin may not have been elected, was Mr. Watts?

Mr. MORTON. In that case, it would be impossible to show the fact. They vote by ballot in Oregon. Who it was that voted for Watts, the ineligible candidate, nobody can tell. You cannot know that the men who were informed and knew that he was postmaster voted for him. The English doctrine prevails only in cases where there is a small constituency, and generally in cases of corporations, where they have direct notice and they vote viva voce, so that you may know who voted for whom.

Mr. MERRIMON. How are the decisions in your State on that subject?

Mr. MORTON. If my friends will allow me to get along, I will answer any question. So far as the supreme court of Indiana is concerned, I read that decision myself, and I say that did not cover the ground, and it is the only case that can be referred to as giving it any ground to stand on. Even that utterly fails to cover this case, but it is the only case where constructive notice to any extent of the character of the law is maintained.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to say in reply to the Senator from Texas that I think he is in error in his recollection of Governor Grover's card. He does not assert that it was proclaimed on the stump that Watts was a postmaster and ineligible to the office of elector. As I remember, he goes on to recite that in the town where he exercised this office of postmaster it was generally known, and he infers that as many as eleven or twelve or thirteen hundred, the majority which Watts got, must have known the circumstance, and therefore were presumed to know that he was ineligible. I was pretty near that State myself on the Pacific and know pretty well all that transpired there politically during the last election, and I know it was a surprise to the people of Oregon and to the people of California when the statement was made that there was any ineligible elector. The Senator from Oregon was taking part in that contest actively in all parts of the State, and I should like to understand from him whether it was stated on the stump generally or anywhere that Mr. Watts was ineligible, and could not serve if he was elected.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state that I spoke twenty-five times during the last campaign in Oregon. I spoke in nearly every county in the State, and I made twenty-five speeches in all; I was all over the State, and I never heard the question broached or suggested either by republican or democrat, or by any newspaper in the State. I remained in Oregon until the morning of the 11th of November, when I took the steamer for San Francisco, and I never heard the matter broached until I arrived in San Francisco. Then for the first time I saw by telegraph that the question had been raised in Oregon.

Mr. MORTON. I may make this remark in regard to that pretended notice: we know the earnestness of both parties, the desire for success; and we know that if either the democratic party or the republican party of Oregon had had their attention called to the ineligible character of a candidate for elector, they would have made a change at once, a thing easy to do. We are to presume that they have common sense out there as well as everywhere else.

Now, Mr. President, I want to begin to read again where I left off, and I trust my friends will allow me to proceed.

The knowledge must be such, or the notice brought so home, as to imply a willingness in acting when action is in opposition to the natural impulse to save the vote and make it effectual He must act so in defiance of both the law and the fact, and so in opposition to his own better knowledge, that he has no right to complain of the loss of his franchise, the exercise of which he has wantonly misapplied.

To state a truism, our theory of government by the people is upon the assumption that the people, as a whole, are intelligent of their rights and interests, and are honestly and earnestly concerned in the due and wise administration of affairs and zealously alive to the need of good and fitting men in the various places of public trust, and hold in high esteem the privilege of suffrage, and are unready to pretermit its exercise or to exercise it meaninglessly. It is much to presume, with this as our starting point, that any considerable body of electors——

And I call the attention of my friends to this:

It is much to presume, with this as our starting point, that any considerable body of electors will purposely so exercise their right of electing to office as that it shall be but an empty form; and that going through with outward signs of an election they will of intent so cast their ballots as that they will be votes wasted.

Now the finding in this case is that there was no proof of actual notice of Clute's ineligibility, nor of any facts from which notice could be implied, save that he was a supervisor.

There was but this fact, and the law upon the statute-book; sufficient in themselves, as we hold, to render him ineligible.

That is just the case in Oregon. In the case I have just read from, there was but the fact that the man was supervisor and the public law made him ineligible for the office for which he was running, and in this case there was but the fact that the man was postmaster and the Constitution of the United States contained a provision making him ineligible.

But therefrom to give the office to the relator, it is first to be presumed, as a matter of law, that near three hundred of those who voted for Clute had knowledge of the fact that he was supervisor; had knowledge of the existence of the act of 1853; and knew that the fact and the law, concurring thus, he was ineligible to receive and avail himself of their votes in his favor, and knew that their votes given to him were wasted, without effect upon the count.

It is to be presumed further that knowing this they all, though seemingly desirous of taking an effectual participation in the choice of a person to the office of superintendent, deliberately so acted as that they are assumed to have persisted against knowledge; determined to "do nothing but tender their vote for him."

That is the New York doctrine which Governor Grover has referred to as sustaining his action. If he is no nearer right in regard to his other statement than he is in regard to the law of England and the law of New York, there is no reliance to be placed upon anything that he says.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to refer to an extract from the minority report of Senator Carpenter in the Vance and Abbott case in this body. It will be remembered that Senator Carpenter vindicated the right of Abbott to the seat, on the ground that Vance was ineligible and that Abbott, having the next highest number of votes and being qualified, was elected; but in the course of his argument he expressly excepted from the operation of the rule elections by the people and said he confined simply to elections by a legislature or by a corporation board where there was a small constituency. I will now ask the Secretary to read the extract I have marked from Mr. Carpenter's report.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

In a popular election, by ballot, for a member of the House of Representatives, where the voters are numerous and scattered over a considerable territory, it would be impossible to ascertain whether or not the electors, or enough of them to change the result, had knowledge of the disqualification of the candidate. Besides, voting by ballot includes the right of the elector to conceal the fact for which candidate he voted. This is his secret, which cannot be wrested from him even in a court of justice. And they who voted against the successful candidate, yet failed to defeat him at the polls, might attempt to accomplish the same end by pretending to have voted for him with knowledge of his incapacity. Even perjury in such case, should a voter voluntarily swear falsely in regard to it, could never be detected and punished. Such a principle applied to such elections would be unsatisfactory, often incapable of application, and always a temptation to frauds and perjuries, which might be committed with impunity. And it may be conceded that, in determining who has been elected at such popular election by ballot, no candidate not receiving a majority of all votes cast, counting blanks and ballots for disqualified candidates, ought to be declared elected; and that the decisions of the House of Representatives, as applied to the election of its own members, ought to proceed upon a different principle than the one here contended for.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, that extract sets forth clearly the reason why that doctrine cannot be applied to an election by the people by ballot. Whatever might be the rule so far as a Legislature was concerned, or a small corporation where the constituency was small, when you come to a popular election where those voting vote by ballot and you can never tell who voted for the ineligible candidate and the constituency are scattered over a large territory, it would be impossible to ascertain whether there were enough having knowledge of the fact to overcome the majority that the candidate received. I want now to refer to the English authorities that have been cited on the other side to confirm the statement that I make, that they do not go beyond cases where the ineligibility of the candidate as to law and fact was made known to the electors before the election took place. I will refer first to the strongest case on the other side in the English authorities on that subject, the case most quoted, of Gosling vs. Veley, decided in 1848. The chief-justice delivering the opinion of the court said:

Where an elector, before voting, receives due notice that a particular candidate is disqualified, and yet will do nothing but tender his vote for him, he must be taken voluntarily to abstain from exercising his franchise; and, therefore, however strongly he may in fact dissent, and in however strong terms he may disclose his dissent, he must be taken in law to assent to the election of the opposing and qualified candidate, for he will not take the only course by which it can be resisted.

Putting it on the ground of actual information as to law and fact. Again, I read from Rogers on Elections:

In England, where a plurality only is necessary to an election, and where the votes are given orally—

Mark you, "given orally"—

it is also held that if electors have notice of the disqualification of a candidate, every vote given for him afterward will be thrown away and considered as not having been given at all.

Where they vote orally and where they had positive information before as to the fact and the law. Now I want to read from another case which is quoted. I read now from a case in 1 Maule and Selwyn, 76:

Upon the nomination of two aldermen of a borough in order that one of them might be afterward elected mayor pursuant to charter: Held, that votes which were given before notice of the ineligibility of one of the candidates, on account of his not having received the sacrament within one year, were not thrown away so as to authorize the returning officer to return another candidate who was in a minority.

Again:

On the 31st of August, 1812, (the day appointed by the charter,) a meeting of the free burgesses was held, at which two persons of the names of Smith and Sparling, together with the defendant, being all three aldermen of the borough, were put in nomination by the free burgesses. The mayor, having called for a show of hands, declared the majority to be in favor of Smith and Sparling, whereupon a poll was demanded on the behalf of the defendant, and proceeded in. During the progress of the poll, and when the total number of free burgesses who had voted were as follows, namely, for Smith 99, for Sparling 91, and for the defendant 11, the defendant inquired of Sparling if he had taken the sacrament within a year; to which Sparling answered that he had not; whereupon the defendant gave notice to the free burgesses that Sparling was ineligible. A fresh nomination did not take place, but the remainder of the free burgesses were allowed to poll, at the close of which the total numbers were for Smith 133, for Sparling 123, and for the defendant 22; but the mayor, considering Sparling as ineligible on the ground above stated, returned Smith and the defendant to the residue of the aldermen, who afterward elected the defendant to the office of mayor.

That was in 1812. There the court held that the votes which were cast before actual notice was given were to be counted. I take now the case of Rex vs. Hawkins in 10 East's Reports:

If the law be that at the election of corporate officers the votes given for an incapable candidate after notice of such incapacity are to be considered as thrown away, that is, as if the voters had not given any vote at all, then it shall be no election unless the time when notice of his incapacity was given, namely, after two persons had given their votes for each of the persons, can be considered as making any difference.

The general proposition that votes give them a candidate—

I call attention now to the condition—

The general proposition that votes given for a candidate after notice of his being ineligible are to be considered the same as if the persons had not voted at all is supported by—

Various cases which are cited. The whole discussion passes upon the point of notice having been given. The doctrine is predicated on that point. In the case of Key vs. Godwin there was notice given of the ineligibility of the candidate; so in the case also in 14 East that I want to refer to, but I believe the paper is misplaced, the case of The King vs. Parry and Phillips.

Therefore, Mr. President, I may say in general terms that the English doctrine goes no further in any case than to give the minority candidate the election where they vote viva voce and where they have had positive information both as to law and fact of the ineligibility of the candidate.

I now read from Dillon on Municipal Corporations, a very high authority in this country:

Thus, if the law requires freeholders to be chosen for certain officers, the election of a person not a freeholder is void. But unless the votes for an ineligible person are expressly declared to be void, the effect of such a person receiving a majority of the votes cast is, according to the weight of American authority, and the reason of the matter (in view of our mode of election, without previous binding nominations, by secret ballot, leaving each elector to vote for whomsoever he pleases,) that a new election must be held, and not to give the office to the qualified person having the next highest number of votes.—Dillon on Mun cipal Corporations, 258, 259.

I presume there is no better authority than that of Dillon. I have a case here from the Georgia Reports. I read from 12 Georgia Reports:

A person receiving a minority only of the legal votes polled is not entitled to be installed into an office, notwithstanding the incumbent be removed, on account of some personal disqualifications. Under such circumstances a new election will be ordered.—12 Georgia Reports, 23.

I read from the Kentucky Reports, 16 Ben. Munroe, 547, 548:

As the facts respecting Garrett's ineligibility were agreed, no doubt is entertained of the propriety of the action of the board in refusing him a certificate of election. Nor have we any that Stevens was not entitled, in virtue of the election in 1854, to hold the office.

Stevens was the minority candidate in that case and claimed to be elected because Garrett, the majority candidate, was ineligible. The court held that Stevens was not elected.

In 14 Wisconsin Reports, the case of the State ex relatione Off Smith, the court say:

The last question has been already settled in this State by the case of The State vs. Giles, 1 Chandler, 112. It was there held by the unanimous judgment of the court, that, in the absence of a statute declaring it so, the mere ineligibility of a candidate does not render void the votes cast for him; that such votes should not be rejected, but should be counted by the canvassers and that in the event of such ineligible person having the highest number of votes, the person having the next highest number would not be thereby elected.—14 Wisconsin Reports, 498, 499.

I will now read from the American Law of Elections. I will ask the Secretary to read for me, beginning on page 167 and reading over to page 170.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 231. We come now to a question which has been much discussed, and upon which the authorities are somewhat conflicting; it is this: Suppose the candidate who has received the highest number of votes for an office is ineligible, and that his ineligibility was known to those who voted for him before they cast their votes, are the votes thus cast for him to be thrown out of the count, and treated as never cast, and should the minority candidate, if eligible, be declared elected in such a case? No doubt the English rule is, that where the majority candidate is ineligible, and sufficient notice of his ineligibility has been given, the person receiving the next highest number of votes being eligible must be declared elected. Great stress is laid upon the fact of notice having been given, and the reason of the English rule is said to be "that it is willful obstinacy and misconduct in a voter to give his vote for a person laboring under a known incompetency." (Southwark on Elections, page 259.) An examination of the English cases will show that in some of them the election was declared void, and sent back to the people, on the ground that there was not sufficient notice of the incapacity of the successful candidate, while in others the minority candidate was declared elected, on the ground that due notice of the ineligibility of the person receiving the majority was given. The following are some of the principal English authorities upon the subject: Rex vs. Monday, Cowp., page 537; Rex vs. Coe, Heywood, page 361; Rex vs. Bissell, ibid., page 360; Rex vs. Parry, 14 East, 549; Regina vs. Coaks, 28 Eg. L. and Eq., 304, 7 Q. B., 406. Heywood on County Elections, page 535; Male on Elections, page 336; King vs. Hawkins, 10 East, 210; Claridge vs. Evelyn, 5 B. and A., 8; Clarke on Election Committees, page 156; Southwark on Elections, page 259.

SEC. 232. Although the law of the British Parliament, as well as that administered in the courts of that country, recognizes the rule as laid down in the cases just cited, the House of Representatives of the United States has refused to adopt it. See the case of Smith vs. Brown, (2 Bartlett, 395.) in which, in an able report, submitted by Mr. Dawes, chairman of the Committee of Elections, the authorities are reviewed, and the conclusion is reached, "that the law of the British Parliament, in this particular, has never been adopted in this country, and is wholly inapplicable to the system of government under which we live." And the courts of this country generally take the same view.

SEC. 233. Thus, in Commonwealth vs. Cluley, 56 Pennsylvania State Reports, 270, the supreme court of Pennsylvania held that, where at an election for sheriff a majority of the votes are cast for a disqualified person, the next in vote is not to be returned as elected; and the supreme court of California, in Saunders vs. Haynes, (13 California, 145,) holds the same doctrine and enforces it by cogent reasoning; and in Wisconsin we have the same ruling in State vs. Giles, (1 Chandler, 112,) and in State vs. Smith, (14 Wisconsin, 497;) and see opinion of judges, (32 Maine, 597;) State vs. Beal, (46 Missouri, 528;) Cushing Election Cases, 496, 576. And see State vs. Anderson, (1 Cox, New Jersey, 318;) People vs. Clute, (50 New York.) But in Indiana the doctrine of the English authorities has been followed. (Gulich vs. New, 14 Indiana, 93; Carson vs. Phetridge, 15 Indiana, 327.) And see Stewart vs. Hoges, in circuit court of Stephenson County, Illinois, (3 Chicago Legal News, 117.)

SEC. 234. Thus it will be seen that the weight of authority in this country is decidedly against the adoption here of the English doctrine. And we think that sound policy, as well as reason and authority, forbids the adoption of that doctrine in this country. It is a fundamental idea with us that the majority shall rule, and that a majority or at least a plurality shall be required to elect a person to office by popular vote. An election with us is the deliberate choice of a majority or plurality of the electors. Any doctrine which opens the way for minority rule in any case is antirepublican and anti-American. The English rule, if adhered to, would in many cases result in compelling very large majorities to submit to very small minorities, as an ineligible person may receive, and in many cases has received, a great majority of the votes. It is enough in such a case to hold the election void.

SEC. 235. This question was elaborately discussed and settled, so far as the Senate of the United States is concerned, in the case of Joseph C. Abbott, of North Carolina. The decision in that case was against the adoption of the English rule in this country, and Abbott, who, notwithstanding he received only a minority of the votes cast, claimed a seat upon the ground that he was the only eligible person voted for, was declared not elected. And it was distinctly asserted, in the report of the committee, that the fact that the voters have notice of the ineligibility of the candidate at the time they cast their votes for him makes no difference. The remark of Judge Story, in Commonwealth vs. Cluley, [supra,] that "the disqualified person is a person still, and every vote thrown for him is formal," is quoted with approbation. The broad doctrine was asserted that in this country an election by a minority of the persons voting is not to be tolerated under any circumstances. Mr. Carpenter, from the minority of the committee, submitted an elaborate report maintaining the right of Mr. Abbott to the seat, and the debate was exhaustive, but the Senate sustained the majority of the committee.—(Senate Report, No. 58, Forty-second Congress, second session; McCrary's American Law of Elections, pages 167-170.)

Mr. MORTON. I call attention to the decision in the case of The Commonwealth, ex relatione McLaughlin, vs. Cluley, reported in 56 Pennsylvania Reports, where after an elaborate decision Judge Strong, now of the Supreme Court of the United States, held, in delivering the opinion of the supreme court of Pennsylvania:

Where at an election for sheriff a majority of the votes are cast for a disqualified person, the next in vote is not to be returned as elected.—56 Pennsylvania Reports, 270.

Judge Strong, as I said the other day, goes over the whole ground in a very able and learned opinion upon that subject.

I have also here an opinion of the court of Pennsylvania, in the case of The Commonwealth vs. Read, as reported in the Leading Cases on Elections, by Brightly, in which the court say:

It has been held that if the corporate assembly be duly convened and the majority vote for an unqualified person, after notice that he is not qualified, their votes are thrown away, and the person having the next majority, and not disqualified, is duly elected.—Brightly's Leading Cases on Etections, page 129.

That again is another definition of the English rule, that is, it is confined to corporations where they vote viva voce and after positive and affirmative information has been given that the candidate is ineligible.

I have just had a letter put into my hands, which I will ask to be read by the Clerk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

HOLLIDAYSBURGH, PENNSYLVANIA, December 9, 1876.

DEAR SIR: At the October election of 1846, Ephraim Galbreath was the whig candidate for the office of recorder of Blair County, and died on the morning of the election before the opening of the polls. It was found by the return judges that a majority of the votes for recorder were cast for Galbreath, and at the October term of the court of common pleas, held by Hon. Jeremiah S. Black, then president judge, the democratic candidate, Samuel Smith, appeared and asked to be qualified as recorder, on the ground that the votes cast for Galbreath, having been given for a dead man, should be disregarded, and the votes given for the claimant only should be counted.

Judge Black referred to the case of Mr. Wilkes, in the British Parliament, and denounced the seating of Luttrell as a high-handed outrage. He followed the line of argument of those who opposed the seating of Luttrell and declared emphatically that two things were settled by the election in question: first, that the people did want Galbreath; secondly, that they did not want Smith.

The result was that the democratic governor, Shunk, I think, filled the vacancy by the appointment of John M. Gibbony.

Truly yours,

SAM'L S. BLAIR.

Hon. SIMON CAMERON.

Mr. MORTON. The other day the case decided in the House between JOHN YOUNG BROWN and Smith was referred to, where the House held, after a very full and able report from the Committee of Elections, of which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] was the chairman at that time, that the minority candidate was not elected, and that even the English doctrine of positive notice would not elect the minority candidate in this country. I want to show by one or two references that that doctrine has been followed by the House in other cases. I refer to the case of the contest of McKee, from Kentucky:

The first point relied upon by the contestant (Mr. McKee) in his notice is that Mr. Young was disqualified and ineligible to the position of Representative in Congress by reason of disloyalty, and that as such disqualification existed at the time Young was voted for, all votes cast for him were illegal and void and not to be counted, and, as a necessary consequence, that the contestant having received the highest number of legal votes, is duly elected and entitled to the seat. This point has been ably and elaborately argued and decided by this committee and by the House, in the late case of Smith vs. Brown, of Kentucky, and the committee deem it necessary to say no more than that they decline to favor giving the seat to contestants on this ground.—(Contested Election Cases, 1865-1871, pages 427, 428.)

That report was concurred in by the House. Again, in a more recent case, that of Jones vs. Mann, the committee say:

The committee does not consider the evidence adduced by the contestant in regard to Mr. Mann's residence or domicile (Miscellaneous Document No. 13, pages 20, 29 and 30) sufficiently clear and conclusive to justify it in declaring Mr. Mann constitutionally ineligible at the time of his election, even if the evidence on the part of Mr. Mann were rejected; but it is not necessary to decide upon this question of ineligibility, since, if Mr Mann were admitted to have been ineligible at the time of holding the election, and the evidence of this held to be satisfactory and conclusive, it would not aid the contestant nor entitle him to the seat, but would only show that there was a vacancy.—Ibid, 475.

And this report was concurred in by the House.

I have a report here of a recent English case. I find it in a newspaper, but I presume the report is given correctly. It shows that even now in England the American doctrine prevails in regard to the election of a member of Parliament, and that even where positive, affirmative notice is given of the ineligibility of the majority candidate, that will not elect the minority candidate. I ask the Clerk to read what I send to the Chair.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

AN ENGLISH PRECEDENT APPLICABLE TO THE OREGON CASE.

At the general election held in England in 1865 Mr. Forsyth, the present member for Marylebone, was elected member for Cambridge. His election was petitioned against on the ground that he was ineligible in consequence of holding an office of trust and profit under the Crown, he being at the time of his election counsel to the India board. His seat was also claimed by the candidate receiving the next largest number of votes. A committee of the House of Commons, of which Mr. Lowe was chairman, held that the election was void, and declined to seat the other candidate, notwithstanding the fact that personal notice of Mr. Forsyth's ineligibility had been served on a large number of electors. The house unanimously adopted the report of the committee, and ordered the speaker to issue his writ for the election of a member of Parliament in place of Mr. Forsyth, whose seat was declared vacant.

Mr. MORTON. That is a case where recently the American doctrine has been fully recognized by the English Parliament, that even if personal notice were given to the electors it would not elect the minority candidate.

In reference to the action of the governor of Oregon it may be said, in the first place, that the determination upon his part that the postmaster, Watts, was ineligible was a judicial question, one that he had no right to decide. I have examined the constitution of Oregon, and it places in the courts the judicial authority. That was a question he had no right to decide. The governor of Oregon had a simple ministerial duty to perform, and that was to certify who had the highest number of votes. Whether the person having the highest number was ineligible was a judicial question that he had no more power to decide than I have, not living in Oregon at all. The question as to whether the minority candidate was elected was a judicial question of a high character. He had no power to decide it. It was a clear usurpation upon his part. Neither the constitution of Oregon nor of any other State that I know of has conferred judicial powers upon the governor. So far as he is concerned with the electors his duty is simply ministerial, that is, to certify who got the highest number of votes. Whenever he goes beyond that he transcends his duty. For him to undertake to say that Watts was ineligible was to exercise judicial power with which he was never invested, and for him to go beyond that and decide that the minority candidate was elected was the exercise of a judicial power which he did not possess, and it was a decision right in the face of the law, a palpable wrong, for which there is no excuse. None can be offered. In one of the southern states of Europe there used to be a custom that when a man was hanged or executed for a crime, or when he was killed in the commission of a felony, he was to be buried by the roadside, and it was the duty of every traveler who went along to throw a stone upon his grave, so that the monument of his crime might be increased from year to year and from generation to generation; and so in regard to this Oregon transaction, every future historian, from generation to generation, will add comment and condemnation upon that act which will increase its magnitude and its infamy to the latest hour.

REFORM AND RE-ORGANIZATIGN OF THE ARMY.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WRIGHT in the chair.) The Chair understands that the regular order was laid aside temporarily. The Senator from Vermont calls for the regular order, which is Senate joint resolution No. 10.

Mr. WEST. With the consent of the Senator from Vermont, I ask leave to introduce a joint resolution and ask for its consideration.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If it leads to no debate I shall not object.

Mr. WEST. It will lead to no debate.

Leave was granted, by unanimous consent, to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 29) extending the time for the making of a report by the Army commission created by the act of July 24, 1876; and it was read twice and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It extends the period fixed by the fourth section of the act of July 24, 1876, making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, for the submission of the report of the commission named in the section, to the 29th of June, 1877.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 10) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, to insert after the word "appointed," in line 31 of section 1, the following words:

But the court shall, in the discharge of the duties herein provided, disregard errors of form and be governed by the substantial right of the matter.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 55, to insert the word "the" before "case;" so as to read:

The person having the greatest number of votes for Vice-President, to be counted and determined as in the case of President as before provided, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 58, after the word "majority," to insert "the state of the vote shall be immediately certified to the Senate, and;" so as to read:

And if no person have a majority, the state of the votes shall be immediately certified to the Senate, and then, from the two highest numbers on the list, the Senate shall choose a Vice-President.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 62, after the word "Senators," to insert "elected and qualified," and in line 63, after the word "number," to insert "elected and qualified;" so as to read:

A quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators elected and qualified, and a majority of the whole number elected and qualified shall be necessary to a choice.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This concludes the amendments proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I now offer my amendment to come in as an additional section. It has been printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 3. This article shall, if it be ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States on or before the 1st day of February, A. D. 1877, operate upon the opening and counting of the votes, and the ascertaining and declaring the result of the last election, by the Supreme Court; and in case of such ratification, the President of the Senate shall deliver all the lists of votes, certificates, packages and papers in his possession relating to the election of President and Vice-President for the term beginning on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1877, to the presiding justice of the Supreme Court, to be proceeded with as in this article provided.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The honorable Senator from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] now occupying the Chair, has made the very correct suggestion that as in one of the articles themselves the time is a time to be fixed by law, this amendment that I have proposed is defective in not providing a day, inasmuch as the law may not be able to fix a day for this count. I therefore wish to modify the amendment by adding at the end these words:

On a day to be fixed by said court, not later than the 10th day of February, A. D. 1877, and so from day to day until the matter be disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont modifies his amendment in the particular suggested. The question is on the amendment as thus modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendment the resolution will be reported to the Senate and the question will be on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. MERRIMON. I will now offer the amendment that I gave notice of yesterday.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As the resolution has been reported to the Senate, if the Senator would kindly allow us to dispose of the amendments made in committee, I would be obliged to him.

Mr. MERRIMON. Very well.

The amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution is in the Senate and still open to amendment.

Mr. MERRIMON. I will now offer the amendment of which I gave notice yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert after the word "Vice-President," in line 69, the words "or appointed to any office under the United States;" and, in line 70, strike out the word "two" and insert the word "four;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 2. No person holding the office of a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States shall be eligible to be elected as President or Vice-President, or appointed to any office under the United States, until the expiration of four years next after he shall have ceased to be such justice.

Mr. MERRIMON. The object of the amendment is to cut off any possibility that any judge of the Supreme Court would have any hope of benefit at the hands of the President who might be inaugurated in pursuance of the action of his court, to cut off every political consideration or hope of office at the hands of the President. It is due to candor to say that I upon consideration cannot support this joint resolution; but still, if it is to pass, I should like to see it pass in such shape as will be most agreeable to me, and so as to be more effectual to cut off as much as possible what I regard as probably the most serious objection to it, to wit, that of assigning to the Supreme Court a political duty. It is an extraordinary duty, one rather ministerial in its character, and yet it involves political considerations that agitate the whole country, and it would involve the Supreme Court more or less in politics and political considerations. I think the influence and the great power of the Supreme Court consists in its moral weight. Its judgments have a moral force and power that are tremendous. If it shall engage, or if there shall be such provisions in the Constitution and laws as require it to engage, in political controversy, the end of it will be that the court will be brought into contempt, and soon lose much of the moral weight and power that it has on the American mind at this time. The object of my amendment is such as I have indicated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the committee were inclined to the opinion that two years were long enough to make the court absolutely safe from any personal ambitions that might possibly influence their judgment; but so far as I am individually concerned, (of course I have no right to speak for the committee,) four years would be just as agreeable to me, perhaps more so. The other part of the Senator's amendment as to appointment to any office under the United States for the same length of time, strikes me favorably. I shall not, therefore, so far as my present personal views are concerned, make any opposition to the amendment of the Senator, but I incline to think I should vote for it and with pleasure, because the object that he has stated is of course precisely the one that the committee had in view. He only makes it stronger by giving a greater length of time to this exclusion from an office that a President might give to one of the judges, which I think is a very good idea indeed.

But I wish to say just one word in reply to what the Senator has said about the duty of the court being a political duty. Of course, definitions of terms are always extremely difficult to pronounce with exactness, owing to imperfections of language and the capability of words having various senses; but in the sense in which I understand this general proposition, the duty of the Supreme Court is not a political duty any more than its present duty under the Constitution is political duty when it is called upon to pronounce on the constitutionality of any law passed by Congress. Its duty is to apply to certain facts that are laid before it in the way that the Constitution prescribes, the Constitution of the United States, that is, the supreme law of the land. To state it with absolute brevity and conciseness, it is to apply the supreme law of the land to a state of facts that is furnished to it, and pronounce upon it.

I know, of course, as I stated yesterday, that it can be said, and with a certain degree of reason and truth, that the judges of the Supreme Court, like everybody else, citizens of a republic, will have political opinions, and that those political opinions will in a less or greater degree influence, consciously or unconsciously, their action. The good time that we are taught to believe in, when nobody will have a personal interest or political interest in anything, and be absolutely free from bias, has not come. So long as we have human institutions of government there must be committed to somebody, selected in some way, duties the performance of which may be either misdirected or biased by the particular views that the selected agents of the people have upon the general results of such topics. That is perfectly true; but how is it possible in this Republic to remove further from political bias, further from excitement, passion, interest, a matter of this kind than to take that body whose existence is the existence created by the Constitution itself and is not subject to the changes of law and the duration of office, in which each person is always beyond the reach of the law, and the change of the personnel of which from the very nature of the case is always gradual from administration to administration and from year to year or ten years to ten years.

While I see the force, therefore, of what my honorable friend says, I do submit it to the consideration of Senators that this is the nearest possible attainment to founding a tribunal to settle such an important question which has the least objection to it, on the whole.

Mr. MERRIMON. My object, Mr. President, is to protect and shield the Supreme Court from the calumnies and assaults that would be heaped upon it by politicians of all parties if it should discharge such a duty as it is proposed to charge that court with by this proposed amendment to the Constitution. The Supreme Court is virtually constituted a national returning board for the election of President, that election which probably excites the passions of the people more than any other in this country. If we take the present instance to illustrate what we may expect if the law were to-day as it is proposed to make it here, can anybody doubt that if the Supreme Court in the present contingency were to decide one way or the other it would be assailed most violently, its integrity would be questioned, and all sorts of assaults made upon it and it would be brought into contempt on the part of one party or the other? I do not doubt it. If the proposition were to allow Congress or some other power to determine the result of the presidential election in a more satisfactory way than is now provided by the Constitution or the laws and then in case of any legal question arising to allow the Supreme Court to decide that through some means of transferring it to that court for deciding a question of law that should arise, it would meet the sanction of my judgment more readily than it does as it is. This proposition, it seems to me, is to charge the court with a duty that is purely ministerial in its nature and that savors very largely of political considerations, and considerations that affect the people in their organizations as political parties. They are charged with the decision of a matter that will forever excite the passions and the prejudices and the predilections of the people in such a way as that, decide as they will, as honestly as they may, in closely contested elections like the present, for example, the court will be assailed and denounced and brought into contempt, and thereby the moral weight, which is the great power and strength of the court in its hold upon the popular mind of the nation, will be in a great measure impaired. It may be that the dignity, the integrity, and I had almost said the sacredness of that court ought to be protected and shielded not only by the legal profession of the country but by the whole American people from the ordinary calumnies and slanders that are tolerated and encouraged too much by all political parties.

This is the consideration that moves me to oppose this resolution with my vote, and, with a view to remove as far as possible any consideration that might be held out to a judge that could influence by possibility his judgment, I have submitted the amendment I have offered. It seems to me it is in the proper line, and if the joint resolution shall pass I hope the amendment will go in and become a part of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WRIGHT in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEY. Mr. President, I propose to call one matter to the attention of the Senator from Vermont who has this joint resolution in charge. If I understood him yesterday, as well as the Senator from New York, they seemed to think that the provisions of this proposed amendment would prevent the President and Vice-President from being citizens of the same State. It does say that the electors shall vote for President and Vice-President, one of whom shall not be an inhabitant of the State in which they reside. But suppose that at the last election the electors of the State of New York had voted for Tilden and Hendricks and the electors of every other State had voted for Tilden and Wheeler, would not Tilden and Wheeler, both residents of the same State, have been elected, and yet the electors have complied with this provision of the amendment as well as of the Constitution of the United States as it now stands? If the object is to prevent them being residents of the same State, does this do it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think it does, and the present Constitution does not do it, for this is the present Constitution word for word in that respect.

Mr. KEY. Yes, sir; but I understood the remarks of the Senator from New York (and the Senator from Vermont seemed to concur with him) to go on the other hypothesis.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The other hypothesis undoubtedly is the hypothesis on which the makers of the Constitution proceeded and upon which the committee proceeded; and we puzzled our heads for two or three evenings, I remember, over that conundrum and we could not see any way to settle it, for if you say (which is a change that we did not propose to make in the Constitution, because we only wished to direct this resolution to one single point) that the President and Vice-President shall not come from the same State, and have the election by separate States as the Constitution now is, there is no way of the electors in each State knowing who the other electors are going to vote for, and you might produce a failure to elect every time. It was thought as a practical thing, this being the spirit and the idea that are held out and carried by prohibition as far as they can be practically, that it would result as a matter of fact, although theoretically it might result otherwise, in having the President from one State and the Vice-President from another State, as it always has. But the criticism of my honorable friend from Tennessee upon the present Constitution and upon this re-enactment of that part of it is, I think, substantially correct.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I wish to say a word in reply to the suggestion made by my friend from Tennessee, whose mind I did not succeed in bringing clearly yesterday to the point of the observation I intended to make. Article 12 of the amendments to the Constitution as it now stands reads thus:

The electors—

In the plural, the Senator will observe:

The electors shall meet in their respective States, and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves.

I need not suggest to the Senator that that language is open to these two constructions; first, the construction that it is a prohibition imposed upon each elector severally that he shall not vote for two persons each of whom resides in the State of which he is an elector; and second that it means that the electors, speaking of them in general, shall not do this thing. To make more clear what I mean, here comes a certificate from the State of Tennessee; on being opened it turns out that two persons both resident in Tennessee have five votes each, one for President and one for Vice-President, and the votes under this present Constitution have been cast by the electors by ballot. In the first place it would not be easy to ascertain whether the same five persons, if there were five, who voted for one of those candidates resident in, Tennessee, also voted for the other. But again, if you had ascertained how the fact was, it would not be perfectly transparent under this provision of the Constitution whether it had been violated at all, provided, that the five persons who voted for a President from Tennessee were not the same five electors who voted for another resident of Tennessee for Vice-President. This very case has occurred. I remember on the count of the votes, I think the very last time, in 1873, the attention of the two Houses sitting in conference was called by the tellers to the fact that in one instance—I will not stop to remember the State—votes had been given for a person for President and a person for Vice-President each of them resident in that State. The Houses were about to separate. The fact appeared on this certificate, and I remember myself asking the tellers to state whether it could be gleaned from the certificate that the same electors who voted for one of those persons also voted for the other. On reading the conclusion of the certificate in that case the electors, it turned out, had added that although these two persons both resident in the same State appeared by that certificate to have received a certain number of votes each, the truth was that the presidential electors who voted for the one for President were not the same presidential electors who voted for the other for Vice-President, but other and different. It was a mere coincidence that the number of votes cast for each was precisely the same, it being untrue that in either instance the same elector had voted for both.

Not having the pending amendment before me, I spreak of it from recollection, but I well remember that it was the purpose of the committee to ascertain and settle that doubt. Therefore, in language aimed at each elector, and visiting each one separately, the committee proposed to ordain that no single elector should vote for candidates from the same State for the two offices and that voting viva voce each should manifest and record the fact that he did not so vote, to the end that it would become matter of record, be patent and permanent. That was the suggestion which I intended to make yesterday in reply to an inquiry why it was that the Constitution as it now stands had been changed by providing in the pending amendment that the votes of electors should be given viva voce and not given by ballot, as is now provided. I think the Senator from Tennessee must see the purpose very clearly, and that this answers that purpose if it be desirable to answer it.

Referring for one moment to the case the Senator put of electors, under the present Constitution or under the Constitution as it shall turn out to be, prohibited from voting for candidates both resident in their own State, but nevertheless leaving all the other States through their electors privileged to elect both the candidates in another State, I inquire of the Senator what is the objection to it? What is the practical objection to it? What objection to it does he find written on the face of the present Constitution? If my friend will pardon me a moment before he answers, I need not ask him—I might ask a less intelligent Senator and be sure that he could tell me—why it was that the framers of the Constitution discouraged the idea of the electors of a State seeking to locate in that State both the candidates. The preponderance of the large States, the opportunities certain to occur and the still greater opportunities not unlikely to occur of particular States asserting separately or by combination undue influence on this subject, are quite enough to teach us why it was that the framers of the Constitution forbade the electors of each State from attempting to put within the limits of that State both the chief executive officers of the Republic. But that reason, the honorable Senator will see, is not at all applicable to a case in which other States, distant States looking over the country, or the electoral colleges upon the old theory exercising discretion looking over the whole country find the two foremost or fittest men in their estimation happening to reside in a single State. The people and the electors of that State being checked and restrained from making such a selection, the framers of the Constitution stopped, and they said it is wise enough to leave distant, external communities, thus uninfluenced by the local considerations free to locate where they please these officers in a State not their own. Therefore the committee, as I believe the Senator from Vermont indicated so clearly that I need not repeat it, did not feel bound to aim at a change of the Constitution in that regard, but only to make such change as should render certain what might otherwise be regarded as an ambiguity and furnish the evidence which would always make manifest to the two Houses meeting in joint conference on an occasion of counting the votes whether the Constitution had been observed or disregarded.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, I desire to make an inquiry of the Senator from Vermont, and I do not know but I may require information as to one point. The same language which is in the twelfth amendment is retained in this proposed amendment, which provides that the electors shall not vote for two persons who are inhabitants of the same State with themselves. That language in the same words will be found in the original Constitution retained in the twelfth amendment and also retained in this. I presume the object of this language was to prevent these two high positions being filled from the same State. Am I right in that view, I would ask the Senator?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Partly, and partly not. As has already been stated by myself and by my honorable friend from New York in reply to the Senator from Tennessee, the committee saw plainly enough, under the present Constitution and under this amendment which follows it except as to voting viva voce, and making each one vote for some one not an inhabitant of his State, that while the spirit and object of the Constitution was undoubtedly to separate these two great offices into different States, yet it was substantially impracticable to do so other and further than by providing that the electors of one State should themselves not vote for two inhabitants of their own State. The change in the phraseolology we have made, as the Senator from New York has perfectly explained, is to put it upon each elector instead of as in the old language, upon the body voting viva voce, that no one of them separately shall vote for President and Vice-President being inhabitants of the same State with himself; and we propose that change in order to make it clear on the record as a duty on each one and showing which one, if any, did it. The italics indicate the change, because the original text is word for word the old Constitution. At the top of page 2 of the print the italics show what the change is, and the object has been stated.

Mr. BOGY. Even with that explanation it might be that this should no longer be retained in any amendment, because, if the object was originally to prevent the election of these two high officials from the same State, it is not at all accomplished by this language. Why then retain it? Why not simplify it? It is meaningless. It is really, with all respect to the committee who reported this resolution and to the framers of the Constitution, also nonsensical. For instance, while it is true that the electors in the State of New York could not have voted for Tilden and Wheeler, as they are prohibited by the Constitution from voting for two persons being inhabitants of the same State with themselves, yet, supposing the electors from every other State in the Union had voted for Tilden and Wheeler, they certainly would be elected President and Vice-President of the United States. Would not that be so? That being so why retain this language?

Mr. CONKLING. What is the objection to that, may I ask?

Mr. BOGY. The objection is this: why put anything in the Constitution which has no meaning? because the text of it accomplishes nothing. "The electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State as themselves." That is the twelfth amendment, which is substantially retained in the proposed amendment. The proposed amendment is this:

The electors shall meet in their respective States, and each elector shall vote viva voce for President and Vice-President, one of whom at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with himself.

Substantially, as far as the point I desire to make is concerned, the language is the same. The object was to prevent the selection of these two persons from the same State. That object is not accomplished at all.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the honorable Senator let me interrupt him a moment?

Mr. BOGY. With pleasure.

Mr. CONKLING. Suppose in the State of New York the 1,000,018 voters who deposited their ballots had been so equally divided that certain of the democratic electors had been chosen and certain of the republican electors, and they had met in the electoral college twenty-five on the one side and ten on the other, making the thirty-five electors. The candidate for Vice-President on one side having been designated in New York and the candidate for President having been designated from the same State on the other side, the Senator will see that these electors, in order to preserve their faith and observe their obligations, would vote ten, if the democratic electors were ten, for Mr. Tilden for President and ten for Mr. Hendricks for Vice-President; the republican electors, preserving their faith, would vote, twenty-five for Governor Hayes, of Ohio, for President and Mr. Wheeler, of New York, for Vice-President. There the Senator has the case for which this expressly provides, because it ordains or means to ordain if it shall become a part of the Constitution that each elector for himself shall in no case vote for two persons both of whom reside in the State whereof he is an elector, but each elector shall vote for persons one of whom is a resident elsewhere.

If I am not right in this, or if the Senator's suggestion is correct that such a result would be objectionable, that we ought to provide against it, will the honorable Senator tell me what would be the issue or result of such a case as I have stated of electors some on the one side and some on the other being chosen in a particular State where one candidate of one party for one office happened to be a resident of that State and another candidate on the other side happened to be resident of that State if he had a provision under which no elector or all of them together could so vote as that votes should be cast for two persons resident in that State? He does not confine it to separating that privilege from each elector; and how could he fail to overthrow and vitiate the result and intention of the popular election? And my honorable friend from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] reminds me that only as recently as 1860, in one of the States, I think New Jersey, the electoral vote was divided, some of the electors being on one side and some being on the other. Now the Senator will see that but for this, under such a construction as would prevent any elector from so voting, votes would come out of the electoral college for two persons from the same State, and the result of the election would be defeated.

Mr. BOGY. I fully understand the explanation made by the Senator from New York and I coincide with him; and yet it does not meet the objection which I raised, but I presume I have not been happy in making myself plain. As I understand the object of this provision, both in the original Constitution and in the twelfth amendment, and it is retained in this proposed amendment, it is to prevent the selection of two persons by the people of the United States as President and Vice-President who are inhabitants of the same State. That is the great object; but as the inhibition is only confined to the electors of each State, that is the electors of each State shall not vote for two persons being inhabitants of the same State with themselves, the great object which was to prevent the selection of these two men from inhabitants of the same State is not at all accomplished, is not at all effected. It amounts to nothing at all because they can be selected by the electors of different States. The point that I am trying to make and the point made by the Senator from New York are entirely different; but if I am correct in this, it seems to me this language should disappear from the Constitution, for it does not accomplish the object.

It will be observed in the old Constitution, and also in the twelfth amendment, that this inhibition was not carried to the selection of Vice-President by the Senate because there the Senators are confined to the two persons having received the highest number of votes. There is no inhibition on the Senate that they shall not vote for a person who is also a citizen of the same State as the person who may have been elected, for instance, President by the lower House, or may have been elected by the people. In that way, even under the old Constitution, the President and Vice-President might be inhabitants of the same State, and they can be now under this proposed amendment. If, therefore, the object were as I suppose it is conceded was the object, to provide a mode which should prevent that from being ever accomplished, that these two persons should be inhabitants of the same State, that object is not at all accomplished by the words used in this amendment, in the preceding amendment of 1801, or in the original Constitution. I may be entirely at fault about this matter; and if I am I should like to be set right.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was read the third time, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of each House concurring therein,) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid as a part of the Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE XII.

That the twelfth article of the amendments of the Constitution be, and the same is hereby, abrogated, and in the place thereof the following be, and the same is hereby, ordained and established, namely:

The electors shall meet in their respective States, and each elector shall vote viva voce for President and Vice-President, one of whom at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with himself; they shall name the person voted for as President, and separately the person voted for as Vice-President; and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President and all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each, and of the electors voting for the same; which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the presiding justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. And the Supreme Court, at a time and place to be fixed by law, shall publicly open all the certificates and count the votes, and the person having the greatest number of votes for President, considered by the court to have been lawfully given and certified, shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors lawfully appointed; but the court shall, in the discharge of the duties herein provided, disregard errors of form, and be governed by the substantial right of the matter; and if no person have such majority, the state of the votes shall be immediately certified to the House of Representatives, and then, from the persons having the highest number not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by a viva voce vote, the President; but the vote shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote; and if the votes of any State shall not show a majority for any one candidate, the vote of such State shall not be reckoned. A quorum of the House of Representatives for the purpose of such election shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice; and if, on the first vote, there shall be a failure to elect, further votes shall immediately continue to be taken until a President shall be elected.

And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President, when the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the 4th day of March next following, then the Vice-President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President. The person having the greatest number of votes for Vice-President, to be counted and determined as in the case of President as before provided, shall be Vice-President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed. And if no person have a majority, the state of the votes shall be immediately certified to the Senate, and then, from the two highest numbers on the list, the Senate shall choose a Vice-President; a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators elected and qualified, and a majority of the whole number elected and qualified shall be necessary to a choice. But no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice-President of the United States.

SEC. 2. No person holding the office of a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States shall be eligible to be elected as President or Vice-President, or appointed to any office under the United States, until the expiration of four years next after he shall have ceased to be such justice.

SEC. 3. This article shall, if it be ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States on or before the 1st day of February, A. D. 1877, operate upon the opening and counting of the votes and the declaring the result by the Supreme Court; and in case of such ratification, the President of the Senate shall deliver all the lists of votes, certificates, packages, and papers in his possession relating to the election of President and Vice-President for the term beginning on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1877, to the presiding justice of the Supreme Court, to be proceeded with as in this article provided, on a day to be fixed by said court, not later than the 10th day of February, A. D. 1877, and so from day to day until the matter be disposedof.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. BOGY. I ask that this question be laid over. It has been my intention for some days to say something on this important subject, and I would request as a matter of personal favor that it be postponed until to-morrow. I know and fully appreciate the importance of time in regard to this question; I commend the motives of the Senator from Vermont both in pressing this question before the Senate and also in his anxiety to have it disposed of as soon as possible; but I am not prepared to speak now. I desire to say something; I have some views on this question which I feel it to be my duty to explain, at least for the information of the citizens of my own State. I hope therefore that the subject will be laid over and to-morrow, when, if I am able, I shall ask the courtesy of the Senate to allow me to express my views. I regret the necessity, but it has been utterly out of my power to prepare myself at all. I intended to have done so last evening, but I was engaged on a committee which occupied my time.

Mr. MORTON. I unite with the Senator from Missouri in the hope that this joint resolution will be laid over for the present. I should prefer that it go over until next week. Here we are about to vote on a most important constitutional amendment with scarce any consideration. The consideration it has received up to this time really amounts to nothing, and the more I look at this resolution the more I am satisfied that it ought to be carefully considered. I trust that in view of its great importance, to give Senators time to examine it, it will go over until next week.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is the furthest possible from my desire, as it is from that of the committee, I have no doubt, to unduly press this proposition upon the attention of the Senate; but we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that the present condition of affairs is far from being satisfactory in a legal point of view, and that if there is any measure that shall meet the approval, expressed in a constitutional way, of the people of the United States to settle what is confessedly a serious difficulty, one that alarms a great many people, and one out of which it is not easy to see a clear road now, that way ought to be as speedily taken as due consideration will allow. I think everybody will agree to that.

This amendment is not a new thing. It has been on the tables of Senators for more than six months; it was reported on the 12th of May; and yet at the same time listening to what the Senator from Missouri has said and the Senator from Indiana, I certainly do not feel at liberty really to insist upon coming to a vote upon it to-day, although it is extremely inconvenient to some gentlemen who are obliged by their duties to depart out of the city; but of course it is a matter of great importance and one that ought not to be passed hastily, neither ought it to be overdelayed so that if it is passed there may be some chance that the other House may have an opportunity to act upon it deliberately and diligently, and some chance that the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States may have a reasonable time to act upon it, in order that in the present momentous state of affairs which certainly exists, of anxiety if not of alarm, on the part of a large portion of the people of the United States, there should be some means found of getting on, and if on the other hand it should fail, then we ought not to be slow, but ought to be diligently deliberate in trying to find some other means of reaching a concurrent judgment in respect of the method and the scope of ascertaining the result of the last presidential election. So then, whether this is to fail or to succeed, it appears to me that we ought to dispose of it at the earliest moment consistent with what I conceive to be proper and due deliberation. I shall therefore consent to allow this resolution to go over until to-morrow, when I should hope that it would be disposed of. I will move, if necessary, to postpone it until to-morrow with the understanding that it shall be the unfinished business.

Mr. MORTON. I suggest to the Senator to let it go over until Monday. I think that is little time enough for a proposition of this very important character. I venture to say that there are scarcely two lawyers in the Senate who would agree about the extent of the jurisdiction to be conferred on the Supreme Court by this amendment. It calls upon us, for the sake of an emergency, to re-enact two of the most dangerous and I think two of the most objectionable provisions in the Constitution of the United States; to re-affirm, to establish anew the electoral college with all its dangers and all its faults, and to re-affirm and enact anew that the House of Representatives, each State having one vote, may elect the President of the United States. Before we commit ourselves to a further declaration in favor of these things at the end of one hundred years, when I believe that the thinking men of this country are satisfied both ought to be wiped out, we ought to have some time to consider. I hope my friend will let the resolution go over until next week.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I cannot consent to do that. That part of the Constitution and of this proposition which the Senator wishes to deliberate upon has been under the eye of the American people for nearly a century and nobody has succeeded in getting a vote in either House to change it in this whole century, and therefore it is not a novel proposition, and this proposition of the committee merely leaves that as it is. It does not undertake in trying to effect one object to reach half a dozen at the same time. Assuming that my honorable friend is perfectly correct, as I certainly should not agree in the fact, that the present Constitution is not right in the respect he mentions, it is the present Constitution and we all know what it means; but when you come to the point that this amendment does speak to, and that is not changing the character of the Government but providing a means of ascertaining what the will of the States is under the Constitution in the selection of President, and nothing else, then you have a question that is very simple and that is wholly disconnected from the question of whether the present institution of our system is the wisest possible or not or whether you can ever overturn it. My honorable friend may overturn it to-morrow if he can; and yet that does not affect the rightness or the wrongness of what we are endeavoring to do; and that is, taking our institutions as they are, to endeavor to provide a clear and definite remedy for what the Constitution does not seem to speak clearly and definitely upon, as to where the power lies to regulate and provide for ascertaining the will of the people under the Constitution as it is. So then, Mr. President, inasmuch as we have only two months before this present question must be determined in some way, it appears to me that we ought to be sufficiently in earnest one way or the other to dispose of this measure as soon as reasonable debate will allow.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I would suggest as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] has indicated his readiness to discuss this subject to-morrow, that it is enough for us to decide at present to let it go over until to-morrow, and when to-morrow comes we can consider it further.

Mr. MORTON. There is a bill on our table which has twice passed the Senate, at the last session and the session before, to provide a method for counting electoral votes. After having passed at the last session, a motion was made to reconsider; which was adopted. The third reading was then reconsidered, and the bill is now before the Senate. If the emergency is simply the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President in February next, I suggest to my honorable friend from Vermont that he turn his attention to passing a bill providing for that and providing for that emergency only; but do not let us under the pressure of that emergency on a single case be driven into a constitutional amendment to last for all time, and driven into the re-enactment of the two most antirepublican and antidemocratic and the two most dangerous provisions of that instrument. Neither of them is republican; neither of them is democratic.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I should like to have an executive session.

Mr. WRIGHT. Before that is done, I ask unanimous consent at this time to make a report on a little bill from the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Chair will receive it.

COURTS IN ARKANSAS.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 155) to amend sections 533, 556, 571, and 572 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to courts in Arkansas and other States, which passed the Senate at the last session and went to the House and was sent back with an amendment, have instructed me to report it back and recommend that the Senate do not concur in the amendment of the House. I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives, which was on page 2, line 6, to strike out the words, "the eastern district of Arkansas at Helena," and add to the section, "and in the eastern district of Arkansas the terms of the circuit court shall be held at Helena at the same time as the terms of the district court."

Mr. WRIGHT. I only desire to say that the original bill provided that the district court should have circuit court jurisdiction. This amendment proposes that the term to be held at Helena shall be held as a circuit court. We do not propose to concur in that amendment.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at three o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 12, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

REFORM SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, ETC.

Mr. WILLARD. I ask unanimous consent to have read and referred to the Committee on Appropriations the memorial which I send to the Clerk's desk.

There being no objection, the memorial was read as follows, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Whereas it is well known to your honorable body that, except the work-house and the common jail, there is no provision in the capital of the United States for the shelter of young ruined, deserted girls, who are driven by desperation to the fearful crimes of abortion and child-murder, nor for helpless infants, who are therefore subjected to violent death or to death by exposure on our streets, nor for the training and reformation of girls who have become vicious and abandoned, and are peopling the country with criminals;

And whereas existing laws in this District are so framed and executed as to protect men in the highest crimes against the souls and bodies of women and of poor, ignorant, and misguided girls, men of all ages and stations being permitted to seduce, or liberally reward procuresses for securing for them, new victims at every convenient opportunity, and being allowed to abandon the mothers and disown the children born out of wedlock, while all the legal penalties fall only upon the wretched mother;

And whereas all criminal legislation, to be permanently effective should tend toward reform and remedy, toward the abolition of arbitrary, cruel, and barbarous distinctions against the weak and in favor of the strong, toward justice to women and kindness to children, toward securing to the State a multitue of trained, intelligent, and useful citizens, instead of an ignorant and vicious generation of outcasts and criminals, and should provide as liberally for the direct and immediate consequences of vice as it provides ways and means to fall into temptation and sin;

And whereas the District Legislature in 1873, in response to a petition from our best citizens, granted a charter for the establishment of a Girls' Reform School, and made an appropriation for the purchase of land, provided Congress would order the construction of buildings, which appropriation for land was lost through the failure of the Forty-third Congress to pass the bill for the construction of buildings, reported favorably by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds;

And whereas the long delay in making provision for these classes of persons has led to terrible suffering among young women and to fearful slaughter of infant life;

And whereas it has appeared in debate that there is a general kindly feeling in the House of Representatives toward the establishment of a suitable institution for these classes, and that negligence in passing the bill has not arisen from ignorance of the need, nor from indifference, but from the fact that the persons to be provided for are women, and not your constituents, while you believe it to be your first and constant duty to pass such measures as your constituents imperatively demand;

And whereas, although we cannot declare that your constituents imperatively demand this measure, we do declare that your constituents, the men of the United States, are largely responsible for the moral and social atmosphere and condition of the capital of the nation, and may more appropriately be taxed for the protection and care of these wretched women and for the education and training of their unfortunate children than for their arrest and punishment as criminals;

And whereas the citizens of this District support fifteen benevolent institutions which do not depend upon Congress for aid, although receiving inmates from every part of the United States and from every quarter of the globe, while Congress entirely supports but three and partially supports but four benevolent institutions, all of which are national in their character;

And whereas the care of the persons described in this memorial has fallen for years mainly on a few women, who are wholly unable to bear the expense or to save the sufferers from exposure and subsequent degradation: Therefore,

We pray your honorable body to immediately take from the Calendar H. R. bill No. 3765, add thereto the appropriations named therein as limits to the cost for land and for buildings for a Shelter for the Sick, an Infants' Home and a Reform School for Girls, and enact the same in such manner that it may be speedily effective.

And we further pray that you will appropriate a sum to be immediately available for the shelter and care of urgent cases of young women about to become mothers, in temporary quarters, until suitable buildings shall be constructed.

Board of trustees.—Sara J. Spencer, president; E. D. E. N. Southworth, vice-president; Ellen H. Sheldon, corresponding secretary; Susan A. Edson, M. D., recording secretary; Mrs. Le Droict Langdon, treasurer; A. G. Riddle, solicitor; John F. Cook, auditor.

Citizens.—R. J. Meigs, clerk supreme court District of Columbia; G W. Phillips, District marshal; A. S. Solomons; Simon Wolf, recorder of deeds; Arthur McArthur, associate judge supreme court; Francis Miller; William Tindall; George F. Schayer; John Hitz; C. E. Prentiss; Charles H. Nichols, superintendent Hospital for Insane; A. C. Richards, superintendent of police; William B. Snell, judge of police court; D. K. Cartter, chief justice District court; J. O. Wilson, superintendent public schools; Ellen C. Sargent; Lucretia R. Garfield; Helen L. Sumner; Nellie B. Thompson; Rosina M. Parnell; Martha A. Snell; Frederick Douglass; C. Kennedy; A. S. Pratt; O. C. Wight; Mrs. A. G. Riddle; J. E. Rankin; Alex. T. Stuart, general secretary Young Men's Christian Association; M. A. S. Cary, and others.

I wish that this bill might be passed, and the sooner the better.

HENRY H. WELLS, District Attorney.

There is most pressing necessity for this institution. Common humanity demands it.

J. H. THOMPSON,
Surgeon-in-Chief Columbia Lying-in Hospital.

JOHN W. JENNINGS.

Mr. THROCKMORTON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read and referred to the Committee of Accounts:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be authorized and required to pay John W. Jennings, late assistant doorkeeper, the salary of such officer from the date of his discharge, September 15, 1876, up to the day of the meeting of the second session of the Forty-fourth Congress, the 4th of December, 1876.

BLANKETS FOR REFORM SCHOOL.

Mr. BUCKNER, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 169) authorizing the Secretary of War to supply blankets to the Reform School in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

IRENA GARRETT.

Mr. MONROE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table and have referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions Senate bill No. 980, granting a pension to Irena Garrett. I make this request on account of information received of suffering in a family which is entitled to the pension.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

MANUFACTURE AND SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

Mr. BLAIR, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 170) to amend the Constitution of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask unanimous consent that this joint resolution be read at length and also published in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The joint resolution reads as follows:

Joint resolution to amend the Constitution of the United States.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of each House concurring therein,) That the following amendment to the Constitution be, and hereby is, proposed to the States, to become valid when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, as provided in the Constitution:

ARTICLE —.

SECTION 1. From and after the year of our Lord 1900 the manufacture and sale of distilled alcoholic intoxicating liquors or alcoholic liquors any part of which is obtained by distillation or process equivalent thereto, or any intoxicating liquors mixed or adulterated with ardent spirits or with any poison whatever, except for medicinal, mechanical, chemical, and scientific purposes, and for use in the arts anywhere within the United States and the Territories thereof, shall cease; and the importation of such liquors from foreign states and countries to the United States and Territories and the exportation of such liquors from and the transportation thereof within and through any part of this country except for the use and purposes aforesaid shall be, and hereby is, forever thereafter prohibited.

SEC. 2. Nothing in this article shall be construed to waive or abridge any existing power of Congress, nor the right which is hereby recognized of the people of any State or Territory to enact laws to prevent the increase and for the suppression or regulation of the manufacture, sale, and use of liquors and the ingredients thereof, any part of which is alcoholic, intoxicating, or poisonous, within its own limits, and for the exclusion of such liquors and ingredients therefrom at any time, as well before as after the close of the year of our Lord 1900; but until then and until ten years after the ratification hereof as provided in the next section, no State or Territory shall interfere with the transportation of said liquors or ingredients in packages safely secured over the usual lines of traffic to other States and Territories wherein the manufacture, sale, and use thereof for other purposes and use than those excepted in the first section shall be lawful: Provided, That the true destination of such packages be plainly marked thereon.

SEC. 3. Should this article not be ratified by three-fourths of the States on or before the last day of December, 1890, then the first section hereof shall take effect and be in force at the expiration of ten years from such ratification; and the assent of any State to this article shall not be rescinded nor reversed.

SEC. 4. Congress shall enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

JEFFERSON BOWERS.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table a bill (H. R. No. 1588) for the purpose of concurring in the Senate amendments.

Mr. BLAND. I do not object to any mere reference; but I do object to bringing up any measure for action, and desire to call attention to the twenty-first joint rule.

Mr. STEVENSON. This is a bill granting a pension. The Senate has reduced the amount fixed in the House bill; and I ask that the House may concur in that amendment.

Mr. BLAND. I demand the regular order—the business of the morning hour.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his objection and let these amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

Mr. BLAND. I have no objection to the request of the gentleman, if it creates no debate.

There being no objection, Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1588) granting an additional pension to Jefferson Bowers, of Mason County, Illinois, were taken from the Speaker's table and read as follows:

In lines two and three of the bill strike out "at an increased rate of pension" and insert "at the rate of $4 per month."

In line 5 strike out "according to his present disabilities" and insert "which shall be in lieu of the pension now received by him."

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. STEVENSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAUPERS IN PROVIDENCE HOSPITAL, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HARDENBERGH, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Military Affairs a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from the Surgeon-General concerning the support of certain paupers in the Providence Hospital, Washington, District of Columbia, and moved that the same be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARDENBERGH moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOINT RULES.

Mr. BLAND. I desire to call the attention of the Speaker to the twenty-first joint rule, and to demand the announcement of the morning hour so that the House may resume business where we left off last session.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] demands the business of the morning hour; and the morning hour now commences at twelve o'clock and thirty minutes p. m. The gentleman from Missouri directs the attention of the Chair to the twenty-first joint rule, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After six days from the commencement of a second or subsequent session of Congress, all bills, resolutions, or reports which originated in either House, and at the close of the next preceding session remained undetermined in either House, shall be resumed and acted on in the same manner as if an adjournment had not taken place.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, this is not only a joint rule, but——

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that no debate is in order. If the recollection of the Chair is correct, the Committee on Mines and Mining at the last session exhausted their two hours and the question was on seconding the demand for the previous question upon the bill reported by them.

Mr. BLAND. The committee exhausted their time for reports and only called for action on the bill.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. The attention of the Chair has been called by the gentleman from Missouri to what is denominated the twenty-first joint rule. While I have no disposition to object to the resumption of the order of business to which the gentleman calls attention, I ask that Rule 136 of the House be read.

The SPEAKER. The rule will be read:

The Clerk read as follows:

136. After six days from the commencement of a second or subsequent session of any Congress, all bills, resolutions, and reports which originated in the House, and at the close of the next preceding session remained undetermined, shall be resumed and acted on in the same manner as if an adjournment had not taken place. And all business before committees of the House at the end of one session shall be resumed at the commencement of the next session of the same Congress, as if no adjournment had taken place.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the one hundred and thirty-sixth rule of the House corresponds exactly with the requirements of the twenty-first joint rule. As the joint rule is arbitrary, using the word "shall," the Chair decides that the unfinished business in the morning hour at the last session has under that rule preference this morning and its consideration will be resumed accordingly.

Mr. GARFIELD. Under which rule?

The SPEAKER. Under both rules, the twenty-first joint rule as well as under the one hundred and thirty-sixth House rule.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Ohio on the point of order.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make no objection to the ruling of the Chair as to the resumption of the unfinished business of last session, because the one hundred and thirty-sixth rule of the House is conclusive on that point, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] has the right to call up his bill; but if the ruling of the Chair implies that the twenty-first joint rule is in existence and binding upon this House, I most respectfully appeal from that decision.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I did not believe it was necessary to appeal from the decision of the Chair, believing that the point made by the gentleman from Missouri under the one hundred and thirty-sixth rule of the House is correct, and that the unfinished business under the rule of the House should be resumed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not take the appeal from the decision of the Chair so far as it relates to the one hundred and thirty-sixth rule of the House.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. But the one hundred and thirty-sixth rule covers that point, and the question therefore does not arise whether the twenty-first joint rule is in force or not. Before the Chair decides the question whether the joint rules are in force, I wish to say there are some gentlemen on this side of the House who desire to be heard.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not wish at all to delay the business of the House. I agree perfectly in the ruling of the Chair so far as it relates to the one hundred and thirty-sixth rule, and that is all that directly concerns us in this case. But the Chair has based his ruling in part upon the supposed authority of the joint rules. I wish to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the very joint rules which have been referred to are not printed as the joint rules of this Congress, even in our own Digest. The heading in the edition of Barclay's Digest just published is as follows: "Joint rules and orders of the two Houses as they existed at the close of the Forty-third Congress."

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that that was put in without the authority of anybody who had the right to do it.

Mr. GARFIELD. Besides the authority of the Digest, I refer the Chair to the Journal of this House—the official record whose authority will not be questioned. It has been the uniform practice of all who have kept the Journal of the House hitherto to insert the rules of the House and the joint rules of the House and Senate for the Congress to which the Journal relates. Here is the Journal of the House for the last session. The rules of the House for this Forty-fourth Congress are printed; and at the end of them, on page 1542, is this record:

The following resolutions will explain the omission herein of the joint rules of the two Houses, as heretofore.

And then follows the recitation of the resolution of the Senate of the 22d of January, 1876, adopting the joint rules as they then existed, with the exception of the twenty-second joint rule, and asking the concurrence of the House in their adoption. That resolution was received by this House, and was referred to the Committee on Rules, but never acted on. The House having thus failed to concur in the resolution of the Senate adopting joint rules for this Congress—the twenty-first joint rule among them—it follows that the Forty-fourth Congress has no joint rules.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GARFIELD. Not until I have finished my statement, and then I will.

On the 14th of August last, a few days before our adjournment, the House passed a concurrent resolution "to suspend the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules for the remainder of the session," and sent it to the Senate. The Senate in considering that resolution, the same day, replied to the House in these words:

Resolved, That the resolution of the House of Representatives presented this day in the following words:

"Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules be suspended for the remainder of the session"— be respectfully returned to the House of Representatives with the statement that as the House of Representatives has not notified the Senate of the adoption of joint rules for this present session, as proposed by the resolution of the Senate of the 20th day of January last and transmitted to the House of Representatives on the 22d day of the same month, there are no joint rules in force.

This resolution the Senate adopted without a dissenting vote, and of course without distinction of party. Thus in the most formal way the Senate declared to the House that the joint rules theretofore in force by the consent of both Houses were not the rules of this Congress. This is the authoritative testimony of our own Journal.

The same question arose in the Senate last week, on a point of order, as appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, on Saturday last, and by a vote of 50 to 4, the Senate again re-affirmed its former decision that there are no joint rules of the two Houses now in force; and in this a large majority of both political parties in that body concurred.

Thus our own records and the records of the Senate disclose the fact that there are now no joint rules other than this, that the House for example, appoints a Committee on Printing, empowered to act with a similar committee which the Senate may appoint, and thus we have a joint committee by special order of the two Houses acting separately, but not concurrently. The same may be said of the Committees on the Library, and perhaps of one or two other committees. But so far as joint rules are concerned, manifestly there are none for this Congress.

But I wish to state the case on another ground, entirely independent of this. The Constitution empowers each House to determine its own rules——

Mr. MCCRARY. On that point, if the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him, let me say that the Speaker of the House made a decision in this Congress. I have before me that decision.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will yield to have it read.

Mr. MCCRARY. I send to the desk to be read the passage which I have marked from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 6, 1875, page 174.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. RANDALL. I submit the following resolutions

"Resolved, That the rules of the House of Representatives of the Forty-third Congress shall be the rules of the House of Representatives until otherwise ordered, except Rule 166 and Rule 167.

"Resolved further, That a committee of five, to consist of the Speaker and four members, to be named by him, be appointed, to whom shall be referred the rules of the House, who shall report all such amendments or revisions of the same as they shall think proper, and such reports shall always be in order to be made."

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a point of order. I object to the resolution under the existing rules, which are our rules without a declaration of this sort.

Mr. RANDALL. I submit that both these resolutions are strictly in order. I propose that we adopt the rules of the last House, with the exceptions stated. As to the second resolution, I will say there is no rule providing for the appointment of a Committee on Rules. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is therefore mistaken on this point.

Mr. GARFIELD. That particular point is not what I object to. I object to the first branch of the gentleman's resolutions, on the ground of immemorial usage.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman has a perfect right to object by voting against the resolutions, but in no other manner.

Mr. GARFIELD. I submit that this is not a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make that point of order?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules it, on the ground that the Constitution clearly gives to each House the right to adopt its own rules. Whatever may have been the rules or orders of a preceding House in reference to this matter, they cannot supersede the constitutional right of this House to adopt its own rules.

Mr. RANDALL. The Speaker is clearly right.

Mr. GARFIELD. I submit that these resolutions should be referred to the Committee on Rules when appointed.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no rule of this House, and there was no rule of the last House, by which a Committee on Rules can be appointed. It is only by a resolution of this character that the Speaker can be authorized to appoint a Committee on Rules.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will find that immemorial usage is in itself a rule.

Mr. RANDALL. Immemorial usage will do for that side of the House, but we mean to have strict construction of the rules. [Laughter.] For the information of the House, let the rules excepted be read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state just at this point that the reading of the RECORD in a most remarkable manner confirms the present judgment of the Chair in the position he takes. It will be observed that neither in the resolution nor in the subsequent debate is the word "joint" ever used, and no reference was made in the proceedings just read to joint rules; implying, therefore, that the joint rules were to be reached in some other way than by the action of the House.

Mr. SPRINGER rose.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have but a few words more to complete what I was about to say. At the time when the point was made last session we had been proceeding one day in legislation, and there had been no dissent from the proposition that the rules were in existence. I made the point of order that the motion to amend the rules should lie over one day.

But the Speaker—our late Speaker, Mr. Kerr—ruled that, in view of the constitutional power of each House to make its own rules, even the notice of a day was not necessary in the beginning of its existence to adopt any rules it chose; and I bowed respectfully to the decision of the chair much gratified to know that the gentleman who now worthily fills the Chair, entirely concurred in the ruling of the Speaker.

To the point just now made by the Chair, that the debate on that occasion related solely to the rules of the House and that no word was said about the joint rules, I respectfully respond that there are no rules, whether joint or several, that bind this House except by its own consent. The proposition that a joint rule enacted by a former Senate and House has any more authority over this House than a House rule adopted by a former House, I may be permitted to say, if not wholly absurd, is certainly indefensible in logic and law.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman allow the Chair to ask him a question just there?

Mr. GARFIELD. With pleasure.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would ask the gentleman from Ohio whether he has not himself frequently in former Congresses submitted a motion to suspend the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules without those rules having previously been adopted by those Congresses.

Mr. GARFIELD. I admit that freely; and for the reason that whenever either House proceed without protest under the rules, when no question is raised by either House, there is an implied assent by the new Congress to adopt the rules of the former Congress. There have doubtless been cases in which no resolution has been passed by a new Congress adopting the rules of the former Congress; but in such cases, by the tacit consent of both Houses, the old rules have been continued. Now I have no doubt that the Speaker himself, when he was a member on the floor, has frequently moved to suspend the rules of the House on the first Monday of the first session of a Congress before any action had been taken on the rules, thereby assuming that the rules were in force. But I press this point upon the Chair, that, call it by what name we may, call it joint rule or House rule, any rule that binds us is a rule of the House; and the Constitution empowers each House to determine its own rules, by whatever name they may be known. Every rule that governs the proceedings of the Senate; every rule that governs the proceedings of the House, known by what name soever, joint or several, must be under the control of each of the two bodies separately in accordance with the Constitution; and when the Senate at last session re-adopted by a concurrent resolution all the joint rules except one, they thereby disclaimed the old rules until the House should concur in their action. That the House has not done. And the assumption of the ruling of the Chair to-day is that this House can bind the Senate to be governed by some rules that it does not consent to; and of course, on the same principle, this House can never be released from the rule made by a former Congress in the form of a joint rule, unless the Senate consents to such release. And in that way a Congress that existed eighty years ago can bind all later Congresses forever if either House chooses to adhere to a rule against the consent of the other. Such a construction absolutely destroys the constitutional prerogative and privilege of the House, and also of the Senate.

Now, the fact is, that we have never adopted joint rules for the Forty-fourth Congress; that we have never concurred with the Senate in the rules they proposed to adopt; that the two presiding officers of this House, the presiding officer of the Senate, and the Senate itself, and our own Journal, and our body of rules as stated in the Digest, all concur in the view that there are no joint rules of the Forty-fourth Congress. There is no body of rules printed in any book that purports to be the joint rules of the Forty-fourth Congress.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will yield for a question.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to ask for information whether the Forty-third Congress or any preceding Congress ever adopted the body of joint rules, as such, which had been in force in a previous Congress?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will say to the gentleman that in the early history of Congress there were no concurrent joint rules passed in the form in which we have of late years passed them. This was the method: The Senate, for example, made an order in regard to the intercourse of the Senate with the House, such as the delivery of bills or the proceedings of a conference committee, and informed the House that they had adopted such an order. The House then adopted an order of its own in totidem verbis, so that, each House making the same order, it served the purposes of a joint rule, but was absolutely under the separate control of each House.

Mr. REAGAN. What I desire to have the gentleman answer in a word is this: did the House ever adopt the joint rules as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] now insists this House ought to have done?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not know that they ever did. These rules have frequently been adopted by tacit consent, without formal action. In conclusion I wish to say that I cannot make an appeal from the ruling of the Chair in the pending case without appealing from one portion of his ruling which is perfectly correct. His ruling as to this bill is perfectly correct under Rule 136 of this House. I cannot take exception to his ruling and appeal from it without appearing to involve myself in the contradictory position of appealing from a just ruling under our own rule. I do not wish in an incidental and collateral way to bring the House to a vote upon this question without time for deliberation. It is manifest that a very grave public question may turn upon the existence or non-existence of the twenty-second joint rule. I prefer that the discussion of that question shall come upon a direct issue, with opportunities for full debate and when the ruling is upon that point alone. I have accomplished my object by stating the grounds of my objection to the incidental ruling of the Chair, and I therefore withdraw my appeal from his decision.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state——

Mr. SPRINGER. I understood the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to agree to allow me ask him a question.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the Speaker will allow me, I will be glad to hear the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] and to answer it if I can.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understood the gentleman from Ohio to state that these joint rules were the joint rules as they existed at the close of the Forty-third Congress. Did I understand him correctly?

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentlemen state his question again?

Mr. SPRINGER. I understood the gentleman to state that these joint rules were the joint rules as they existed at the close of the Forty-third Congress.

Mr. GARFIELD. I read that statement from the heading of page 207 of the Digest, and said that that was the only entry here in relation to the joint rules.

Mr. SPRINGER. Do I understand that these are the joint rules as they existed at the close of the Forty-third Congress?

Mr. GARFIELD. So this statement would seem to indicate.

Mr SPRINGER. Is that the statement of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. GARFIELD. I said nothing about that; I only said that that was the only record here. How long the joint rules have existed, when they began to exist, or when they ceased to exist, I have not discussed.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman give an opinion as to whether these joint rules were in existence at the close of the Forty-third Congress?

Mr. GARFIELD. When I have examined the question I will be glad to give the gentleman the result of my examination.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say that he does not wish by any statement or ruling of his to anticipate this question. The Chair, however, wishes to mention as a matter of fact that this House, composed of the same gentlemen who now sit here, did at the end of the last session of this Congress, recognize the fact that the joint rules were in existence, by unanimously adopting a resolution to suspend the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules.

Mr. SPRINGER Allow me to say further, in explanation of the question I put to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] that these joint rules have never been re-enacted or re-adopted by any subsequent Congress from the foundation of the Government to the present time. The twenty-second joint rule was universally conceded to be in force and was acted upon in 1869 and in 1873, in counting the presidential vote, and was never adopted but once, and that in 1865. The very language of the twenty-second joint rule implies that it was to be a continuous rule for all future elections of President and Vice-President. The rule provides that—

> The two Houses shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives at the hour of one o'clock p. m. on the second Wednesday in February next succeeding the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, &c.

This language applies to all cases. The rules for governing the joint sessions before 1865 were only applicable to the particular election then pending.

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will.

Mr. BLAND. I call for the regular order and ask that the pending bill be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] will be kind enough to withdraw his call for a moment. The Chair desires to hear everything upon this point. Debate has been allowed to proceed at some length by unanimous consent, and perhaps it would be a saving of time in the future if gentlemen be allowed now to understand each other.

Mr. HOAR. The question I desired to put to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] was this: Whether, in his judgment, a rule of action which has been handed down by tacit consent from Congress to Congress, as to the mode of proceeding of the two Houses, is not necessarily abrogated by a message from one of them to the other that it considers such joint rule no longer in force. Otherwise, is it not true that this House is bound, not merely by the act of a previous House, as in the case of its own rules, but by the act of a previous Senate in which the present Senate does not concur?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will answer the gentleman's question. If the doctrine is maintained that when a joint rule has been established between the two Houses one of those Houses may abrogate that rule at its will, then I see no necessity whatever for adopting a joint rule, because after the rule has been made it does not bind either of the parties to the agreement.

Mr. HOAR. A joint rule of two parliamentary bodies, each of which is entitled by the Constitution to determine its own method of proceeding, (that is what the Constitution means,) is necessarily an agreement to proceed in a certain way so long as both concur.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state, in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the history of legislation between the two Houses as to these joint rules since their original adoption shows that action upon the subject has always been in the form of additions or amendments to those joint rules, which, without re-adoption, have continued to be recognized, accepted, and acted on; and, as continuously operative, have been printed in the successive editions of the Digest.

Mr. KASSON. That only shows that the two Houses, by that mode of expression, consented to the continuance of the joint rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that any action which requires the concurrence of two bodies to enact or make it binding requires the concurrence of those two bodies for its abrogation.

Mr. SPRINGER. I did not finish my answer to the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts. He will observe that a joint rule is adopted by a concurrent resolution, which declares:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That the following be added to the joint rules of the two Houses of Congress.

Now as a concurrent resolution can not be repealed by one body without the consent of the other——

Mr. HOAR. Does the gentleman say that a rule adopted by a concurrent resolution of the two branches of Congress at the beginning of the Government binds successive Houses of Representatives forever until the Senate abandon it?

Mr. SPRINGER. Until both Houses abandon it. That is my position, and the gentleman from Massachusetts, in 1873, on the occasion of counting the electoral votes for President, objected to the counting of three votes from the State of Georgia which had been cast for Horace Greeley. The gentleman objected on the ground that Mr. Greeley was dead at the time those votes were cast; and the objection was based upon the existence of the twenty-second joint rule, which had never been re-enacted since its original adoption in 1865.

Mr. HOAR. Both Houses were then acting under that rule by consent.

Mr. SPRINGER. It had never been re-adopted, and it had no validity except by virtue of its original adoption in 1865. Yet it was recognized as continuously operative by the unanimous verdict of both branches of Congress at two successive counts of presidential votes. That recognition had the concurrence of the gentleman from Massachusetts as well as other members upon that side of the House.

Mr. HOSKINS. I would like to put one question to the gentleman from Illinois before he takes his seat. If he holds that these joint rules can never be abrogated except by the consent of the two Houses, I would like to put this inquiry: When the Senate has abrogated or refused to recognize these rules, by what power or authority can the House or any other body enforce the observance of them by the Senate?

Mr. SPRINGER. We cannot compel the Senate to abide by its own rules. That body may, if it chooses, act as if it were a law unto itself; but we can on our part abide by those joint rules; and we propose to do it. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I would like to call the attention of my colleague to the third paragraph of article 1, section 7, of the Constitution:

Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him.

If the rule now under discussion has the force of law to bind the two Houses, I ask the gentleman to show that it has ever been presented to the President of the United States.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will answer my colleague. Under the Constitution, amendments to that instrument before being submitted for ratification must receive the concurrence of two-thirds of both Houses of Congress; yet they have not, in all cases, been presented to the President of the United States for his signature, because the Constitution requires only that they be submitted for ratification by a two-thirds vote of each House.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. But the method of proposing a constitutional amendment is expressly provided for by the Constitution itself and is not in the same category as a law or "order, resolution, or vote, to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary."

Mr. SPRINGER. This joint rule is the law of the land to-day by virtue of its original adoption, although the President never signed it.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. The gentleman does not answer my question.

Mr. SPRINGER. I thought I did.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. The gentleman merely refers to a case which he says bears upon this question, but which was the method of procedure in case of amendments, provided for by the Constitution itself.

Mr. SPRINGER. I say it is a very good precedent in this case.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman how he reconciles his view in regard to the validity of the joint rules with the provision of the Constitution I have quoted.

Mr. SPRINGER. I refer to a precedent in the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which amendment is binding now upon the whole country. In 1865 the two Houses of Congress adopted this twenty-second joint rule. Congress was then republican in both branches, and the President was also a republican. But it did not occur to any of the gentleman's party then that the signature of the President was necessary to give the joint rule validity. Nor did it ever occur to anybody that that rule was not in force until those who made it discovered that it did not meet the particular case which must now be settled under it.

Mr. MCCRARY. Before asking to have read the decision of the Speaker of this House given at the opening of this Congress, I beg to say one word upon that point, reserving to myself of course the privilege of discussing the subject at length when it shall come up again in a more formal manner.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. MCCRARY,] but he will remember that this debate is proceeding by unanimous consent, and therefore he will be limited as to time.

Mr. MCCRARY. I shall occupy but a moment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot recognize the gentleman as holding the floor for one hour, and thus cut off other gentlemen who may wish to speak briefly upon the point of order.

Mr. MCCRARY. I do not expect that at all. I merely say that I reserve to myself the privilege of discussing this subject at length hereafter. I desire now simply to state that at the beginning of this Congress the Speaker of this House decided that each House had, under the Constitution, the absolute right to make its own rules, the rules which should govern its proceedings; and for that reason and upon that ground he held that the rules which had prevailed and been adopted in the Forty-third Congress were not in force at the beginning of the Forty-fourth.

That decision, Mr. Speaker, covers the whole ground of this controversy beyond all question. It does unless gentlemen will say that a joint rule adopted for the government of the two Houses is not a rule for the government of the House of Representatives; and a position like that cannot for one moment be maintained. Whether it be a rule of this body alone or a rule which this House of Representatives has adopted to govern its intercourse with the other body, it is a rule, and each House has the absolute right, under the Constitution, to make its own rules, not only to govern itself, but to govern its intercourse with any other body or any other authority under this Government. The contrary doctrine simply implies that the Senate of the United States, if by any means this House shall inadvertently agree to a bad or injurious rule, can hold us to it, if it be a joint rule, for one hundred years.

The joint rules relate to the proceedings of the House. They are rules to all intents and purposes for the government of the House in its proceedings, and if we give up the right of each House to make its joint rules or to consent to joint rules, we concede the whole question. I say, therefore, that the decision of the Speaker that each House shall make for itself all its rules, and that no other House can be bound by the action of any preceding House in the matter of its rules, covers the whole ground.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say in reply to the gentleman from Iowa that he knows of no means of coercing the Senate if they choose to nullify a joint rule. The Senate may so proceed, but it does not follow therefore that the House should not be guided by the joint rules, and especially when the House is reminded of the fact that the two Houses, the Senate and the House of Representatives, so far as the action directed by the twenty-second joint rule is concerned, have three several times operated under that very twenty-second joint rule in counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President, and so far as the Chair is concerned he is unaware of any good reason why it should not in that regard be followed once more.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to make one point——

Mr. KASSON. I wish to ask the Chair simply a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. KASSON. Can there be a joint rule to which both Houses are not at the time agreed? Does it not cease to be a joint rule the moment either House dissents?

The SPEAKER. The very fact of their title, showing that they are joint rules, operates in the judgment of the Chair to make them binding on both bodies until they are vacated.

Mr. KASSON. By one House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not say so.

Mr. HOAR. I believe I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to call the attention of the Chair, and of the House, and of the country to the reductio ad absurdum of the proposition which is now advanced, and which is created by the very case to which it is proposed to apply it. A question has arisen in the House of Representatives, not of the mode of communicating with the Senate, not of the mode of meeting the Senate in joint convention, but in what order in its morning hour it shall take up its own business, and shall proceed with matters which are absolutely within its own jurisdiction, to wit, considering, amending, and disposing of a House bill. That is the proposition before us.

Mr. BLAND. I should like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if this side of the House can do that if they raise this question?

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman from Missouri must excuse me for a moment until I get through with my statement—that, being a matter of proceeding of the House with which no other person, authority, or power in this Government has any concern, the Constitution of the United States saying that each House shall adopt the rules of its own proceedings, and the present occupant of the chair having insisted and the House having ruled that means each new House as it assembles every two years, it is said we are bound to deal with House bills in a particular order because our ancestors in 1789 promised the Senate they would; and although the Senate has long since absolved us from that, declaring the joint rules are not in force, still we have to proceed under their operation until time shall be no more.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state to the gentleman from Massachusetts——

Mr. HOAR. I have not yet concluded.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am willing to have any collection of school-boys, or any collection of statesmen, in this country able to understand those principles of parliamentary law which, somebody has said, every American citizen knows by instinct in his cradle, consider such a proposition as that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state very respectfully to the gentleman from Massachusetts, that his own record, and his own conduct, and his own sayings on this floor heretofore, are part of the information which he relies upon, in a measure, for the decision he has just made, that the joint rules of the two Houses are still in force.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has stated that it would be worthy only of a lot of school-boys to entertain this view; and as we desire to be instructed——

Mr. HOAR. I hope the gentleman will not misunderstand me. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman said something about a collection of school-boys. What he said was at least an appeal to the school-boy for information. Now, I have some information here on this subject; not from a school-boy, but from a distinguished gentleman, a friend and late colleague of the gentleman from Massachusetts and also a member of the Forty-fifth Congress, who has given his opinion upon this subject. I send to the desk, and ask to have read, the opinion of General Butler [laughter] on this question. It will be seen that at least one distinguished lawyer in this country differs from the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts.

The Clerk read as follows:

[From an interview in the Herald.]

REPORTER. Do you think, then, that the two Houses must agree on the votes before they can be counted?

General BUTLER. If any instrument says that A and B are to do a thing—for example, to make an award or enter a judgment—can A do it without B or B do it without A? If both Houses are to count by the Constitution, can one count without the other? If so, which? If our republican friends in Louisiana, in their letter, had claimed the right in the President of the Senate to adjudicate as to the propriety or rightfulness of the electoral vote when they made the claim that he was to count them, I should have thought it very significant; but as they have insisted that he is merely a machine or clerk to register what may be sent him, I do not think the democratic party will be likely to be much moved by their manifesto, which certainly leaves the President of the Senate about as harmless a piece of clock-work as could well be imagined, it being his only duty to tick out what is placed in the wheels. I believe that whoever has the counting of the vote in the last resort to determine an election has a right to scrutinize that vote, ascertain its legality, its fairness, and truthfulness, and whether it represents in the case of a vote by proxy, as the electors are, the will of the people who are their constituents. All that, of course, cannot be done by the President of the Senate, and therefore must be done by the two Houses. If it can be done by the President of the Senate, then the most alarming stride against the rights of the people has been taken when the claim is made that the President of the Senate is to count the votes.

Mr. SPRINGER. The point in this to which I desire to direct the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] is that the two bodies, the Senate and the House, are required to concur in passing a joint rule; and if it requires the two bodies to concur in the establishment of a joint rule, I think it is an extreme reductio ad absurdum for the gentleman to assert that one body may abrogate that rule without the assent of the other.

GOLD AND SILVER COINAGE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] is entitled to the floor on the bill (H. R. No. 3635) to utilize the product of gold and silver mines and for other purposes, reported back from the Committee on Mines and Mining with amendments; and the Chair will state that unless objection be made he will not take the time, which has been consumed in the discussion this morning, from the morning hour. He does not think it should be fairly counted against the morning hour, and, therefore, alters the time of the beginning of the morning hour from half-past twelve o'clock to fifteen minutes past one o'clock.

Mr. BLAND. I ask for the reading of the bill.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That coin-notes of the denomination of $50, and multiples thereof up to $10,000, may, in the mode hereinafter provided, be paid by the several mints and assay offices at San Francisco, Carson City, Philadelphia, and New York, for the net value of gold and silver bullion deposited thereat; and of the bullion thus received not less than 75 per cent. in coin or fine bars shall at all times be kept on hand for redemption of the coin-notes, gold for gold, and silver for silver. The gold deposited shall be computed at its coining value, and silver at the rate of 412.8 grains standard silver to the dollar, less the lawful mint charges, and such charge for transportation from the several assay offices to the mints for coinage, and from the latter to the assistant treasuries respectively at which the coin-notes shall be payable.

SEC. 2. That for bullion deposited at the mints of San Francisco and Carson the coin-notes issued shall be redeemable on demand at the assistant treasury at San Francisco; and for bullion deposited at the Philadelphia Mint and assay office at New York the notes shall be redeemed at the assistant treasury at New York.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time cause coin and fine mint-bars (stamped) to be transferred from the mint to the assistant treasuries at San Francisco and New York in such amounts as may be necessary for the redemption of the coin-notes.

SEC. 4. That the coin-notes issued under the provisions of this act shall be receivable without limit for all dues to the United States; and the coin mentioned in this act shall be a legal tender for all debts of the United States, public and private, not specified to be paid in gold coin.

SEC. 5. That the gold-coin notes issued under this act shall be redeemed on presentation in gold coin or fine bars, and silver in silver dollars or fine bars.

SEC. 6. That the coin notes authorized by this act to be issued shall be prepared under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and shall be transferred to the mints and assay offices named in this act as a part of the bullion fund, and from which fund deposits shall be paid for in coin or coin notes at the option of the depositor.

SEC. 7. That the fine gold and silver bars by this act authorized to be issued shall bear the mint stamp of fineness, weight, and value, and the value of the gold bars shall be computed according to their coining rate and the silver bars at their coining value in dollars.

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe the necessary regulations for carrying into effect the provisions of this act.

Mr. KASSON. Are there not some amendments pending?

The SPEAKER. Yes, sir; the amendments will be read.

The amendments were read.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Mines and Mining were as follows:

At the end of line 17, section 1, add the following:

And there shall be coined at the mints of the United States the silver dollar hereinbefore mentioned.

In line 4, section 4, strike out the words "of the United States."

The amendment proposed by Mr. LYNCH was as follows:

Strike out section 4 of the bill.

The amendment proposed by Mr. CASWELL was as follows:

Insert after the words "United States," in line 3, section 4, the words "except duties on imports and the interest on the public debt not required to be paid in gold coin;" and add to the section the words "except duties and interest as aforesaid."

The SPEAKER. The question before the House is upon seconding the demand for the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. BLAND. For the purpose of making a few remarks, I will withdraw for a moment the call for the previous question. I desire to state that among those who favor the remonetizing of silver there is quite a divergence of opinion. I find that many are in favor of restoring the silver dollar of 1837, which consists of 412.5 grains of standard silver to the dollar, restoring its legal-tender character as existing at that time, and until 1873. This divests the proposition of the sections relating to the depositing of bullion and other matters connected with the bill as it has now been read at the Clerk's desk; and for the purpose of meeting these views and to get the question before the House that a choice may be made between the two propositions, I will submit as a substitute what I now send to the desk, and which may be voted upon after the previous question shall have been seconded.

The Clerk read the proposed substitute, as follows:

A bill authorizing the coinage of the standard silver dollar, and restoring its legal-tender character.

Be it enacted, &c., That there shall be from time to time coined at the mints of the United States silver dollars of the weight of 412½ grains standard silver to the dollar as provided for in the act of January 18, 1837, and that said dollar shall be a legal tender for all debts public and private, except where payment of gold coin is required by law.

Mr. BLAND. That bill is substantially the bill that was introduced and voted upon twice at the last session of Congress; which was introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] and received an almost two-thirds vote of this House. I am reminded by gentleman that there has been a commission appointed to investigate this subject, and that it may be proper to postpone its consideration until the report of that commission shall have been made. But, Mr. Speaker, this session is a short one. The political condition of the country is now agitating the public mind and occupying the attention of members of this House, and of gentlemen at the other end of the Capitol, and I am not sufficiently advised to say at what time this commission may be able to make a report. Indeed, I think I would be warranted in saying that under present circumstances no report can be made in time for action in this House and in the Senate. Besides, Mr. Speaker, I think if the friends of this measure desire to do anything at this session of Congress, it is well that they shall pass some bill here and send it to the Senate for action there. And if this commission appointed for the purpose of investigating this subject desires to amend any proposition that we send to the Senate they will have ample opportunity to do it there, and this House can then agree to such amendment or not, as it thinks proper.

But I say that if we intend to act upon this subject at this session of Congress, the sooner we get this bill to the Senate the better, the sooner we get it out of this House and before the Senate the better, I think, for the success of this bill even in this House. This is evidently not a session for business, and the nearer we draw to the time of counting the presidential votes, the more excitement we find in this House and the less opportunity there is for the consideration of the business that comes over from the last session. For that reason I insist upon action now, so that whatever action this House may take may go to the Senate. If the commission which was appointed for the purpose of reporting upon this subject desire to amend our proposition or to substitute something else for it, there will be ample opportunity to do so in the Senate, and the House will then have an opportunity to pass upon it.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman allow me one moment?

Mr. BLAND. Certainly.

Mr. LYNCH. I desire to raise a point of order on the proposed substitute?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. LYNCH. My point of order is this: the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BLAND,] as chairman of the committee reporting this bill, was directed by the committee to permit only two amendments to be offered to it and then to demand the previous question upon the bill and amendments for the purpose of testing the sense of the House upon them and them alone, I submit that it is not in order for the gentleman now to offer an entirely new propositon, one that has not been considered by the committee, one that he was not authorized by the committee to submit, and which is in direct violation of the instructions of the committee.

Mr. BLAND. In answer to that I will state——

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that that is not a point of order. It is a question between the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] and the committee that he represents in this matter.

Mr. BLAND. I desire to state that the gentleman is altogether mistaken. The committee, at a regular meeting for the purpose, agreed that this substitute might be offered and voted upon, and I was authorized to offer it for that purpose.

Mr. LYNCH. As a member of the committee, I was not aware that the committee had a meeting for this purpose, and never was informed that there was to be such meeting, I was, therefore, not informed of the action that was taken. With that explanation I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. BLAND. A meeting of the committee was called, and the clerk of the committee was directed to notify each member of the committee of the time of meeting.

Mr. COX. I wish we could defer action on this measure. This House is not in a condition——

Mr. BLAND. I did not yield for a speech; I supposed the gentleman desired to ask me a question.

Mr. COX. I will ask this question: whether the gentleman does not think it eminently prudent and wise, considering the present condition of this House and of the country, and the fact that a commission has been raised to examine and report upon this question, of which commission the gentleman himself is a member, to postpone action upon this subject for the present, when we know that no immediate action will be taken upon it by the Senate?

Mr. KELLEY. How do you know?

Mr. COX. No law upon the subject will be passed at once. Although I concur with my friend in many of his views, I do not desire to vote upon a measure of this transcendent importance, without having the benefit of some careful report from the commission which we raised at the last session of Congress.

Mr. BLAND. In answer to the gentleman I will say that I am aware that there were some here during the last session, who for a month, by filibustering motions and other methods sought to obtain a continuance of this subject until this session of Congress.

Mr. COX. I was not among them.

Mr. BLAND. And I suppose that the gentlemen who were opposed to it then are still opposed to it, and propose to defeat this bill if possible. I say now that if we intend to act upon it at all, if we intend that this or some similar bill shall become a law, we will act upon it now. In my opinion there was scarcely a congressional district in the last election where each candidate did not discuss this question before the people. And now to talk of a necessity for further discussion of a measure that has been discussed for nearly a year in the public press, and upon the hustings and everywhere else, is simply a subterfuge and can be intended only to defeat this bill. It is true that a commission was raised by Congress at its last session to investigate and report upon this subject, but I believe the only design of raising that commission was to defeat the passage of this bill. In my opinion that fact should not govern our action here. This bill is legally and properly before this House and we should not shirk the responsibility of voting upon it now.

Mr. COX. Allow me to correct the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. For a question.

Mr. COX. For a correction. The proposition for a commission was not reported to this House for the purpose the gentleman states. To my certain knowledge it was first introduced into this House by my colleague from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] and was considered with reference to other matters connected with our currency. It was never intended to embarrass the bill of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BLAND.] His present embarrassment does not come from this side of the House or from any member on this side.

Mr. FORT. Will the gentleman allow me to correct——

Mr. BLAND. I yielded for a question only.

Mr. FORT. I wish to ask whether the chairman of the democratic national committee [Mr. HEWITT, of New York] did not lead the filibusters in opposition to this bill at the last session.

Mr. BLAND. I do not yield further.

Mr. COX. I know there was a good deal of filibustering; I did not take part in it.

Mr. KELLEY. I wish to ask whether the bill now offered as a substitute, and which was to be considered on a certain Monday of last session, was not filibustered against in order to allow the gentleman's colleague, the chairman of the democratic national committee, to introduce his resolution for a commission on the silver question and to prevent action on this bill?

Mr. COX. I do not know that to be the fact.

Mr. KELLEY. I do.

Mr. COX. The gentleman generally knows more than most people.

Mr. KELLEY. I know this.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I regret that this question has already occupied so much time. I think the sooner we dispose of it in this House the better. I therefore demand the previous question.

Mr. KASSON. I beg to ask the chairman of the committee a single question.

Mr. BLAND. I demand the previous question.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to ask the gentleman whether he will not allow one hour's debate, and so end this question? Will he not allow this side to be heard for thirty minutes?

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, if this bill is not to lose its place in the morning hour, and if we are not to be deprived of an opportunity for a vote upon the demand for the previous question, I have no objection to the gentleman's proposition. If the House will allow one or two hours for debate, and give me the right to demand the previous question and have a vote upon it, I have no objection.

Mr. KASSON. I really hope that will be done.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that forty minutes of the morning hour still remain.

Mr. KASSON. I will ask the Chair whether this bill, if not disposed of during this morning hour, will not stand over till to-morrow morning?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Missouri at every point where a motion is to be made involving the control of the bill.

Mr. KASSON. Then with the understanding that the gentleman will have that right to-morrow morning——

Mr. BLAND. No, Mr. Speaker, there is no such understanding. I simply stated that if the House wanted debate upon the bill for one or two hours, and would agree to consider the previous question as operating, I would consent to such arrangement. Otherwise I now demand the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust that by unanimous consent, in order to give time for debate on this bill, it will be agreed that the previous question be now sustained and that two hours shall be allowed for debate.

Mr. KASSON. The Chair has already stated that he will recognize the gentleman from Missouri at his own request at every stage of the bill.

Mr. BLAND. I desire to have the previous question operate now.

The SPEAKER. What is the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. KASSON. It is that the gentleman from Missouri allow this bill to run on during this morning hour and in the morning hour to-morrow for debate, the Chair recognizing him at his will to-morrow to move the previous question.

Mr. BLAND. I make this proposition: That the previous question be now considered as operating and then debate go on for one or two hours.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that pending the operation of the previous question debate cannot extend over one hour except by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that unanimous consent be granted.

Mr. KASSON. I hope the gentleman from Missouri will allow the House the opportunity to debate the bill, especially as a new substitute is pending. It really seems to me best that the bill should be left at the disposition of the House to-morrow morning.

Mr. BLAND. I demand the previous question.

Mr. KASSON. Then I hope the previous question will not be sustained. This is too important a bill to be considered without debate.

Mr. KELLEY. I hope the previous question will be sustained.

The question being taken on seconding the demand for the previous question, there were—ayes 108, noes 36.

Mr. KASSON. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point.

Mr. KASSON. I now move that the House adjourn. I do this for the express purpose of securing time for debate.

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn is in order.

Mr. KASSON. If the gentleman will allow debate, I will withdraw the motion. Otherwise I demand the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; there being—ayes 30, noes 114.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 5, nays 200, not voting 85; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chittenden, Gibson, Hathorn, O'Neill, and Piper—5.

NAYS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Anderson, Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, George A. Bagley, John H. Bagley, jr., John H. Baker, William H. Wiley Wells, Wheeler, White, Whitehouse, Wigginton, Wike, and Woodburn—85.

So the House refused to adjourn.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

During the vote,

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announcing the passage, without amendment, of the following House bill:

A bill (H. R. No. 2257) for the relief of J. T. McGinniss, captain of the Thirteenth Infantry, United States Army; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3693) changing the name of the First National Bank of Amesbury to the First National Bank of Merrimac.

It further announced the passage of a bill (S. No. 890) for the relief of J. S. Logan and W. L. Shadwick; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

GOLD AND SILVER COINAGE.

Mr. BLAND. I move that the reading of the names be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, that will be done.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. MONROE. I ask the gentleman from Missouri to yield to me for a word of explanation.

Mr. BLAND. I will yield, but for that purpose only.

Mr. MONROE. There is a desire on the part of several members on this side of the House, as I have no doubt there is on the other, to say a word of explanation at some time to-day or to-morrow of their position in regard to this bill, and it seems to me as very desirable for a good understanding generally that such opportunity should be afforded. I understand gentlemen on this side of the House to say they have no objection whatever to the arrangement which the gentleman from Missouri proposed some time since in his place upon the floor. We are willing to regard the previous question as ordered by unanimous consent, and to let the debate go on for the rest of the hour to-day, and through the hour to-morrow, or perhaps two hours in all, if it shall be found convenient.

Mr. BLAND. I certainly have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. If any understanding is arrived at by unanimous consent, the proposition should be distinct as to the time the debate should be allowed to run.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman from Missouri suggest what time he proposes to allow for this debate?

Mr. BLAND. I understand it is proposed by unanimous consent that the previous question shall be considered as now ordered and operating.

Mr. MONROE. Certainly.

Mr. BLAND. That then two hours shall be given for debate.

Mr. KASSON. We agree to that.

The SPEAKER. That will have to be by unanimous consent, for only one hour of debate can be allowed after the main question has been ordered to be put.

Mr. MONROE. There is no objection to that proposition.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the previous question will be considered as seconded, and the main question ordered to be now put.

Mr. BLAND. There is no objection to that, but I still hold the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri is entitled to the floor.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman from Missouri allow an order to be entered for the printing of the bill, as amended, with the substitute offered to-day, so that we may have the entire proposition on our desks to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands now that by unanimous consent two hours are allowed for debate—that is to say, two morning hours; one hour to-morrow, and one the day following.

Mr. KASSON. With the understanding also that the morning hour has now terminated, and that the bill and amendments be printed and laid upon our desks to-morrow.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to inquire whether the ordering the main question does not necessarily take this bill out of the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. The proposition of the gentleman from Missouri has been agreed to by unanimous consent; the main question having been ordered the debate can now proceed, if that be the desire of the House. The Chair desires the understanding shall be distinct so there may be no conflict hereafter.

Mr. KELLEY. Why may not the debate go on immediately for one hour, and then for another hour to-morrow?

Mr. BLAND. That is my desire.

Mr. KELLEY. Why not go on and debate the bill now, and take a vote upon it?

Mr. KASSON. I cannot find the bill, as amended, among my papers, and it will be of great convenience if the debate shall go over until to-morrow, and an order shall be entered for the printing of the bill and amendment as well as the substitute, so they may be laid upon our desks to-morrow.

Mr. KELLEY. The substitute will be found by gentlemen on their files, printer's number 4298, number of bill 3923, except that the substitute provides for protecting any contracts made payable in gold.

Mr. KASSON. That simply makes it another bill. I submit the whole House will be gratified to see it all in print.

Mr. BLAND. I desire to ask if the time allowed for debate is now being consumed in this discussion.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly not. As I understand under the order of the House, unless some other order is made, this will come up in the morning after the reading of the journal, as unfinished business, and the two hours' debate will go on and the vote be taken before the morning hour begins.

The SPEAKER. That would be the ruling of the Chair under the rule, unless by unanimous consent some other arrangement is agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. That is right. I am quite satisfied with that. I presume there is no objection to the order to print.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection. The Chair understands that the original print of the bill has been exhausted, and he would therefore suggest that the printing embrace the original bill, the amendments, and the substitute offered to-day.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. BLAND. Will not the bill and amendments and substitute be also in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, having been read at the Clerk's desk?

The SPEAKER. Certainly; they will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. DURHAM. I think that should be sufficient.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky object?

Mr. DURHAM. I do not object. I think, however, that it would be sufficient to have them printed in the RECORD.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to report a bill from the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has not quite expired.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on Appropriations.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4187) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed and made the special order in the House for to-morrow after the morning hour, and that it be considered in the House under the five-minute rule.

Mr. KASSON. I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The points of order will be reserved. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the bill be printed, and that it be made the special order for consideration in the House as in Committee of the Whole to-morrow after the morning hour.

Mr. HOAR. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I move that the bill be printed, and that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and made a special order after the morning hour to-morrow.

Mr. REAGAN. The bill will not be printed and on our tables in the morning, and there will not be sufficient time to examine it if this order be made. Will the gentleman from Indiana not agree to allow the bill to go over until the following day?

Mr. HOLMAN. If the bill be not printed when the House meets to-morrow I will not press it; but I ask now that it be made a special order for to-morrow after the morning hour in Committee of the Whole.

The question being taken, the motion was agreed to—ayes 80, noes not counted.

EXPENSES OF INVESTIGATING COMMITTEES.

On motion of Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 4121) to provide for the expenses of certain special committees with amendments by the Senate, was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCRARY] is entitled to the floor. There are still three minutes remaining of the morning hour.

Mr. CROUNSE. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCRARY] is not here, and I ask that by unanimous consent the morning hour be considered as having expired.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1588) granting an additional pension to Jefferson Bowers, of Mason County, Illinois.

APPROPRIATION FOR QUARTERMASTER'S DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the Quartermaster-General in relation to the annual diversion of large sums of money from the appropriations for that Department; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ATTORNEYS' FEES IN PENSION CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a communication from the Commissioner of Pensions, together with a draught of a bill to regulate attorneys' fees in pension claims; which was referred to Committee on Invalid Pensions.

RESIGNATION OF A MEMBER.

The SPEAKER. The Chair also lays before the House the following communication:

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 11, 1876.

SIR: I hereby tender my resignation as a Representative in Congress for the seventh congressional district of the State of New York.

Very respectfully yours,

SMITH ELY, JR.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

NAVY-YARDS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a copy of the report of the board of officers organized under the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 30, 1876, to examine and determine whether in their opinion any of the navy-yards can be dispensed with and abandoned; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

ELECTIONS IN NEW YORK, PHILADELPHIA, ETC.

The SPEAKER announced the following as the members of the select committee authorized by a resolution of the House, adopted on yesterday, to investigate the late elections in New York, Philadelphia, Brooklyn, and Jersey City:

Mr. COX, of New York; Mr. RICE, of Ohio; Mr. WADDELL, of North Carolina; Mr. MACDOUGALL, of New York, and Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi.

PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

Mr. WOOD of New York. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of adopting resolutions concerning the distribution of the last annual message of the President, with the accompanying documents, to appropriate committees.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. COX in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the President's annual message.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I have been directed by the Committee of Ways and Means to submit the resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That so much of the annual message of the President of the United States to the two Houses of Congress at the present session, together with the accompanying documents, as relates to finances and taxation, to the public debt, and public credit, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Resolved, That so much of said message and documents as relates to the necessary appropriations for carrying on the Government in its several departments, and to deficiencies in appropriations, and to deficiencies in the revenue for the maintenance and support of the Post-Office Department, and to special appropriations for the Army and Navy of the United States, to the payment of the joint commission for the adjustment of claims between the United States and Mexico, under the convention of 1868, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Resolved, That so much of said message and documents as relates to the expenditures in the improvements of rivers and harbors and to commerce be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Resolved, That so much of said message and documents as relates to the Post-Office Department, post-office, and postal service, be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Resolved, That so much of said message and documents as relates to agriculture and the Department of Agriculture be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Resolved, That so much of said message and documents as relates to the territory of the District of Columbia be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Resolved, That so much of said message and documents as relates to the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, to the necessity of throwing a greater safeguard over the method of choosing and declaring the election of President, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Resolved, That so much of said message and documents as relates to foreign affairs, to fixing the boundary upon the Pacific coast by the protocol of March 10, 1873, pursuant to the award of the Emperor of Germany, by article 34 of the treaty of Washington, to the commerce and navigation with the Ottoman government, to the awards paid to the claimants in the seizure of the steamer Montijo, to the question which lately arose with Great Britain respecting the surrender of fugitive criminals under the treaty of 1842, to the termination of the treaty of 1862 with the Ottoman government, to the joint commission for adjustment of claims between the United States and Mexico under the convention of 1868, to the payment of claims by the government of Venezuela to the citizens of the United States, to provide for the hearing and determination of the just and subsisting claims of aliens upon the Government of the United States within a reasonable limitation, and of such as may hereafter arise, to the island of Santo Domingo, to expatriation and the election of nationality, and to the necessity of legislation concerning the marriages of American citizens contracted abroad, and concerning the status of American women who may marry foreigners and of children born of American parents in a foreign country, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Resolved, That so much of said message and documents as relates to the employment of the Army against eight certain wild bands of the Sioux Indian Nation, to the extension of time to the commission constituted under the act of July 24, 1876, to complete their report on the re-organization and reform of the Army, to the employment of the increase of the cavalry force of the Army by the act of August 15, 1876, to the transfer of claims under the act of July 4, 1864, for supplies taken by the Army during the war, be removed from the offices of the Quartermaster and Commissary-Generals, and transferred to the southern claims commission, to the sanction of Congress of an annuity fund for the benefit of the families of deceased officers, and for the permanent organization of the Signal Service, to the concentration of the manufacturing operations of the Ordnance Department to three arsenals and an armory, and that the remaining arsenals be sold, and the proceeds applied to this object by the Ordnance Department, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Resolved, That so much of said message and documents as relates to the Navy of the United States be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Resolved, That so much of said message and documents as relates to the management of Indian affairs be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Resolved, That so much of said message and documents as relates to the troubles on the Texas frontier be referred to the Select Committee on the Texas Frontier Troubles.

Resolved, That so much of said message and documents as relates to the international exhibition held in Philadelphia be referred to the Select Committee on the Centennial Celebration.

The resolutions were adopted.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I move that the committee now rise, and report to the House the resolutions just adopted.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the annual message of the President of the United States, and had directed him to report sundry resolutions.

The resolutions were adopted.

Mr. WOOD, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4188) making appropriations for fortifications and for other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to reserve all points of order on this bill.

Mr. HALE. I move that this bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made a special order for Thursday next, after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe there is no pressing business before us, and I therefore move that the House now adjourn.

The moton was agreed to; and accordingly (at two o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. KIDDER: A paper relating to the establishment of a post-route between Deadwood City, via Crook City, in the Black Hills, and Bismarck, both in Dakota Territory, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi: The petition of John Carruth and 41 others, residents of Mississippi, who remained loyal to the United States Government during the late war, and who lost heavily on account of its results, to have the time extended so that they can have their claims for quartermaster and commissary stores furnished to and taken and used by the United States Army, adjudicated by the Court of Claims or some other tribunal that will give them relief, to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, the petition of sail-makers of the United States Navy, to be restored again to their former positions in charge of sail-lofts, from which they were displaced by the appointment of civilians thereto, to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 13, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SARGENT. I present the petition of the Methodist Episcopal church, of Highlandville, Massachusetts, signed by the pastor and officers, praying the Government by appropriate legislation to prohibit the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia and the Territories of the United States, and for the prohibition of the foreign importation of alcoholic liquors. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN. I present a similar petition, signed by E. P. Bishop, grand worthy patriarch, of Ohio, and E. J. Morris, grand scribe, representing 8,000 members of the Sons of Temperance of Ohio, which I move be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KERNAN. I present a petition of the same character from the New York State Temperance Society, making the same prayer; and also a petition of a like character of the Friends' Temperance Union, of Ghent, New York. I move their reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I present a like petition in behalf of the Methodist Episcopal church, of Newton, Massachusetts, which I move be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOGY. I present a like petition of Denton S. Thomas, grand scribe of the grand Division of Sons of Temperance of the State of Missouri. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I present a petition of the Good Templars of the District of Columbia, a petition of the Methodist Episcopal church, of Riverdale, Gloucester, Massachusetts, signed by the pastor and officers, and a petition of the Grand Lodge of Good Templars of Vermont, signed by John B. Mead and Frank Plumlie, representing 5,400 members, asking for prohibitory legislation for the District of Columbia and the Territories, and for the prohibition of the foreign importation of alcoholic liquors. I move their reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I present a precisely similar petition from the First Methodist church, of Chelsea, Massachusetts, signed by the pastor and officers, and one from the Good Templars of Montana. I move their reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COOPER. I present a similar petition from the Grand Division of the Sons of Temperance of East Tennessee. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WALLACE. I present a petition of like import from the Pennsylvania Temperance Union. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I present a similar petition of the Sons of Temperance of Nebraska officially signed. I move that it take the usual reference.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I present the petition of Abram Boynton and others of the Methodist Episcopal church of Gloucester, Massachusetts, praying for prohibitory legislation for the District of Columbia and the Territories, and the prohibition of the foreign importation of alcoholic liquors, &c. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. I present the memorial of H. A. Shore, grand worthy chief templar, and George E. Brackett, grand worthy secretary, of the Good Templars of the State of Maine, representing 14,000 members, remonstrating against the manufacture of spirituous liquors in the District of Columbia and the Territories. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I present two petitions of the Methodist Episcopal church, of Holliston, Massachusetts, and of the Wesley Chapel church, of Salem, Massachusetts, similar to those just presented. I move their reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I have three petitions, similar I presume to those just presented by other Senators, excepting that these I observe pray, among other things, for a constitutional amendment prohibiting the use of alcoholic drinks, these petitions coming from temperance societies and also from churches, representing a large number of citizens. I move their reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SARGENT. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 549) to relinquish the title of the United States to certain property in the city and county of San Francisco, California, to ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration. A bill of the same import, a House bill, has passed the Senate, and is now a law.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 203) for the relief of John L. Buck, of Pine Bluff, Arkansas, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 257) for the relief of James R. Porter, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 657) for the relief of Thomas F. Ryan and Charles J. Ryan, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Jackson Tibbetts and others, contractors on the improvement of the Fox River, Wisconsin, praying that the amount forfeited to the United States by the contractors, by the annulment of their contract be applied to the payment of wages due to their employés, reported adversely thereon, and moved that the claim be rejected; which was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. The Sac and Fox tribe of Indians occupying a reservation partly in Kansas and partly in Nebraska sent a petition here at the last session praying for the passage of an act authorizing the sale of a certain portion of their reservation. The Committee on Indian Affairs have had the subject under consideration, and have directed me to report back the petition, and recommend that they be discharged from its further consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee will be discharged from the further consideration of the petition, if there be no objection.

Mr. INGALLS. I am also directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 388) to provide for the sale of a portion of the reservation of the Sac and Fox Indians in the States of Kansas and Nebraska, to report it without amendment and to recommend its passage. If there is nothing of an urgent character before the Senate at the present time, I ask for the consideration of the bill now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator from Kansas will discover on page 208 of the laws of last session that the provisions of this bill are already substantially in the law.

Mr. PADDOCK. I think that the bill had better lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the matter lie over until the subject can be examined.

Mr. PADDOCK. The same provisions are embraced in the law of last year providing for the sale of the Otoe reservation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar.

MANNER OF COUNTING ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print additional copies of the statement prepared by the Chief Clerk of the Senate in regard to the manner of counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment in the nature of a substitute and to ask for its present consideration. The amendment provides for 5,000 copies and the original resolution gave 8,500.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution, as amended by the committee, will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That 5,000 copies of the statement prepared by the Chief Clerk of the Senate in regard to the manner of counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President from 1789 to 1873 be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. I would rather that that should lie over. I think I shall have an amendment to offer to the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio object to its present consideration?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution goes over.

ELECTORAL VOTE OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. ANTHONY. The same committee, to whom was referred a motion to print additional copies of the letter of the President with the accompanying documents on the election in Louisiana, have instructed me to report the following resolution and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That 1,850 extra copies of the letter of the President with the accompanying documents on the election in Louisiana be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask that that resolution may lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over under objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think under the rules a report from the Committee on Printing may be considered without lying over. It is done as a matter of usage, at least.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All reports must go over upon objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. I thought an exception was made in favor of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The exception of unanimous consent, usually.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All reports may be considered when made, by unanimous consent. The colleague of the Senator from Ohio has objected.

Mr. SHERMAN. All right. I got the impression from the usage of the House.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is very seldom that Senators object to reports from the Committee on Printing, they are always so judicious; but when a Senator does object I suppose we must act under the ordinary rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am also instructed by the Committee on Printing to report the following resolution, and I ask for its present consideration:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That 10,000 additional copies of the letter of the President with the accompanying documents on the election in Louisiana be printed; of which 2,500 shall be for the use of the Senate and 7,500 shall be for the use of the House of Representatives.

Mr. THURMAN. What is that? I thought that was the matter just reported upon.

Mr. ANTHONY. It relates to the same document, but the previous resolution is a Senate resolution. The first resolution included the number that the Senate may print under the law without the assent of the House of Representatives. The second resolution is for an additional number, which requires the concurrence of the House.

Mr. THURMAN. Then let me understand. I thought that the rule provided that we may print for the Senate 1,500 copies.

Mr. ANTHONY. That has already been ordered to be done. These are additional copies.

Mr. THURMAN. The rule provides for 1,500 copies as the usual number, I am told.

Mr. ANTHONY. The usual number has been ordered, and that gives one to each Senator and Representative and other copies that go according to a specified order of distribution.

Mr. THURMAN. And now there is a resolution to print 1,850 more?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; of the same document.

Mr. THURMAN. And then 10,000 additional on that?

Mr. ANTHONY. And 10,000 on that number.

Mr. THURMAN. Making 11,850. Let the resolution go over.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to have the resolution considered promptly. I wish the Senator from Ohio would allow it to be considered now, for the reason that, if it is to be printed at all in extra numbers, the document can be printed a great deal cheaper now than a week or ten days hence. It is a great inconvenience to keep the type standing; probably it cannot be kept standing. I am willing of course to hear everything the Senator has to say against the printing, but I hope the resolution will be allowed to come up to-morrow for the sake of public economy.

Mr. THURMAN. I shall not delay the matter at all, but I want to move an amendment to the resolution when it comes up.

Mr. ANTHONY. Can the Senator not move his amendment now?

Mr. THURMAN. No; I am not prepared to do it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over, objection being made to its present consideration.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WHYTE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1075) for the relief of Brantz Mayer, of Baltimore, and James W. McCulloh, of New York; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying petition, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1076) for the protection and preservation of the salmon fisheries of the Columbia River; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PROPOSED TERRITORY OF PEMBINA.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I desire to call up the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. No. 606) to establish the Territory of Pembina, and to provide a temporary government therefor, was passed. Toward the close of the last session the Senator from Missouri moved to reconsider the action of the Senate in passing the bill, for the purpose of changing the name of the Territory. I desire that action may be had upon that motion, so that if the bill is to be reconsidered it shall be done now.

Mr. BOGY. I favor the provisions of the bill generally. I am in favor of the organization of a Territory in that portion of the country. I do not now remember whether the boundaries of the proposed Territory were entirely satisfactory to me. I think they were not exactly so, although I do not raise any objection of that kind. The objection which I had was to the name, and that objection appears to be considered so unimportant that it is very hard to get the attention of the Senate to a matter of that character. I think we ought to pay some attention to the giving of proper names, historic names, and handsome names to our new Territories which are in time to become States of the Union. I explained at that time that the word "Pembina" is insignificant, not historic, and really not an Indian name but a corruption of two French words; and I selected another name, a very handsome name, sounding well, and also historic—the name of Algonquin. I repeat, it is very hard to get the attention of the Senate to a subject so apparently unimportant, but I do feel some little anxiety that proper names, handsome names, and historic names shall be given to new Territories.

I know that my friend from Nebraska will insist upon this name of Pembina, because he says he has been informed himself that it is the desire of the people of that country; but, even if it were so, that would not be an argument, because the number of persons now in that Territory is small. But even that is not exactly true, admitting at the same time that my friend has that information. Two years ago, or perhaps three years ago, I was in that portion of the country, and the name of Pembina was acceptable to but few persons, and, I may say, not to a single person when it was explained. Pembina is a common name in that country. There is a large tree growing in the region toward Hudson's Bay called pembina; the region of country is called the pembina region. Nevertheless, I repeat that the name of Pembina is not handsome, is not historic, and that it is not Indian. The name of Algonquin was the cognomen of a tribe large in number, extending from the shores of the Chesapeake Bay away up into Maine. It was a generic tribe, if I may use that term, embracing within its nationality many subordinate tribes.

I therefore propose, if the bill be taken up, that that change be made.

Mr. CLAYTON. As I understand, this new Territory of Pembina, the whole of it, is to be carved out of the original Territory of Dakota, is it not?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLAYTON. In view of the fact that there is a probability of the Black Hills country being ceded by the Indians to the United States, a large portion of which also lies in Dakota Territory, and of the likelihood that the cession of that territory may make it necessary to create a new territory covering that Black Hills country, and as these facts did not exist at the time this bill was acted upon by the committee and reported to the Senate, it seems to me this matter had better be held in abeyance until the Committee on Territories can examine further into the propriety of changing the boundaries of this new proposed Territory. I make the suggestion in view, as I said before, of the additional large territory which is likely to be ceded to the Government now held by the Sioux Indians. If there be any necessity at all for creating a new Territory, it seems to me it would be in that direction more than in the direction where this Territory is proposed to be organized under the present bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The territory which is covered by the boundaries named in the bill does not comprise the Black Hills country, and the organization of the Territory of Pembina has no effect, directly or indirectly, upon any future organization of the territory which covers and comprises the mineral region known as the Black Hills. The merits and demerits of the bill were discussed at some length at the last session, and the necessity and economy of the passage of the bill were pretty generally understood then and admitted. Whatever it may be necessary to do hereafter in regard to the organization of a Territory in the Black Hills region can be done when that necessity arises; but there is a necessity that this question of name should be settled, and settled now, if this bill is to become a law at the present session. As was pretty generally admitted at the last session, the necessity for the organization of this Territory arises from the fact that the northern portion of Dakota is entirely separated in its political and geographical interests from the southern portion.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to ask the Senator if he desires to take up the bill now?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The bill has already passed the Senate. The Senator from Missouri moved its reconsideration for the purpose of changing the name of the Territory.

Mr. SARGENT. Will not the Senator wait until we get through with the ordinary morning business? Then I will not antagonize it. Otherwise I shall object.

Mr. CLAYTON. Let it go over at least for to-day.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If any one objects, I shall not press the bill now.

Mr. SARGENT. Let us get through with the ordinary morning business.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I thought we were through.

Mr. SARGENT. Are resolutions in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Resolutions are in order.

TESTIMONY AS TO CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. SARGENT. I offer the following resolution, which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That 10,000 extra copies of the evidence taken by the Joint Special Committee on Chinese Immigration be printed for the use of the Senate.

I should like to say to the chairman of the Committee on Printing and to the Senate that this document is very remarkable among public documents. The evidence taken was from very intelligent sources. It embraces reliable evidence, I think, upon religion, superstitions, habits, ethnology, on industrial questions, on questions of trade and commerce, and it will be a book that will be very much sought after. I am informed at the Printing Office that a large amount of it is now in type and that it is necessary for them to know as soon as possible whether extra copies are to be printed, and of course it can be done cheaper now than at any other time. I trust the Committee on Printing will report back the resolution in good time and that the Senate will adopt it.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing.

ELECTORAL VOTE OF OREGON.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Oregon resolution which was up yesterday.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope we may have a vote now on the resolution. It is very important that there should be early action upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which was to strike out all after the word "whereas," in the first line, and insert the following in lieu thereof:

It is alleged that at the late election for electors of President and Vice-President for the State of Oregon the people of said State, by a majority of over 1,000 votes, elected W. H. Odell, John C. Cartwright, and J. W. Watts;

And whereas it is also alleged that the governor of said State did subsequently, in violation of law and in defiance of the expressed will of the people, issue a certificate of election to one E. A. Cronin instead of to said J. W. Watts;

And whereas it is also alleged that said E. A. Cronin did, in violation of law, upon some pretext, assume to select for his colleagues one J. N. T. Miller and John Parker in lieu of said W. H. Odell and John C. Cartwright;

And whereas it is further alleged that said Cronin, Miller, and Parker have assumed to cast the vote of Oregon for President and Vice-President, and to certify the same to the President of the Senate: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections is hereby instructed to inquire into the eligibility of said J. W. Watts, and investigate the facts attending the appointment of said electors and pretended electors, and report the same to the Senate, and for this purpose may employ a stenographer, send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and examine witnesses.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I trust after what was suggested by the Senator from Oregon yesterday, that he will not object to permitting such an amendment to the preamble of this resolution as will enable those of us who favor the general object to vote for its adoption. For one I am entirely disposed, indeed I may say that I am very desirous, to have all the instruction that can be given to me by the action of the Committee on Privileges and Elections in regard to this important class of subjects touching governmental powers now coming into such prominence before the minds of the people of this country. But I do not see why for the purpose of procuring the information there should not be just sufficient recital in the preamble of the condition of affairs which justifies the inquiry, without making it so full of reflections in advance upon a governor of one of the States of this Union. Perhaps it may be superfluous for me to say, and yet it is rather an indulgence of my feeling to say, that everything and anything which tends to defeat the great majority principle of republican government I look upon with regret and disfavor. Wisely or not wisely, that is the basis of the conduct of affairs in this country, that the will of the people expressed according to law shall be held the controlling power and the controlling principle. Therefore it is that I exceedingly regret that there should have been any question arising out of the vote of the people of this Union in any State thereof, and that anything should be permitted or should be compelled under arrangement of law to defeat the will of the majority substantially and honestly expressed. I am frank to say that in any capacity where I stood armed with official power and responsibility my leanings would be altogether in favor of a recognition of the honest, actual popular will expressed according to the forms of law. But, sir, in this case I am not prepared to denounce in advance, by any reflection or by any indirection, the action of an officer clothed with the duties of official power. I am not prepared to say of the action of a man who has heretofore stood high in the community where he has lived, who has been elevated by the votes of his people to their chief magistracy and who is to-day a member-elect of this Senate, that he has not carried out the laws of his State and the laws of the United States, duly and properly, conscientiously and honorably. It is perfectly plain that the duties which he has exercised have been those of the very highest importance and to be tempered and controlled by a high sense of conscientious discretion. Far be it from me to say of political friend or foe, in advance and without trial, that he is to be condemned for a willful maladministration of his great trusts. Every presumption is against this. Legal presumptions are all against this. Moral presumptions are all against this. We have no right therefore by a mere preamble to suggest moral delinquency and official delinquency in any one, much more to place that upon the forehead of a mere resolution of inquiry. The inquiry is proper; it is important; it needs care and thought; and those who shall report upon it I doubt not will be influenced by proper motives in giving their opinion to the Senate. But, Mr. President, it will not do in the present state of affairs, and even for those who may be disposed to hold opinions expressed here in great haste, and I think with great injustice in advance of examination, of condemnation against this official—it will not do for them to so weaken their case by prejudging it and announcing in advance by the tone of their preamble what will be the result of their report. That will not do, sir. It is not conducive to justice; and in a time like this nothing less than justice, untouched and untainted by party heats, will satisfy the minds of the American people, and, as I trust, of those who represent them in the two Houses of Congress.

Now, Mr. President, this question of law has been discussed in advance, I do not wish to say in any disrespect, prematurely; I do not mean to say that the arguments were improper; but it does seem to me it would have been better to follow as a commentary on the examination of this committee than as an argument in advance. The law of this case by authority that is entitled to respect and weight is entirely, and has been by courts of high character and final jurisdiction in States of this Union, declared in complete and exact justification of the act of Governor Grover. Therefore it will not do to denounce and condemn him in advance, when he is backed by such an authority as I hold in my hand, the re-affirmed judgments of the supreme court of the State of Indiana. I do not know but that this authority should have more weight with the honorable Senator from Indiana than with the Senator from any other State; but in 1860 the court of appeals in Indiana, in the well-known case of Gulick vs. New, made a decision, to the syllabus of which I will refer, a decision that the governor of that State could determine even against the decision of a board of canvassers, "whether an applicant is entitled to receive a commission or not, where the objection to his right to receive it rests upon the ground that a constitutional prohibition is interposed." Such was the law under the decisions in Indiana, and it stands unquestioned until this day; nay, it stands re-affirmed since that day; and in looking at the composition of the court of Indiana I find that but one judge in 1872 who sat in the case of Price vs. Baker, the governor, sat in the case of Gulick vs. New in 1860. It was a court composed of members of both political parties, to which circumstance I make a very hesitating reference and perhaps should apologize for it. In 1860 the supreme court, composed of four members, decided the law to be upon this question of gubernatorial power of correcting the report of the canvass of a board of canvass, of withholding a certificate upon the direct and very ground which Governor Grover has undertaken to assume as correct in this case, to wit, that there was a constitutional ineligibility which the board of canvass had not chosen to recognize, but which he was bound to recognize and in recognizing to exclude the party ineligible and to certify the fact. Such was the opinion of the supreme court of the State of Indiana in 1860. Not only was that fact decided and never from that day to this questioned in any court of that State, but the further doctrine was announced that "where a majority of the ballots at an election were for a person not eligible to the office under the constitution" then "the ballots cast for such ineligible person were ineffectual, and that the person receiving the greatest number of legal votes, though not a majority of the ballots, was duly elected and entitled to the office." Such was the doctrine in 1860 of the supreme court of Indiana; and when the composition of that court had entirely changed in 1872, so that but one member who sat in 1860 occupied the bench in 1872, in the case of Price vs. Baker the doctrine was re-affirmed and the case of Gulick vs. New cited without qualificatien as authority. Said the court in 1872, following their decision of 1860:

It is a principle of law well settled in this State, that where a majority of the ballots at an election are given to a candidate who is not eligible to the office, the ballots so cast are not to be counted for any purpose. They cannot be counted to elect the ineligible candidate or to defeat the election of an opposing candidate by showing that he did not receive a majority of the votes cast at such election. They are regarded as illegal and as having no effect upon the election for any purpose. As a consequence, it follows that the candidate who is eligible, having the highest number of legal votes, though that number may be less than the number of votes cast for the ineligible candidate and less than a majority of all the votes cast at such election, is entitled to the office.

Now, Mr. President, I do not propose in advance to present here a brief of argument and authorities to control the action of the Senate, or to control my own action or vote in this case; but I merely read these authorities to show how perfectly unjust it is to declare in the words of this preamble "the governor of said State did subsequently, in violation of law and in defiance of the expressed will of the people," do a certain act.

Sir, whether the action of the governor of Oregon has been according to law or not is a most important question upon which I conceive it will be the duty of every member of this Senate hereafter to decide judicially. Upon the law of Oregon and the principles which must govern it, I do not mean at this time to express an opinion; but I shall obediently wait and then respectfully consider the information that shall be conveyed to us by the committee to whom this subject is to be referred, and not consent in advance to stigmatize the action of an officer, when in condemning him I should also be compelled to condemn a respectable, honorable, and upright tribunal of last resort in a sister State.

Why, Mr. President, it will not do in this way to hurl anathemas and denunciations at the head of a man in a high position who palpably with legal authority at his back, acting if you please to believe it erroneously, but acting under the very highest sense of responsibility, has chosen to construe his duty in a certain way. I cannot doubt that his motive has been pure, honorable, and upright, because that would simply be in consonance with all I have ever heard of his previous life, and never with my consent, and I trust not with the consent of a majority of this body, shall we strike until we have heard. The honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] with much elaboration stated what was the English law on this subject and cited sundry cases. There are, and I hold in my hand authorities later in date embracing all those to which he referred yesterday, and giving the decision made in the case of the parliamentary election in the county of Galway between W. Le Poeur French, the petitioner, and Nolan, the respondent, which was decided in the court of common pleas in Ireland before a full court in 1872. I take leave to say that this is the latest expression of English law upon this subject known to me. It will be found in the second volume of English Reports, Moak's Notes, and there may be something very instructive in considering the reasoning of the court in delivering their opinion.

Into that case there entered not only a great deal of party prejudice but even of a more dangerous and tempting prejudice, that of religious animosity and prejudice, or rather sectarian. One judge held that in that case the electors were not fixed with knowledge of the disqualification of one of the candidates, and therefore that his minority opponent was not entitled to the seat; but three judges who concurred, and whose judgment controlled the case, found that the electors had knowledge of this disqualification, and their votes for one party were thrown away, and the other, the minority man, being the only candidate for whom votes were legally given, was entitled to the seat. There the position was taken that the only thing that could prevent the party receiving the minority of the legal votes cast from taking his seat, provided the majority candidate was ineligible, was the fact that notice of the ineligibility should not be brought home to those who so cast their votes. The facts of the case were simply these: Captain Nolan, for whom a majority of the votes were cast had been disqualified because he had been guilty of the violation of a statute prohibiting intimidation at the polls. There had been no adjudication and no sentence of disqualification passed upon him; but the fact that he had disqualified himself by being guilty his opponent alleged; and then, to bring notice of that home to the voters, he caused affidavits and statements alleging the commission of the disqualifying acts by Captain Nolan to be distributed throughout the booths and other places of voting, so that, he said that he had brought home, with all the certainty the case admitted, knowledge of the disqualification to the voters, who, having such knowledge, yet deliberately voted for an ineligible man. The question between the different members of the court was not as to the principle, but it was as to the application of the principle to the case before them. Three of the judges held that there had been sufficient notice given arising out of the state of facts; when one held that there had not been; three held that the seat passed to the man who had received the minority of the votes; one held it had not; and the difference of reasoning between them was the extent to which notice had been brought home to the minds of the persons who cast those votes for an ineligible man.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? Was it not claimed there that notice had been given, so that all the voters knew the fact, by posting up and by giving personal notice to the voters?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope this matter will be allowed to go on to a conclusion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I cannot consent that it shall go on and be finished now; but according to the usual courtesy, I cannot take the Senator from Delaware off his feet. The matter is not so pressing. Therefore, I have no objection to the special order being passed over informally until the Senator from Delaware concludes.

Mr. MITCHELL. I simply desire to state in this connection that the witnesses are here; and it is very important there should be early action.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By general consent, the unfinished business will be passed over until the Senator from Delaware is through, and the resolution will remain before the Senate.

Mr. BAYARD. The case had better stand on its own definition; and I will read to the Senate the words used, because words are very important in considering such subjects:

First, then, it is necessary to see whether there are any principles to be deduced from the decisions of the House of Commons upon the question whether a duly qualified candidate is entitled, though in a minority, to be seated in case the other candidate is proved to have been disqualified at the time of the election, and the electors were duly apprised of such disqualification. The research and industry of counsel have referred to all the cases from the earliest times before committees upon the point; I need not travel through them.

I may say this decision was made in 1872.

The result of them is that, in very many cases, the candidate in the minority has been seated upon proof of the knowledge of the disqualification of his opponent being brought home to the electors; and in other cases, upon apparently a similar state of facts, the committees have simply unseated the disqualified candidate, and declared the election void.

Then they refer to two apparently contradictory cases in which there was a divided opinion among the committees, showing us that which we have seen in our own land, that where the question of admission to Parliament or to either House of Congress is to be decided, very often principles are overruled and conclusions made which are irreconcilable upon principle.

Failing then—

As the court states—

to discover in the chaos of decisions any settled principles which should absolutely govern us, we must have recourse to our common law for rules and analogies to guide our judgment; a course to which, for myself, I must say I turn with pleasure, because we find in it, though ofted mixed up with, and obscured by, what may be deemed technical or narrow principles of the soundest sense and the truest wisdom, and, above all, a power of expansiveness and adaptation which, when properly applied, is adequate to the solution of the novel questions, which, in the complex relations grown out of an advanced civilization, are continually coming to the surface. This exhaustive power is well stated in the passage of Mr. Justice Coleridge's judgment in Gosling vs. Veley, 4 H. L., 768, to which Mr. Murphy referred, and, in the language of Lord Chief-Justice Eyre in Ilderton vs. Ilderton, 2 H. Bl., 145, where he says that when one mode of trial is obsolete or inapplicable, the common law, out of its own inexhaustible fountain of justice, will devise another.

The court then proceeds to cite a list of authorities which I will not detain the Senate by reading; but Lord Ellenborough is cited as saying:

The general proposition, that votes given for a candidate after notice of his being ineligible are to be considered the same as if the persons had not voted at all, is supported by the cases of The Queen vs. Boscawen, Easter, 13 Anne; The King vs. Withers, Easter, 8 Geo. 2; Taylor vs. Mayor of Bath, M., 15 Geo. 2, all which are cited in Cowper, 537, The King vs. Monday.

Then in the case of Taylor, Bigg, and Kingston:

The Lord Chief-Justice Lee at nisi prius directed the jury that if they were satisfied that the electors had notice of Bigg's want of qualification, they should find for the plaintiff; that was Taylor, who had only 13 votes, because Bigg not being qualified was to be considered as a person not in esse, and the voting for him a mere nullity. The jury found for the plaintiff; and the court, on motion for a new trial, agreed with the law as laid down by Lord Chief-Justice Lee, and refused a new trial.

Then came a decision by Lord Eldon in the House of Lords; in Hawkins vs. Rex, 2 Dow's Parl. Cases at page 148, and he puts it upon the ground that "the majority knowingly voted for this dead man."

It is quite true that the candidate in that case admitted his own incapacity; but it will be found in late cases that that is not material, and if the elector votes after he knows of the disqualification he does so at the peril of losing his vote.

Lord Denman, a great constitutional lawyer, lays down the rule as expressly applicable to elections for the House of Commons. At page 436 he says: Upon the argument of this case, the counsel for the defendants did not shrink from meeting his opponent on the principle; majority be truly asserted to mean legal majority, and he contended that, although there might be numerically more vestrymen present, who were in intention adverse to the rate, than those who voted for it, yet the majority of votes legally expressed was in its favor.

Then the opinion proceeds to recite another list of cases, some of which have been referred to in this debate, the case of King vs. Hawkins in 10 East and King vs. Parry in 14 East:

The result of the decisions appears to be this: Where an elector, before voting, receives due notice that a particular candidate is disqualified, and yet will do nothing but tender his vote for him, he must be taken voluntarily to abstain from exercising his franchise; and, therefore, however strongly he may in fact dissent, and in however strong terms he may disclose his dissent, he must be taken in law to assent to the election of the opposing and qualified candidate, for he will not take the only course by which it can be resisted; that is, the helping to the election of some other person. He is present as an elector; his presence counting as such to make up the requisite number of electors, where a certain number is necessary; but he attends only as an elector, to perform the duty which is cast on him by the franchise he enjoys as elector; he can speak only in a particular language; he can do only certain acts; any other language means nothing; any other act is null; his duty is to assist in making an election. If he dissents from the choice of A, who is qualified, he must say so by voting for some other also qualified; he has no right to employ his franchise merely in preventing an election, and so defeating the object for which he is empowered and bound to attend. And this is a wise and just rule in the law. It is necessary that an election should be duly made, and at the lawful time; the electoral meeting is held for that purpose only, and but for this rule the interest of the public and the purpose of the meeting might both be defeated by the perverseness or corruption of electors, who may seek some unfair advantage by postponement. If, then, the elector will not oppose the election of A in the only legal way, he throws away his vote, by directing it where it has no legal force; and in so doing he voluntarily leaves unopposed, i. e., assents to, the voices of the other electors.

Where the disqualification depends upon a fact which may be unknown to the elector, he is entitled to notice, for without, the inference of assent could not be fairly drawn, nor could the consequence as to the vote be just. But if the disqualification be of a sort whereof notice is to be presumed, none need expressly be given. No one can doubt that, if an elector would nominate and vote only for a woman to fill the office of mayor, or burgess in Parliament, his vote would be thrown away; there the fact would be notorious and every man would be presumed to know the law upon the fact. This decision was reversed in the House of Lords on a collateral point, (see 4 House of Lords, 679,) but the principles laid down by Lord Denman have never been questioned.

One of the illustrations is that it is claimed "that, if an elector knows as a fact that the candidate for whom he is about to vote is disqualified and yet persists in voting for him, the elector's vote is as utterly thrown away as if he voted for a dead person or for the man in the moon." That statement is repeated again in the course of the decision.

Mr. MORTON. May I ask what illustration is given of presumptive knowledge. Will the Senator refer back to what he has just read? It was the case of voting for a woman, was it not?

Mr. BAYARD. I will give the case.

Can any elector be assumed to be ignorant that a candidate openly practicing intimidation and undue influence was not by law disqualified to be elected? I think not. It is quite true that a man cannot be assumed to know legal technicalities, or, as Mr. Justice Maule says, in a case cited by Judge Blackburn there, (see Martindale vs. Falkner, 2 C. B., at page 720, 15 L. J. C. P., at page 94:) "It would be too much to hold that ordinary people are bound to know in what particular court such and such a practice does or does not prevail." Lord Westbury, in the case of Cooper vs. Phibbs, L. R. 2 H. L. Cas., 149, thus explains the maxim at page 170: It is said, "Ignorantia juris haud excusat," but in that maxim the word "jus" is used in the sense of general law.

"The general law," the ordinary law of the country. Now, what, pray, is the Constitution of the United States? Is that a special law? Does that depend upon technicalities, or is it not, with a force not known in England, the general law of the United States? As my friend from Ohio citing the language suggests, it is "the supreme law of the land."

Mr. Justice Lush, in his judgment in the Mayor of Tewkesbury's case (see 16 W. R., 1200, L. R. 3 Q. B., page 638) says: "For the reasons given by my brother Blackburn, I am of opinion that it is not enough to show that the voter knew the fact only, but that it is necessary to show sufficient to raise a reasonable inference that he knew the fact amounted to a disqualification. It cannot be said in all cases that the mere knowledge of a fact which in law disqualified a candidate must be taken to be knowledge of all the accompanying circumstances." Taking the rule thus to be laid down, I am clearly of opinion that it is not only a reasonable inference, but a legal inference from the facts stated, which I am bound to draw, that the electors who knew of the exercise of these acts of undue influence, spiritual intimidation, knew that they disqualified the candidate.

And then they proceed to state what was the testimony under which they found that the acts had been committed in the community where the vote was cast, affidavits alleging these acts were scattered broadcast on the day of election around the polls, and for these reasons they gave their decision. This is followed in a note by the recital of a case in New York, which was an appeal to the supreme court of that State, the case of Furman vs. Clute, which was subsequently, however, overruled in the New York court of appeals, in the fiftieth volume of New York Reports. But in this case of Furman vs. Clute, the supreme court of the State of New York decided that, where there was an ineligibility for the election for superintendent of the poor in the city of Schenectady and "the ground of the decision that Clute was not eligible to the office, is that being supervisor of the Fifth ward of the city of Schenectady he was debarred from holding that of superintendent of the poor, the statute providing that 'no supervisor of any town, or county treasurer, shall be appointed to hold the office of superintendent of the poor of any county in this State.'"

The question came up whether when the people throughout that county voted for a man who was ineligible they knew it. The court required that knowledge of that fact should be brought home to them, but not in the ward in which the supervisor lived and exercised his duties, and therefore they permitted the 295 votes cast in that ward of the city of Schenectady in which this gentleman exercised the powers of supervisor to be separated from the rest and declared that in the ward where he sat and exercised his powers, in that local division of power in which these 295 voters resided, those voters should have been held to have full notice, and knowing that they were voting for a disqualified man, were held to have thrown their votes away and did not intend to defeat the opposing candidate because they had neglected the only means whereby they could defeat him, which was to vote against him and vote for a qualified person against him. That decision, however, was overruled by the court of appeals of New York.

I have only cited this, as I have cited this other authority, not for the purpose of concluding my judgment on the subject, not for the purpose of making an attempt at concluding the judgment of anybody upon this Oregon case, but merely to show you how much law, how much reasoning, how many respectable decisions can be produced to sustain diverse opinions in regard to this exceedingly important subject. Perhaps I may say what my present impression is generally of the law, that we should lean as much as we can against the doctrine of the English cases. That is my personal belief. The great foundations, the great underlying principle of a republican government is the residence of power in the majority. It is the majority principle that we should strive to sustain, and I would never defeat that willingly by a technicality, and it would require the law to hold me to it, but yet law can hold me to it. A majority means a legal majority, and therefore we must ascertain in the present case what was the law and what justification there has been for the party whose duty it was to execute it and who has done so according to his conscience.

Now, Mr. President, I propose to the Senator from Oregon to strike out his preamble and insert this:

Whereas it is alleged that the governor of the State of Oregon has issued a certificate of election to one E. A. Cronin as one of the electors of said State instead of issuing such certificate to one J. W. Watts, alleging that the said Watts was ineligible to the said office of elector on November 7, 1876, the time of said election: Therefore,

Be it resolved—

That brings up sufficient justification for the resolution, and it subtracts from the preamble recitals which I think are unjust and also incorrect. I believe that the great matter for us is, and I have endeavored to exhibit that in the manner in which I have discussed the resolution, to decide these questions with the most scrupulous regard for law. Laws have their periods of test, and if ever the laws of the United States and the spirit of subordination of the people to the laws, the duty of holding all citizens whether in or out of office to obedience to law, was never, never more forcibly brought home to us than it is now. And, therefore, while I trust this examination will be made, prior to the grave, deliberate utterance of opinion by the appropriate committee of the Senate, at the same time I hope the report of the committee will not be weakened or prejudiced by anticipating the character of their decision in the unnecessary charges, innuendoes, and implications, to say the least, which the present preamble contains.

I therefore trust that the honorable Senator from Oregon, as he desires to reach the substantial fact of inquiry, and I desire to aid him in it, will not bind us to a recital of facts in the preamble that are entirely useless for the purposes of decision, but which I submit to him are rather destined to anticipate the judgment to be given, because they do anticipate it or may be held to anticipate it. I know the preamble has already been amended by the action of the honorable Senator himself, and therefore I trust that this reasonable and, as I think, this entirely just proposition of mine in regard to the preamble may be adopted without objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the regular order.

Mr. MITCHELL. I wish to be allowed one moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BURNSIDE in the chair.) The Senator from Vermont calls for the regular order, which is the joint resolution (S. R. No. 10) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, the pending question being on the passage of the joint resolution, upon which question the Constitution requires the yeas and nays to be taken.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President——

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. MITCHELL. With the consent of the Senator from Missouri, who kindly gives way to me for a moment, I desire to state that I am a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections and have been assigned as one of the members of a subcommittee to proceed to Florida to investigate the election in that State. While I do not desire to shirk any duty to which I may be assigned by the Senate or by any committee to which I belong, I find that it is absolutely impossible for me, in justice to my constituents, to leave here at this time. I therefore desire to tender my resignation as a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections and hope it may be accepted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate excuse the Senator from Oregon from further service upon the Committee on Privileges and Elections? The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORTON. I simply desire to remark that there is an investigation on hand in which the State of Oregon is interested, which renders it perfectly proper that the Senator from that State should be here. He is interested in the present discussion that is going on. We think it important that the Senator from Oregon shall remain. I move, therefore, that the Chair fill the vacancy.

The motion was agreed to by unanimous consent; and

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. SARGENT to fill the vacancy.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. CLAYTON, it was Ordered, That Isaac A. Morris have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate, leaving copies of the same.

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 10) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, the question being on its passage.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, it is my purpose to address some observations to the Senate, but I regret I have not had the time to make the preparation which the subject really demands. I fully appreciate its importance, and particularly at this time and under the singular circumstances now existing.

A proposition to amend the Constitution is, under all circumstances and all times, one of very great interest. It is the fundamental law, and the foundation on which rests all the vast superstructure of material, social, political, and, I may say, religious interests. This written Constitution should be amended but seldom, and, when a proposition is presented to amend and to change it, it should be examined with great care and deliberation, after long study, and with an honest purpose to decide the subject as its importance really demands.

I believe that the section of the Constitution which it is proposed to amend ought not to be amended; that it is fully capable of carrying out the object intended to be accomplished by the proposed amendment, and I will attempt to show that the action and the practice of the Government from the beginning, in 1789, to the present day, has in the main been uniform on this subject, and that this gives to this section a construction rendering it now very plain. When I say this I do not wish to be understood as stating that this has been perfectly regular, but that this uniformity has been of a general character. I can compare it to nothing better than to the geological formation of our earth, where the different strata, although in the main regular, are now and then broken by great dikes of rock belonging to a different period; nevertheless to the eye of the scientific geologist the formation of the earth from its primitive condition to what it is to-day has been uniform, and to his eye is as plain as if written in letters of gold.

My object will be to establish this point, that the Constitution as it now stands has been interpreted by the action of the Government from a very early period to the present day in a way so as to make that which originally was somewhat obscure now very plain.

If this be so then I believe the Constitution is ample if it be faithfully carried out by the persons who are called upon to do so. I am aware that at the first election, that of Washington, it is different from what it is afterward. There are several explanations why this should be so; but even this difference is more apparent than real. It will be remembered that the Government was not yet organized. A President had been elected, but his election had not yet been made known officially by any count. The Senate was not organized because the Vice-President designated at the election had not yet been decided by any count to have been elected. So that a count could be effected and the Government organized, on the 6th April, 1789, this resolution was introduced:

The Senate proceeded by ballot to the choice of a President for the sole purpose of opening and counting the votes for President of the United States.

It has been said that this recognizes the power to count the votes by the President of the Senate, who was Mr. John Langdon. Yet a critical analysis of this order, as it was called, will not sustain this opinion. It was simply for the purpose of opening and counting the votes, and for that purpose only. The object was to put the Government into operation. The opening and the counting of the votes was the first thing necessary to be done. Therefore this order was made for that purpose, and for nothing else.

Ordered, That Mr. Ellsworth inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is formed; that a president is elected for the sole purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes of the electors of the several States in the choice of a President and Vice-President of the United States; and that the Senate is now ready, in the Senate Chamber, to proceed in the presence of the House to discharge that duty; and that the Senate have appointed one of their members to sit at the clerk's table to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; submitting it to the wisdom of the House to appoint one or more of their members for the like purpose—who reported that he had delivered the message.

I will call the attention of the Senate to this fact, that from the very beginning to the present day tellers were always appointed. It may appear from the wording of some of these orders (or joint resolutions) that these tellers were appointed merely to keep a tally of the votes as announced by the President of the Senate. I will try to show that these tellers were called upon to perform and did perform the same duty that tellers in modern times have performed, and that they were the agents of the two Houses by whom the votes of the electors were counted. They represented the two Houses. Therefore at the very first election and the first counting of the votes tellers were appointed. The counting having taken place, Mr. Langdon thereupon made this report:

The president elected for the purpose of counting the votes declared to the Senate that the Senate and House of Representatives had met, and that he, in their presence, had opened and counted the votes of the electors for President and Vice-President of the United States of America.

Taking this announcement as correct history, as no doubt it is, Mr. Langdon opened the votes, and also counted them. Under the circumstances it was not very astonishing that but little attention was paid to the subject. Washington was the choice of the entire people. The counting of the votes for him was a matter of naked form, as it was well known that every elector had voted for him. Notwithstanding this it ought not to be overlooked that tellers were appointed, thus recognizing that the two Houses had some duty to perform that necessitated the appointment of them. But since that time—as far as I have been able to ascertain—the votes have been counted by tellers appointed by the two Houses, and there is not one single instance in the long line of our history, (excepting the first time, under the presidency pro tempore of Mr. Langdon,) when the votes for President and Vice-President were not counted by tellers appointed by the two Houses.

The second election resulting as the first, in the election of Washington and Adams, the following took place:

Mr. King, from the joint committee, reported—
That the two Houses shall assemble in the Senate Chamber on Wednesday next, at twelve o'clock; that one person shall be appointed a teller, on the part of the Senate, to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote, and the persons elected, to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid; which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

It is manifest from the report of Mr. King that the counting was done by tellers representing the two Houses, not appointed to make a list of the votes only, but to deliver the results of the count to the President of the Senate, and which, when made, to be announced by him. It will thus be seen that so early as the second election the two Houses, through their tellers, counted the votes, while the first time it appears this was done by the President of the Senate, appointed for this purpose and for this alone.

It appears that the place of the meeting of the two Houses was not regular—at first in the Senate Chamber and afterward in the Chamber of the House. Mr. King, who had great ideas of senatorial dignity, insisted always that this joint meeting should be in the Senate Chamber. He thought it below the dignity of the Senate that it should go to the House of Representatives, but that it was the duty of the House to come to the Senate. It is a pleasure for me to say at this distant day that Mr. King was for many years one of the brightest ornaments of this body—a man of great ability and of great purity of character.

Thus at the second election it appears beyond I think reasonable grounds for controversy that the count of the votes was made by the two Houses, and not by the President of the Senate. We then come to the third election, that of John Adams and Thomas Jefferson. On the 2d of February, 1797, it is reported—

That the two Houses shall assemble in the Chamber of the House of Representatives on Wednesday next, at twelve o'clock; that one person be appointed a teller on the part of the Senate to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote and the persons elected to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid, which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President and, together with a list of votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

Tellers were appointed again to make a list, the result to be delivered to the President of the Senate, and by him to be announced.

This form for the appointment of tellers appears to have been retained from that day, and indeed before to a very recent period. I may say that this form has continued until the adoption of what is known as the twenty-second joint rule. The vote always was returned to the President of the Senate by the tellers, and by him announced, showing that they had necessarily ascertained by a count what the vote was. I now come to the fourth election, that of Thomas Jefferson and Aaron Burr, in 1801; and here again the same form of order is retained.

Four years before the meeting had taken place in the Chamber of the House. This time it is in the Senate Chamber, showing that the practice upon the subject has not been uniform, and I think it is of no consequence whatsoever.

Resolved, That the Senate will be ready to receive the House of Representatives in the Senate Chamber on Wednesday next, at twelve o'clock, for the purpose of being present at the opening and counting the votes for President of the United States; that one person be appointed a teller on the part of the Senate to make a list of the votes for President of the United States as they shall be declared, and that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote, which shall be entered on the Journals; and if it shall appear that a choice hath been made agreeably to the Constitution, such entry on the Journal shall be deemed a sufficient declaration thereof.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives of this resolution.

Tellers as before are to be appointed to make a list of the votes—the result to be delivered to the President of the Senate.

Mr. Burr, then Vice-President and consequently President of the Senate, at the opening of the joint session made a short speech in which he showed what was meant by this duty devolved on the tellers. This speech is important, and I will read it verbatim:

The President (Mr. Burr) stated that, pursuant to law, there had been transmitted to him several packets, which, from the indorsements upon them, appeared to be the votes of the electors of a President and Vice-President; that the returns forwarded by the mail, as well as the duplicates sent by special messengers, had been received by him in due time. You will now proceed, gentlemen, said he, to count the votes as the Constitution and laws direct; adding that, perceiving no cause for preference in the order of opening the returns, he would pursue a geographical arrangement, beginning with the Northern States.—Annals of Congress, Eighth Congress, second session, 1804–1805, page 56.

I call the attention of the Senate to this most significant speech made by this, I may say, remarkable man. For whatever may be said of Mr. Burr he certainly was a man of very great ability, and his construction of the Constitution at that early day is entitled to great respect. He says:

You will now proceed, gentlemen, to count the votes as the Constitution and laws direct.

The two Houses were assembled for that purpose; tellers had been appointed under orders of a similar character as the orders made at the beginning of the Government; that is, to make a list of the votes and return the result to the President of the Senate; he construes this order to mean that the counting of the votes shall be done by the two Houses through their tellers, for he says:

You will now proceed, gentlemen, to count the votes as the Constitution and laws direct.

"As the Constitution and laws direct." There was no law at that time but the law of 1792, directing how the vote should be counted, and this law said this should be done in accordance with the requirements of the Constitution. In this speech Mr. Burr gave a construction to the form of the order appointing tellers—that is, they were to count the votes—as the instruments of the two Houses.

Fom that day to the time of the adoption of the twenty-second joint rule, tellers have been appointed very much in the same language. In 1800, or perhaps in the latter part of 1799, a bill was proposed to create a tribunal to be authorized to pass upon the returns of the votes for President and Vice-President. From the debate on this bill it appears that many distinguished men at that day denied the power of Congress over the votes of the States beyond the duty to count such votes as had been sent to the President of the Senate and by him opened before the two Houses; yet while this appears to have been the opinion of Charles Pinckney and others, leading democrats of that period, no one claimed this power for the President of the Senate.

This bill of 1800, which was opposed by Charles Pinckney and the democrats of that day, was objected to upon the ground that this power belonged to the States. Their objection was founded on the theory that the college of electors was an independent body created by the States, as authorized by the Constitution of the United States, and that this independent body had within itself acting under State laws the power of purging itself of any illegal or improper votes; that when the votes had thus passed through the ordeal of the electoral college none would or could get to Congress but the true and honest votes of the different States.

The Federal party, at whose head stood John Marshall, then a member of the lower House, believed that the power was in Congress to receive or reject the vote of any State which was improperly cast; that Congress had the power also to create a board to be composed of members of the two Houses, authorized to pass upon the votes of the States. However this may be, no one believed that the power to count was in the President of the Senate—no such idea was advanced by any one of any party. This doctrine, if entertained by anybody, is of modern growth and entirely new. The bill failed because of disagreement between the two Houses.

This bill was sent by Mr. Jefferson to Mr. Madison, then at his seat at Montpelier, in Virginia, and we have his letter to Mr. Jefferson on the subject, in which he denies the power of Congress over the subject. His letter is, however, based upon the idea that the electoral college is an independent body, the creature of the States, and having within itself the power to eliminate the votes of any State improperly given.

It is plain that while the power of Congress was opposed by one party and claimed by the other, no one ever said that the power to count the votes, or to reject, or anything else, excepting to open the same was in the President of the Senate.

In 1817 the power of Congress over the vote of a State was asserted in a manner which cannot be misunderstood. This was on the occasion of the counting of the votes at the election of James Monroe and Daniel D. Tompkins.

During the opening of the certificates and counting the electoral votes upon this occasion, the following proceedings in reference to the vote of the State of Indiana took place in the House of Representatives:

February 12, 1817.

The President of the Senate, in the presence of both Houses, proceeded to open the certificates of the electors of the several States, beginning with New Hampshire, which were delivered to the tellers, by whom they were read, and who took lists of the same as far as Indiana. When the President of the Senate was about to open the vote of that State for the purpose of having the same counted,

Mr. Taylor, one of the Representatives from the State of New York, rose and objected to the same; and stated that, in his opinion, the votes of the electors for the said State of Indiana, for President and Vice-President of the United States, ought not to be counted.

Upon which, objection being made, the Senate, on motion of one of its members, withdrew; and being absent,

A resolution was submitted by Mr. Sharp, a member of the House, in the words following:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the votes of the electors for the State of Indiana, for a President and Vice-President of the United States, were properly and legally given and ought to be counted.

A motion was made by Mr. Taylor, of New York, to amend the said resolution by striking out all thereof after the enacting clause, and inserting the following: That the votes of the electors of the State of Indiana having been given previous to the admission of the State into that Union, ought not to be received and counted.

And debate arising thereon,

On motion by Mr. Ingham, that the resolution be postponed indefinitely,

It passed in the affirmative; and

On motion by Mr. Pitkin,

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that this House is again ready to receive them and continue the opening of the certificates and counting the votes of the electors of the several States for a President and Vice-President of the United States, in pursuance of the resolution of the two Houses of the 11th instant, and that the Clerk go with the said message.

Upon this objection being made, the two Houses separated. After consultation the vote was admitted; but it might have been rejected, and the power to admit is no greater or different than the power to reject. In short, the power to pass on the question was claimed and exercised.

The next case which transpired was that of my own State, and was the second election of Monroe and Tompkins:

The two Houses, agreeably to the joint resolution, assembled in the Representatives' Chamber, and the certificates of the electors of the several States, beginning with the State of New Hampshire, were, by the President of the Senate, opened and delivered to the tellers appointed for the purpose, by whom they were read, except the State of Missouri; and when the certificate of the electors of that State was opened, and objection was made by Mr. Livermore, a member of the House of Representatives from the State of New Hampshire, to counting said votes; whereupon,

On motion by Mr. Williams, of Tennessee, the Senate returned to their own Chamber.

[The following proceedings took place in the House of Representatives in reference to the vote of the State of Missouri:

The President of the Senate opened a packet, which he presented to the tellers as containing the votes of the electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, of the State of Missouri; when,

Mr. Livermore, one of the Representatives of the State of New Hampshire, rose, and "objected to the counting of any votes given by Missouri for President and Vice-President of the United States of America, because Missouri is not a State in this Union.

Whereupon,

On motion by a Senator,

The Senate withdrew to their Chamber.

Mr. Floyd submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That Missouri is one of the States of this Union, and her votes for President and Vice-President of these United States ought to be received and counted.

Mr. Archer, of Maryland, moved that the resolution be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. Clay moved that it lie on the table.

And the question being taken thereon,

It passed in the affirmative.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate, to inform that body that the House is now ready to receive the Senate in the Chamber of the House of Representatives, for the purpose of continuing the enumeration of the votes of the electors for President and Vice-President, according to the joint resolutions agreed upon between the two Houses, and that the Clerk go with the said message.]

Thus, Mr. President, from a very early period down to 1821 and for years afterward the action and the practice of the Government has been in the main uniform. This went on in the same way until 1865, when the twenty-second joint rule was adopted. Much has been said as to whether this rule be now in force or not, the Senate saying it is not and the House that it is. In my opinion it is not of any consequence whether it is or not. It stands as a construction and exposition of the twelfth amendment to the Constitution made by the men who were then in Congress, some of whom are here to-day; and this construction is in my opinion in strict conformity with the practice of the Government from an early period. I believe now, as I did at the last session when this subject was before the Senate, that this rule is a correct exposition and interpretation of the Constitution.

The bill offered at the last session by the Senator from Indiana was in every respect but one similar to this rule, and this difference is in this, that as the rule required the sanction of both Houses to receive, the bill requires the sanction of the two to reject. The difference, apparently very slight, is nevertheless very great, and while I believe the rule conforms to the Constitution, the bill may not. My understanding of the Constitution is that it requires the sanction of both Houses to receive, as either House by itself has no power to do anything; that is, it must be the action of Congress, composed as it is of two Houses, and if either declines to receive, the vote stands not received. I consequently voted against this bill, with, however, considerable hesitation, as I was anxious then, as I am now, to adopt a mode which will in conformity to the Constitution be a guide for the action of Congress.

The twelfth amendment to the Constitution—which in this particular is the same as the old Constitution—is in my opinion similar to the twenty-second joint rule, the latter giving in detail what of course is not in the Constitution. No rule could be made which could take away or add to the Constitution. The only object of a rule is to create the machinery to carry out granted powers. This twelfth amendment provides that the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted. The twenty-second joint rule provides the details necessary to carry this out, and provides for the appointment of tellers—two by the House and one by the Senate—to whom shall be handed, as they are opened by the President of the Senate, the certificates of the electoral votes, and no vote shall be counted except by the concurrent vote of the two Houses. This rule I believe to be the meaning of the Constitution; that is, as the power was in Congress, it requires the concurrence of the two Houses constituting the Congress to receive. And the first question which can be presented is to receive, and not to reject, and when once received the question to reject can never be presented.

It is not provided in the Constitution who shall preside over the joint meeting. This, being only a question of form, was very properly put in the rule, and without a rule on this subject the joint session would be without a presiding officer. The President of the Senate would in the joint session be the presiding officer of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House would be of the House. A joint rule is therefore a necessity or a law; without a rule or a law no one is authorized to announce the result of the vote.

I think the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] stated, a day or two ago, that this rule had been adopted by the Senate without consideration or deliberation, and as if of no importance. The truth is, it was reported by Judge Trumbull—as the chairman of a joint committee raised for this purpose—and passed unanimously in both Houses.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Was it not, may I ask my friend, passed on the morning it was reported, without any debate of the important questions that he and I both agree lie in it?

Mr. BOGY. I have no doubt the statement of the Senator is entirely correct, but it does not conflict with what I have said. My statement is this: That although reported on the morning of the meeting of the two Houses, it was the report of a joint committee who had been selected for the purpose of providing a way and a mode of getting at this count, as had been done every four years in all the period of time antecedent to this.

Mr. MORTON. Let me call the attention of my friend. Does my friend mean to say that the twelfth article of the amendments would empower one House to reject the vote of the State of Missouri without the concurrence of the other House? The twenty-second joint rule authorizes that to be done. Does my friend mean to say that the twelfth article of the amendment authorizes that?

Mr. BOGY. I say that according to my understanding this is the meaning of the twelfth amendment of the Constitution, and that the twenty-second joint rule carried out this meaning. If the power to count the vote be in Congress it requires the assent or concurrence of both to agree to receive, and if one does not concur there is no action of Congress, it being composed of two Houses, and the vote necessarily is not received. This I believe to be the Constitution and also the twenty-second rule.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then may I ask my friend a question?

Mr. BOGY. Of course.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do it in the sincere desire to get information, because I do not propose to have a contest with anybody just now on this subject; but I wish to ask my friend this upon his theory: Suppose that at the last election of the present President, (I do not mean the one that may now be drawn into question, because I wish now to say nothing about that at all,) in February, 1873, the Senate of the United States on my friend's theory say: "We reject the vote of the State of New York;" the House say: "We reject the vote of the State of Missouri," for reasons respectively that are satisfactory to the consciences of men I will suppose; I will not speak of a mere wild anarchy that makes objections at large, but suppose both Houses to be acting conscientiously, and so for reasons which each House believes to be valid for itself. You have run the vote down until the only State unobjected to by one House or the other is the State of Delaware. I might take any other State, but I want to take one of the smaller States. Delaware has a little smaller representation than the State of Vermont or I would take that. Delaware has three votes, I believe. Now then, does the Senator mean to say that the single vote of the State of Delaware is to elect a President? If he says no, that in that case the Constitution throws it upon the House of Representatives, then does he say that because through some informality or the non-voting of the electors on the day prescribed by law, the Constitution requiring that they shall all vote on the same day, although the whole number of electors of all the States has been appointed as the Constitution prescribes, yet they have not voted, then the House of Representatives have the power to elect. I say they would have no power to act, because they can only act when somebody fails to receive a choice of the whole number of electors appointed. What are you going to do then? It seems to me the argument of my friend, and I suggest it to him merely to get his views upon it, would lead in certain contingencies to an absolute breaking up of the Government by the exercise of its own constitutional power. Each House by the Constitution is to do a particular thing and doing that particular thing you are to produce a state of anarchy. I do not mean an anarchy of civil commotion and strife, but a legal anarchy, because probably the good sense of most people in the United States would say "If we have not got any Government we will not fight about it; we will try some peaceable means of getting it." I should like my friend's views upon that question.

Mr. BOGY. I will with pleasure reply to my friend, but I will first terminate the argument which I was presenting to the Senate and then will answer him. I was stating that Congress being composed of two separate bodies, independent of each other, working under and according to their own separate rules, their concurrence is required to do anything, no matter what that may be. No act can be performed by one House, but it requires the concurrent action of both.

The first question which necessarily presents itself in a case of this kind is not one of rejection but one of reception. You cannot kick a thief out of your house unless he has previously entered it. You cannot reject anything unless you have previously received it. The common import of language shows this. Therefore the first question which necessarily presents itself to the two Houses is not one of rejection but one of reception. The twenty-second joint rule provided that if the vote of any one State was objected to by either House and the two Houses could not concur on its reception, it being objected to by one House, it was of necessity not received. I said that that was in my opinion the meaning of the Constitution.

Mr. MORTON. Will my friend allow me a moment? He makes the presumption of law against the return from a State. Instead of giving to the return from a State the benefit of the presumption of law in its favor, he makes the presumption of law against it, so that when an objection is made, however trivial or unimportant in itself, both Houses must concur in overruling the objection or this vote of the State goes out. Now, I take it the other way, that the presumption of law is in favor of the return from a State, and unless both Houses concur in rejecting the vote, it ought to be counted. The iniquity of the twenty-second joint rule was that it enabled one House to disfranchise one or all of the States of the Union, an absurdity, I think, upon its face. As to the power of the President of the Senate, I do not choose now to enter into the discussion of that subject.

Mr. BOGY. The Senator from Indiana says it is absurd——

Mr. MORTON. I say that according to my opinion it is absurd.

Mr. BOGY. Yes, absurd that the vote of a State should be rejected by either House.

Mr. MORTON. By the vote of one House.

Mr. BOGY. Of course that would be the vote of either House, and the Senator says it is absurd because the presumption ought to be in favor of the vote of the State. Surely it ought to be in favor of the vote of the State, but I am trying to show that, as it requires the action of Congress to do anything, unless the two Houses concur, nothing can be done, and that this was the twenty-second joint rule. The Senator admits it and calls it iniquitous. I think it is correct and that the mode pointed out in his bill is not correct, I will not say iniquitous. I voted against it after considerable hesitation at the last session. The first duty, as well as the first question, is one of reception and not one of rejection, and although it is a plausible argument to say that the presumption is in favor of the correctness of the vote of a State, yet it is only plausible. There is this one answer to all such questions, and this will reply both to the Senator from Indiana as well as the Senator from Vermont.

The representatives of the people and of the States we must believe will do their duty and nothing less, and no one has the right to presume that the members of either Houses would object to the vote of a State from caprice, and which would justify the other House to object to another from the same motive. Carry out the suggestion a little further and say that both Houses of Congress, when they belong to the same party as they have in this country not very long ago, would reject the vote of every State but one and receive the vote of that State which had voted in accordance with their political views. Suppose that every State in this Union was democratic but one and that Congress was republican, as was the fact a few years ago, on the supposition of my friends that men act dishonestly, which I deny, the vote of every State could be rejected by the concurrent vote of both Houses excepting that one State which is republican. Carry out these suppositions founded on the dishonesty of the representatives of the people and the Government is gone. This you have no right to presume. The presumption of the Constitution, the principles underlying all representative governments, is that public men will discharge their duty with fidelity, with honesty, and when the occasion requires it, regardless of party; and to assume any other theory makes this and all free governments a farce, and it would be wiser to scatter our Constitution and laws to the winds and submissively range ourselves under the protection of the sword. It is true this power may be abused if it is confined to one House with more ease than if it is confided to two Houses, but it is only making the case easier; it is not changing the logic of the argument. If one House can do wrong so can two, and this is the only difference. The difference between the twenty-second joint rule and the bill of the Senator from Indiana is simply in this, as already stated, one requires two to receive, the other two to reject. The first, in my opinion, is more in conformity to the Constitution; the latter perhaps more conservative, for the reason, as already said, that it is more difficult for two to do wrong than it is for one.

If the day ever comes when Congress can be influenced by any other than high, patriotic, and honest influences, the day will have come when no joint rule, or law, or constitution will be respected. The bad men, rogues and thieves and assassins, will be in power, and a bloody revolution will be necessary to wrest the Government from their vile hands, or we will be driven as other nations before us to seek protection in a stronger government. This I will not permit myself to think of.

Mr. MORTON. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BOGY. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to ask the Senator this question: whether his proposition that one House may reject the vote of a State, virtually disfranchising it, is not at variance with our whole theory of government? I take it that the rejection of the vote of a State is one of the most delicate of all the powers that Congress can exercise, if Congress acting as a Congress can do it. We cannot pass the smallest bill, we cannot make an appropriation of $10, we cannot do the smallest act, without the concurrence of both Houses, except those things which each House may do in carrying on its own business, as to questions of order, investigation, and so on. So far as any act is concerned that may affect the country, we cannot do it to the smallest extent, the smallest character, without the vote of both Houses. That is the theory of our Government. My friend proposes that one House, without the concurrence of the other, may disfranchise the State of New York, cast out her vote, and in fact cast out the vote of every State in this Union.

Mr. BOGY. I have admitted that it was easier for one House to do an injustice to a State than for the two Houses, but that is the extent of the argument. You have to suppose that that one House is acting from improper and dishonest motives; that it is led by a spirit of party, or corruption has taken possession of the hearts and the minds of a majority of its members. If that be true as to one House, may it not be true as to the two Houses? It only makes it more difficult.

If the day ever comes when a majority of either House of Congress will so far forget themselves as to reject the vote of a sovereign State which has been cast in accordance with the law and the Constitution, the day will have come when our experiment will be a failure. Power may be abused, and to some extent you cannot keep out of Congress the spirit of party. The best men, the most enlightened and virtuous, are to some extent influenced by it. We cannot help this. It is our frail nature; but frail as we are, unless we are bad and corrupt, there is a point where party stops and country present itself, where party sinks and your country stands before you in all its majestic proportions, and from the frail, weak partisan the patriot arises if he be an honest man. Power is the ability to do, to perform, and to accomplish; and if he who has the power chooses to abuse it, it becomes dangerous. Yet power has from necessity to be placed somewhere; and the great question is, the safest place to put it.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to ask him one or two questions upon the topic he is speaking of just at this moment?

Mr. BOGY. Certainly, and with pleasure.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Does the Senator hold the members of the two Houses, occupying their position as members, would be actuated by any higher motive than the members of the two committees who were sent to New Orleans to look into the troubles in that State and of one of which he was a member? Would they owe a higher duty to the people of the United States than those eminent citizens, a great many of them members of the two Houses, owed to the people of the United States? Would he as a legislator, in other words, owe any higher duty to the people of the United States than he owed to them as a member of that committee?

Mr. BOGY. I will answer the Senator; and I think the question is one of the best arguments on my side. All the committees heretofore sent to Louisiana by Congress, composed of men of both parties, united in reporting that the government in that State and its returning board were a fraud. I speak of congressional committees, and not of the citizens who went there lately as private individuals. One of them, I am afraid, has failed in its duty. I believe the democratic citizens acted above the spirit of party, and in good faith and with all honesty tried to find out who had received the vote of that State, being determined if, after fair investigation, they had satisfied themselves that the vote was for Hayes, to say so. Candor compels me to say that I do not believe the republican citizens were actuated by the same spirit. Yet I am in hopes that such of them as are members of either House of Congress will yet do right, and sink the partisan into the patriot. All I can say is, we shall see.

Mr. BURNSIDE. How does it happen then that these two committees come to such entirely different conclusions in reference to the condition of affairs there?

Mr. BOGY. My friend will observe that these men went there as private individuals and partisans, and not in any official character. That man will on all occasions rise above party, I am sorry to say I am not prepared to advance.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I will ask the Senator one more question. I ask if the Supreme Court of the United States has not in a very marked instance within the last year made a decision which was adverse to what were considered the views and principles of the party which the democratic party claim now had the organization of the Supreme Court?

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, I do not exactly fancy that mode of argument, because——

Mr. BURNSIDE. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BOGY. Because I am not disposed to criticise the action of the Supreme Court. I would say, however, with great respect to that court, as one of the co-ordinate branches of this Government and also for the individual members of it, that I think at one time they gave way to the fell spirit of party, I will not say corruptly, nor do I mean to be understood as intimating in the slightest degree the slightest corruption. Far from it, but I think they gave way to the spirit of party under peculiar circumstances, such circumstances as would perhaps have swayed any other body in the world. In saying this I hope not to be misunderstood.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I will ask the Senator one more question, with his permission. Is he not satisfied that the main body of the people of the United States—I do not mean now the active politicians; yes, I will include even them—that the main body of the people of the United States would sit down by any decision made by the Supreme Court of the United States on this subject, no matter which party the decision favored; and is there any other tribunal in the United States to which the matter could be referred whose decision would give that satisfaction?

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, it is taking me a long way out of the line of my argument, but I will answer.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I only refer to this subject because the gentleman, while discussing other subjects, the mode of counting the votes, &c., alluded to the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont. He referred to the Supreme Court, or otherwise I should not have asked the question which I did.

Mr. BOGY. I will answer my friend.

A comparison of moral characteristics, if I may use that expression, between the Supreme Court and Congress is by no means a pleasant one. But I will say this, that aside from the fact that you would be destroying the Supreme Court by bringing it into the arena of politics, while now it is beyond and above it, a decision made by that court would give less satisfaction, in my opinion, than a decision made by Congress. Take the case pending to-day between the two parties. If the decision should be in favor of Mr. Tilden, improper motives would be ascribed; if in favor of Mr. Hayes, the same would be said. Under these conflicting opinions the court would be essentially destroyed, its moral power taken away. I would say also that no decision of Congress can ever be entirely satisfactory. It has not been so heretofore.

When Mr. John Quincy Adams was elected, having received the vote of thirteen States out of the twenty-five, the defeat of Jackson by the House was made the great battle-cry before the people, that the minority candidate had been elected and not the majority; that Jackson had received ninety-nine electoral votes while Adams had but eighty-four. It was said that the one who had the majority should have been elected by the House. Yet this argument, as every one must see, was not founded on constitutional grounds. Nevertheless it became the battle-cry of the next canvass. The result was at the next election the Adams party was signally defeated.

We are no doubt often carried away by a fell spirit of party. To this we are all to a certain extent subject; but this has its limits. We all feel and we all know that the times are threatening, and that there is danger overhanging the future. We will soon be called to discharge a most serious duty. I have faith that all will yet be well, and that the dangers which appear to be threatening us will all quietly pass away. Yet much will depend on the action of Congress, and it is to the two Houses of Congress that the country looks for relief. I am ready to co-operate with any one to devise the measures which will enable us to meet the crisis. That other members entertain the same sentiments I have no doubt.

Mr. President, the old Greeks invested their Deus optimus maximus, the great Olympian Jove, with all power over the gods and godesses and divinities of heaven as well as over the actions of men and of nations. Yet to this power there was a limit. Jupiter could not control the Fates, and these had power over the life of man and the concatenation of events constituting the life of nations. This was the old Pagan mythology. I hope that under our new dispensation we shall at least be able to control, not the fate of all the ages to come, but the fate of some more years for our country, and that we will have the power and the will so to discharge our duty and perform the work assigned to us as to bridge over the awful abyss now yawning at our feet—an abyss so deep that no human eye can see the bottom, and whose opposite shore is so distant that no mind can conceive it. This passed, we will again enter into a course of prosperity—the enjoyment of free institutions and of national renown—for one hundred years more, equal to the one hundred years past.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, it is my misfortune to have to follow the eloquent Senator from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] with a dry statement of some historical facts which I think it necessary to present at this time in order to "vindicate the truth of history."

The Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] usually very accurate as we all know, in a speech upon the pending question, said on Monday last:

> The first instance that I know of when any question was made was in 1857, when the electors of Wisconsin failed to meet on the day that the act of 1792 required they should; so that, if the act of 1792 were constitutional in that respect, and that requirement was a requirement of substance, a mandate instead of a direction, the vote of the State of Wisconsin had not been given in accordance with the Constitution. But the certificate was received by the then President of the Senate, Mr. Mason, of Virginia, and was opened and was reported by the tellers in the regular way with all the others. On the President announcing that vote, somebody rose and questioned the right of the presiding officer to determine whether that was the constitutional vote of the State of Wisconsin or not, and the presiding officer, it is stated, declined to entertain the question of order or to submit it to the bodies or people, whatever they might be called, who were before him, and retired from the Chair and with the Senate came back to the Senate Chamber.
> Mr. MORTON. And said the only thing in order was to count the votes.
> Mr. EDMUNDS. And he said the only thing in order was to count the vote.

Now, Mr. President, a brief reference to the Congressional Globe of February 11, 1857, discloses these facts:

> The Senate entered the Hall, preceded by its Sergeant-at-Arms, &c.

Mr. Mason, President of the Senate, presiding over the joint convention, said, (I use the term "joint convention" because it seems to be a term that was used during the debates on that occasion, and I use it for convenience:)

> Pursuant to law and in obedience to the concurrent order of the two Houses, the President of the Senate will now proceed to open and count the votes which have been given for a President and Vice-President of the United States, for the term prescribed by the Constitution, to commence on the 4th day of March, 1857. The teller appointed on the part of the Senate and the two tellers appointed on the part of the House will please take the seats assigned them in discharge of their duties.

Whereupon the tellers took their seats.

> The Presiding Officer thereupon proceeded to open and hand to the tellers the votes of the several States for President and Vice-President of the United States, commencing with the State of Maine.
> Pending the count,
> Senator CASS said: I suggest that it is better to read the results of the vote, and not the certificates in full, unless the reading of the certificates be called for.
> The PRESIDING OFFICER. The presiding officer considers that the duty of counting the vote has devolved on the tellers under the concurrent order of the two Houses; and he considers further that the tellers should determine for themselves in what way the votes are verified to them, and read as much as they may think proper to the two Houses assembled.

It will be observed, Mr. President, that the presiding officer, Mr. Mason, on this occasion thought that the tellers had something else than mere clerical duty to perform.

> The tellers discontinued the reading of the certificates in full, and merely announced the votes of each State. It appeared from the certificate of the electiors of the State of Wisconsin that the electoral vote of that State had not been cast on the day prescribed by law.
> Mr. LETCHER, of the House of Representatives, (addressing the President of the Senate.) If I understood the vote which has just been read, it has not been cast on the day prescribed by law for voting for President and Vice-President of the United States. I do not know what would be proper in a case of this sort; but I desire now to call attention to it in order that the point may be brought to the attention of the country. The time may come when it would be a matter of importance to have these votes in regular shape. I desire, so far as I am concerned now, as a Representative of the people, to present my objection to the reception of this vote.
> Mr. JONES, of Tennessee—

And just here, Mr. President, I call special attention of Senators to the few lines that now follow—

> Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I suppose, Mr. President, the proper way would be for the tellers to report the facts to the convention of the two Houses, and let them decide.
> The PRESIDING OFFICER. The presiding officer so considers.

Mark this reply again:

> The presiding officer so considers.

Considers what? That all the facts are to be reported to the convention of the two Houses and have them decide.

It was stated, as I remarked in the beginning, by the Senator from Vermont and by the Senator from Indiana that the presiding officer had said that the only business was to count. On the same page of the Congressional Globe from which I have just read it will be seen that Senator Crittenden, of Kentucky, in the joint convention inquired:

> Do I understand the Chair to decide that Congress in no form has power to decide upon the validity or invalidity of a vote?
> The PRESIDING OFFICER. The presiding officer has made no such decision, he will inform the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. H. Marshall, of Kentucky, in the course of remarks following Senator Crittenden, said:

> The language of the Constitution is that "the President of the Senate, in the presence of the House of Representatives, shall open all the certificates," and then the phraseology changes, and proceeds: "and the votes shall be counted," not by you, but by us.

Thus, Mr. President, at the very outset of the proceedings in joint convention, the intimation that the President of the Senate might assume any power in deciding what were the votes of States, was promptly assailed, and by leading Senators and Representatives of both political parties, as will be seen as I proceed.

A little later in the debate, Senator Crittenden said:

I shall not presume before Congress to occupy a moment's time with argument. I wish merely to say that the sense of duty, an honorable sense of duty I have no doubt, upon which the presiding officer has acted in assuming to declare the number of votes, involves the privilege of determining a presidential election, and saying who shall be President. I protest against any such power.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The presiding officer is utterly unaware that he has assumed the exercise of any such power.

Certainly, Mr. President, no reasonable man can complain of lack of distinctness in the utterances of the Vice-President up to this period in the proceedings of the convention. I will leave you, sir, and the Senate to determine how far these expressions of the President of the Senate agree with the assertions of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] and the Senator from Indiana, that "he said the only thing in order was to count the vote."

You will bear in mind, also, Mr. President, that, according to the statement of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] this is "the first instance when any question was made."

Immediately following the emphatic disclaimer of the presiding officer just quoted, Senator Cass, of Michigan, whose long public service and experience in public affairs are familiar to us all, said:

The only thing which remains for us to do, if there are insuperable difficulties in the way, is to adjourn immediately to our respective halls. Then let the Senate or the House of Representatives bring up the matter for action.

The presiding officer having informed the House that the tellers had not yet completed their certificates, Senator Douglas, of Illinois, whose ability and experience were scarcely second to those of any public man in the country, said:

I rise to state that, in my opinion, the tellers have no right to authenticate that certificate until the two Houses have passed upon it as to its being a true count. I rise to protest against this joint convention being dissolved until the question which has been raised shall have been decided.

I am passing on as rapidly as I may with a partial history of the eventful proceedings of the convention and of the Houses of Congress, for I do not desire to detain the Senate at this late hour.

Some question had arisen as to the presentation of the certificate of the tellers, and Mr. Mason, the presiding officer, said:

The presiding officer would again state that the duty of the tellers has not yet been discharged. The tellers, it would appear, made their report before they had signed the certificate. The vote will be again read to the two Houses, and they can determine what shall be done.

I now quote Mr. Washburne, of Illinois, speaking a little later in the debate:

I demand the reading of all the official papers connected with the Wisconsin case. I think the convention have the right to know what those papers are.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will direct them to be read.

Now, Mr. President, if you will refer to the proceedings in the Senate, which took place immediately after the Senators had returned to the Senate Chamber, you will find the presiding officer, Mr. Mason, recorded as follows:

The Chair will state to the Senate, as the result of the action in the Hall of the House of Representatives in counting the votes, that the duty was devolved upon the presiding officer, there, by the concurrent order of the two Houses.

On page 645, the President of the Senate again stated:

The presiding officer desires to say, as he thought he had distinctly stated while presiding over the two Houses in the Chamber of the House of Representatives, that the conception of the Senator from Georgia is entirely erroneous, in the judgment of the presiding officer. The presiding officer did not undertake to decide whether the vote of the State of Wisconsin was a good vote or a bad vote. The presiding officer upon that matter did no more than recite the fact which was reported to him by the tellers, pursuant to the order concurrent of the two Houses.

The presiding officer did no more than announce that the vote of Wisconsin had been given to John C. Frémont. Whether it was a good vote or a bad vote, he did not undertake to decide. The presiding officer announced further, that James Buchanan had a majority of all the votes given, and that such majority was a majority of the whole electoral vote; and he declared, as his duty required him to do, that James Buchanan was thereby elected President of the United States.

If the result could have been affected by the collateral fact reported by the tellers, that the vote of the State of Wisconsin had been given on a day different from that prescribed by law, the presiding officer would have considered it his duty to have reported, as the state of the vote, that whether a majority of the whole electoral votes had been given to James Buchanan would depend on canvassing the votes, a duty that he did not assume. But inasmuch as it appeared clearly from the state of the vote that whether the vote of the State of Wisconsin was counted or not the result of the election remained unaffected, he announced, as he considered his duty required him to announce, that James Buchanan had a majority of all the votes cast, and that such majority was a majority of the whole number of electoral votes.

Now, sir, mark the presiding officer's concluding sentence:

He disclaims having assumed on himself any authority to determine whether that vote or any other vote was a good or a bad vote.

And finally, as to the action of the then President of the Senate, I read from page 649 of the Congressional Globe, now before me, in these words:

The presiding officer did no more than give the result as stated by the tellers, and then, in the further discharge of the duty devolved upon the presiding officer by the concurrent resolution, he announced the person who was elected, the Constitution providing that "the person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed." The presiding officer in his own judgment believed then, as he believes now, that he declared correctly, as the state of the vote, that James Buchanan had received the greatest number, and that that number was a majority of the whole number of electors, not undertaking to decide and not having decided.

I call the attention of the Senators from Vermont and Indiana to these final, conclusive, and clinching words:

Not undertaking to decide, and not having decided whether the vote of the State of Wisconsin had been given to John C. Frémont or not—a power that the Chair utterly disclaims and never asserted

Mr. President, I will not impair the force of these unequivocal words by any comment of my own.

Mr. MORTON. Will my friend allow me right there? The Chair did not undertake to decide whether the vote of Wisconsin was a good vote or a bad vote, as he said, but when a motion was made that it should not be counted he overruled that motion. As I remember—I have not read the record for four or five years—he decided that the only thing in order was to count the vote, and the vote was counted.

Mr. RANDOLPH. If the Senator from Indiana will read the record, he will find that he is somewhat in error. The vote was counted, and for the reasons assigned in the remarks made by the President of the Senate on that occasion. The tellers had called it, stating, however, when announcing the Fremont vote to be 114, "including the five votes of Wisconsin." All that the President of the Senate declared was that Mr. Buchanan, having received a majority of all the votes cast, irrespective of Wisconsin, and of all the votes, including Wisconsin, if you please, was elected President of the United States.

Mr. President, this is in substance all that there is on record as to the action of the then President of the Senate touching the Wisconsin case. I have gone over it with some care because I felt that it was important at this juncture of affairs that we should know the facts as we proceed. I simply desired, as I stated at the outset, to "vindicate the truth of history." If the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Indiana will take the pains to investigate the record as contained in the Congressional Globe of February, 1857, they will find not only all that I have read, but they will also find that Senators of both political parties and from a large number of the States, declared themselves with great emphasis against the power of the President of the Senate to do aught else than obey the orders of the convention and of the Senate.

Mr. Seward will be found to have said in the course of debate in the Senate immediately after the members of that body had withdrawn from the convention, "a misunderstanding exists in both Houses of Congress, whether the President of the Senate, acting as I hold, as the organ of the Senate, has not passed upon the question, and counted the votes from the State of Wisconsin, and whether that may not be drawn into a precedent hereafter. I am one of that number who think that the President has not counted them."

Mr. Collamer, of Vermont, whose views will be found on page 647, said:

In my estimation, the moment the tellers came to a certificate irregular on its face, stating that the votes were cast on a day different from that prescribed by law, they should have stopped there and announced the fact to the Chair, and the Chair should immediately have stated that condition of things, and the two Houses should have separated to make provision in relation to the manner of settling it. In my opinion, further, the Chair, immediately on being informed of that fact at any stage of the proceedings, should have stated it to the body—

Not decided it himself, sir, but should have stated it to the body—and then the two Houses should have separated and taken proceedings in relation to the matter.

On page 648 of the same volume Mr. Collamer again remarks:

Now I say if the Chair in terms decided the question in relation to Wisconsin, the Chair perhaps did that at least which ought to be inquired into by a committee; but I say the Chair decided nothing as to the Wisconsin vote being lawful or unlawful.

I have deemed it well, Mr. President, to quote the views of one of the ablest of all the predecessors of the Senator from Vermont.

It will be found that Senators Hunter, Butler, Nourse, Toombs, Adams, Reid, Seward, Toucey, Houston, Bell, Crittenden, Weller, Cass, and Douglas, at more or less length and with greater or less emphasis, indorsed the views taken by the presiding officer of the Senate at that time as to his functions. I had purposed, had I obtained the floor at an earlier hour of the day, to have given quotations from the speeches of Senators on that occasion, as well as to have called the attention of the Senate to some notable speeches made by eminent authority in the House of Representatives.

I know I shall have the good will of the Senate better at this late hour if I desist. It is enough that I have called the attention of the Senate to these notable and conclusive proceedings in the Senate in joint convention and in the House pending the discussion on the Wisconsin case. I have accomplished my purpose. I believe that a careful consideration of the whole subject will show to the Senate and the people of the country that the recent assumption of some Senators as to the power of the Vice-President is not founded in law or logic. Out of this and kindred debates I have no doubt we shall find a mode of counting the votes just and lawful, acceptable to all honest men, ending in peace and prosperity to our country. To this great consummation all patriotic men labor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BURNSIDE in the chair.) The question is on the passage of the joint resolution, which requires a two-thirds vote, and the yeas and nays will be taken. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAVIS, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.] If present he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired generally with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHRISTIANCY,] who has been assigned to visit South Carolina as a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and therefore is absent. I have an impression that he and I would vote differently, and therefore I refrain from voting.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Blaine, Burnside, Conkling, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Key, Morrill, West, and Wright—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Chaffee, Clayton, Conover, Dawes, Dennis, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Hamilton, Harvey, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Kernan, Logan, McCreery, Maxey, Morton, Norwood, Patterson, Price, Randolph, Sargent, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Barnum, Boutwell, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Cockrell, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Dorsey, Gordon, Howe, Johnston, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, McDonald, McMillan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Oglesby, Paddock, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sharon, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, Teller, Wadleigh, and Windom—30.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this question the yeas are 14 and the nays are 31. Two-thirds of the Senators present not having voted in the affirmative, the resolution is not passed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I give notice that to-morrow, if I can get the floor, I shall move to take up the bill now on the table on a motion to reconsider or in some other form, providing for a means of counting and determining the electoral vote for President and Vice-President.

Mr. MORTON. I inquire of the Senator what bill he refers to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I refer to the bill reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections and that once passed this body and was reconsidered on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] or he had a motion to reconsider entered; I have forgotten which.

Mr. HAMLIN. Is there any question now pending?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. None.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to inquire if the Oregon resolution has been disposed of?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It went over on objection. The unfinished business took precedence of it at the close of the morning hour.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Oregon resolution, I will suggest to the Senator from Ohio, so far as the practical power of the Senate is concerned, is already covered by a resolution adopted by the Senate, commanding the Committee on Privileges and Elections to inquire into all cases of alleged ineligibility, &c.

Mr. HAMLIN. I renew my motion for an executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After four minutes spent in executive business the doors were re-opened, and (at four o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 13, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE CLERK.

Mr. FORT. I ask unanimous consent to submit for immediate adoption the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Coinage, Weights and Measures be allowed a clerk, to be appointed by Hon. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, chairman of said committee, and paid out of the contingent fund of the House, and that said clerk shall not be counted as one of the number to which the House has been limited.

Mr. GARFIELD. I only want to make an inquiry. If any gentlemen of the Committee on Appropriations are here, I wish to inquire whether it is not against the law to make an appropriation out of the contingent fund of the House for any salary. The law may have been changed since it was my business to be familiar with such questions. I do not wish, however, to make any objection to this resolution.

Mr. FORT. At any rate this matter can be arranged by the committee. I trust the resolution will be adopted now.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and adopted.

Mr. FORT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN T. CHAUNCEY.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund to John T. Chauncey, for his services for the time employed, at the rate of $3.60 per day.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TERRITORY OF OKLAHOMA.

Mr. SOUTHARD. The bill (H. R. No. 3922) to provide for the organization of the Territory of Oklahoma and for the better protection of Indian tribes therein was set as a special order for to-day at two o'clock. In consequence of the absence of some members of the Committee on the Territories, who are interested in this question, I ask that the bill be made a special order for the third Wednesday in January, after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of. I hope there will be no objection to this proposition.

Mr. FORT. I have no objection to the order suggested, but I desire to submit an amendment by way of substitute, and to have it pending for consideration when the bill comes up.

Mr. SOUTHARD. There is no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the special order proposed by the gentleman from Ohio will be made.

Mr. HALE. Let that be in subordination to any business of the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. It will be so understood.

TIMBER IN COLORADO.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent to introduce, for reference and printing, a bill to authorize citizens of the State of Colorado to fell and remove timber on the public domain for building, agricultural, mining, and domestic purposes. In offering this bill for reference I wish to say that it illustrates the grievance under which the inhabitants of this State rest——

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. HALE. I wish simply to say as a matter of privilege involving a membership in this House, for this State has no member at present on this floor, being held out by the action of the House——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. HALE. Colorado is at present not called on Monday morning, either as a State or as a Territory, and can only get in its business through other members.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I call the gentleman to order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] asks unanimous consent to introduce and have referred a bill, the title of which has been stated.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object.

Mr. HALE. Is there objection?

Mr. SPRINGER. I object.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman from Illinois objects?

Mr. SPRINGER. He does, and takes the responsibility.

Mr. HALE. That only further illustrates the hardship under which this State rests.

Mr. SPRINGER. It only illustrates the presumption of the gentleman in his course.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will suspend their remarks; they are out of order.

GOLD AND SILVER COINAGE.

Mr. BLAND. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3635) to utilize the product of gold and silver mines and for other purposes. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BLAND. Under the arrangement which has been made, the friends of this bill will occupy the first half hour and the last half hour of the time allowed for discussion, leaving the intermediate hour to gentlemen on the opposite side.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Missouri to state the arrangement to be that the friends of the bill shall occupy the first and the last half hour of the two hours allowed for debate, and that the intervening hour shall be under the control of the opponents of the bill. The Chair will recognize gentlemen in pursuance of that understanding.

Mr. BLAND. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] for ten minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. No amendment is in order, either to the original bill or to the substitute. An amendment can only be offered now by unanimous consent. The gentleman's proposition, however, may be read for information.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the proposed substitute by inserting after the word "be," in line 7, the words "the unit of value and;" so as to read: "And that said dollar shall be the unit of value and a legal tender for all debts, public and private, except where payment of gold coin is required by law."

The SPEAKER. The amendment is not pending.

Mr. BLAND. I now yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] for ten minutes.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Speaker, having been a member of the Committee on Mines and Mining, and the original bill under consideration having been before that committee for some time, I have given it all the attention and study which it was in my power to do. Not only that, but the question as to how far the provisions of the act of 1873 operated upon the legal-tender qualities of silver has also been under consideration in another committee of which I am a member and chairman, to wit, the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. And it is upon the latter proposition I desire to say a few things on the present occasion. There are a great many branches to this subject, and as a matter of course in the short time allotted to me I cannot be expected to discuss them all.

The question whether or not we should have one quality of legal tender, or in other words, whether or not there should be two legal tenders, one of silver or one of gold, or whether or not the present bill interferes with the rights of contracts, are questions which I shall not consider on the present occasion to any very great extent. I am, however, very well satisfied in my own mind that where you have two kinds which are legal tenders they do not operate to the prejudice of any commercial community. I have but to look to the past, Mr. Speaker, to bear me out in what I say.

I have read with a great deal of interest the argument made by Dr. Linderman, who has charge of this subject in the United States mints, upon the idea that gold alone should be the legal tender or standard of value, because the large transactions which are carried on in this country, as argued by him, must necessarily be done in gold. I admit that proposition to be true; yet at the same time there certainly have been as large transactions carried on prior to the year 1873 as there have been since that time and there was no difficulty on the part of the commercial community, so far as I am apprised, that the legal tender might have been made during that time in the silver coin of the country.

I admit, sir, so far as these large transactions are concerned, they may still be in gold, and yet I would have that old law, which has been upon our statute-books as far back as the year 1792, restored. I would have the legal-tender quality of silver restored to the utmost limit, except as provided for in the act of 1853, to wit, that where the smaller coin, to wit, half dollars, quarter dollars, &c., were deteriorated in value, I would not have them legal tender to any extent beyond five dollars. But so far as the silver dollar is concerned, I would have it restored to its original value as established by the act of 1837, and make it legal tender for all debts, dues, and demands of every kind and description, except where the contract provides otherwise. But I would not have, as in the State of California, (and I see one of the Representatives from that State paying strict attention to what I am saying in regard to this matter,) any contract violated; but wherever a contract has been made payable in gold, it should be discharged in gold. I would not have that disturbed, and hence the proposition as made by the distinguished Representative from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] has been amended to that extent, so that wherever there is a contract in the State of California or Oregon, where gold is the whole and sole circulating medium, or where it may have been so made under the acts of other States, I would not have that contract interfered with.

I may then be asked by gentlemen who are opposed to this, Why will you interfere with other contracts that may have been made, so far as they have been made since the coinage act of 1873, where the trade-dollar is of a larger and greater value than the dollar of 1837? I would not even have that done; but I would undertake to say, and I give it to the House as my opinion as a lawyer, after having investigated this matter fully, that every single contract which had been made prior to the year 1873, I do not care whether it was large or small, could have been discharged, and can now be discharged, in the old silver dollar which was authorized by the coinage act of 1837. I believe the act of 1873 expressly reserves this legal-tender quality to the dollar of 1837. If I am correct in the position I take, and it is simply the legal proposition which I propose to discuss in the short time I am entitled to the floor, then what injury can it do? How can it affect the public credit? I know it would be argued on the other side, as I have heard it argued elsewhere, and as I have heard it partially argued here, that we have no right to interfere with existing contracts. While I would not interfere to the extent of the one hundredth part of a cent with contracts, yet I wish to say that all the national debt ever created was so done when this dollar was a legal tender. I say that to-day, if the old silver dollar can be found, it does come in the discharge of every public debt or private contract made prior to the 12th day of February, 1873.

Then, sir, what contracts, so far as the Government is concerned, have been made since that time? There may have been a few, and I admit that if since that time debts have been contracted, you could only pay in your dollar to the extent of five dollars, or they must be paid in gold. I would say in good faith, in good conscience, those obligations ought to be discharged according to the act of 1873.

But what I desire to say is this, in regard to the contracts that existed on the 12th day of February, 1873, when the last coinage act was passed and when the value of the dollar was increased from 412½ grains to 420, that it is right in morals, that it is right in law, that it is right in principle, too, that every single one of those contracts shall be discharged at the option of the debtor in the old silver dollar that may have existed at that time. And the substitute now as proposed by this committee (and I am in favor of the substitute and the substitute alone) proposes to restore the legal qualities of the old silver dollar so that all these obligations and all other obligations and contracts that existed at that time can be discharged precisely in the same dollar or in a dollar of equal or equivalent value existing at that time.

Now, how can any person that holds these obligations complain? Why, if my honorable friend from the State of Michigan sitting beside me [Mr. BRADLEY] and I had made a contract prior to that time, I had the right to pay him in the silver dollar which was then of the value of 412½ grains. Suppose he held my obligation for a thousand dollars that I could have discharged in silver, provided I had had it in hand at that time, in preference to handing it over to him in gold, it must be a contract that must be complied with in either one of these coins. What injury does it do him if he has stood on his rights from 1873 to the present time; what injury does it do him even if the debt was not dischargeable in the coin existing at that time, if the Congress of the United States now should adopt this bill and make the silver dollar of the same value as that which was in existence at the time I made the contract?

There is no violation of any contract by the passage of this substitute, but it will place creditors and debtors where they were before the passage of the act of 1873. I believe the passage of that act demonetizing silver was not demanded by the people at the time and is now almost universally condemned by them. It was an act in the interest of the bondholders and gold speculators and against the laboring classes. It has built up capital and crushed out labor. Mr. Speaker, as far as I have investigated the question of a single and double currency and the effect upon the stability of the currency, I am led to the opinion that the double is far preferable; the one seems to be a check on the other. The larger transactions will be in the more precious metal, and yet, if it appreciates more rapidly in value than the surrounding circumstances would justify, then the other presents a wholesome check. Our western States and Territories are rich in silver ore. Let us remonetize silver and thereby increase the production of this metal which is required as money in nearly all the civilized nations of the earth. Let us stand by contracts when all our national debt was made, that is, that the same should be paid in coin, in the legal tenders then in existence, viz, gold or silver.

Pass this bill and I believe that the fluctuation which has existed in the great money centers for some time will measurably cease. The passage of this bill is but an act of simple justice to creditor and debtor and to all classes of society.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLAND. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. WILLARD.]

Mr. WILLARD. I could have desired more time than ten minutes to say what I should like to say on this subject. While I shall endeavor to express in the brief time allotted to me the reasons of my support of the substitute which is offered for the bill now before the House, I still could have wished that action upon this question might have been deferred until the report of the commission appointed by the last Congress, because it seems to me that there are questions connected with this whole monetary question, and especially with that of the standard, which are not fully embraced in either of the bills now before us.

As preliminary to the few remarks I may make, allow me to say, Mr. Speaker, that the commission of which I am a member has, I think, made some progress in the investigation of these questions, and will be enabled to lay before the House some time next month a report which will throw some light upon this subject. The members of the commission appointed by Congress met last September in the city of New York, and selected as additional members Hon. Mr. Groesbeck, of Ohio, and Professor Bowen, of Harvard College. After thus completing the organization, the commission proceeded to take testimony from a large number of prominent business men and students of finance in New York and in New England, and also from certain gentlemen in the Western States. It is the intention of the commission to proceed with the work here in this city, and I have no doubt that we shall be able to lay before this House an abundant weight of testimony which, in my opinion, speaking as one member of the commission, will fully warrant the restoration of the old standard of this country, the American silver dollar as it was established in accordance with the report of Alexander Hamilton in 1792 and continued without variation until 1873.

All the investigations which have been made upon this question go to prove at least one fact, that the silver dollar, substantially the same as that which is received by the American people, has a greater supremacy among the varied populations of this globe than any other coin or any other unit by which values are measured. The gold sovereign of Great Britain dominates only among 35,000,000 of people; the gold dollar, or its equivalent, is received by but 80,000,000; while the French franc, which corresponds nearly to the silver dollar, is in use and is the unit of value with 77,000,000 of people; and the silver dollar, in its various equivalents, ma ybe said to be used by more than 550,000,000 of the people of this globe. And as we look further at the facts which have been developed the last year, we find that, notwithstanding the value of silver at one time reached in the market only 47¾ pence per ounce, at no time has the silver dollar or silver coin of any kind lost its purchasing power. The rupee of Bengal during all this time has purchased of the comforts and luxuries of life the same amount that it did before the depression of silver, and, as far as I have been able to make inquiry, wherever the franc predominates the franc still retains the full equivalent of its power to purchase all commodities which are necessary for the supply of human wants. And who can doubt that in our own country during all this time the silver dollar has had actually as much purchasing power over the necessaries and luxuries of life as it had in former times? You can buy with it as much wheat, as much flour, as much of anything which people need either to eat or wear. It will go as far in purchasing nearly all the requirements of man as it would twenty years ago.

Well, now, Mr. Speaker, under this state of things, while the purchasing power of this coin has remained, to what other conclusion can we come than that, whatever divergence there may be between the price of gold and that of silver, it is to be largely attributed to the rise in gold?

Most of the prominent political economists of this country—I will say nearly all political economists of this country who have been heard before the commission, have been united in the testimony that if silver is thrown out of coinage the tendency must be to appreciate the value of gold. Well, now, if gold be thus appreciated it ends in the appreciation of all indebtedness, both public and private. It means the fall of commodities; it means that the farmer must raise more bushels of wheat to pay the debts which he now owes; it means that the manufacturer is to produce more of the various articles and commodities which he manufactures in order to settle his indebtedness than was required before; it means that the laborer, if he be at all in debt, must give more hours of his toil in order to pay that debt. We have to face this fact. If the nations of the world shall unite in throwing silver out of coinage, there must be an appreciation of the entire bonded indebtedness which now rests upon the world. We are now in debt; the world is in debt. This toiling Caucasian race of ours owes nearly all the vast volume of debt which has been piled up, until the entire sum of national and railroad indebtedness now amounts to $35,000,000,000, and if we add 10 per cent. to that debt, if gold appreciates in value to the extent of 10 per cent., it means an increase of the burden now resting upon this industrious, enterprising Caucasian race, by an amount considerably more than the entire national debt of the United States. I will add, Mr. Speaker, that it will be found that almost every political economist throughout the world must stand appalled before results which cannot fail to fill every thoughtful mind with the most serious apprehension.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLAND. I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDERS] five minutes.

Mr. LANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much, sir, that the debate on this very important question is so limited. There are gentlemen here who are opposed to the standard silver dollar. I will be much pleased to hear some of these gentlemen, because I always like to hear those who are opposed to me on any question. I can often learn more from them than I can from gentlemen who agree with me. While I am in favor of remonetizing silver, yet at the same time if I were convinced that the interests of the country would be promoted by keeping it demonetized I would vote against this bill or any other to remonetize it.

As the original bill stands I am not in favor of it. My main objection to it is this: that it provides for the depositing of gold and silver bullion and the issuing of certificates at their coinage value. Taking the certificates at their coin value, redeemable by the Government, either in coin or bullion at the option of the holders, the holders can take the gold or silver bullion at their coin value. According to this bill the holders of certificates can at any time demand coin or bullion. In all business circles option does not belong to one party alone. In this case it belongs to the holders of the certificates, and if the bullion advances they will demand it, and if the bullion declines they will demand coin, and the Government is obliged to give it.

The Government cannot know until the certificate is presented what will be demanded. Therefore it cannot coin the bullion, not knowing but what it will be called upon for bullion. Therefore the business community is not to have the benefit of the coinage of this bullion under this bill.

I am in favor of the substitute. It proposes to repeal the law of 1873 and to restore the double standard as it was from 1792 up to that time. The double standard is designed to regulate the relative values of the two coins. It is said that we practically have but one standard. That is true to some extent, since the ingenuity of man has never been able to adjust the value of the two coins in such a way that they would long remain of the same relative value. The reason of this failure is that they are commodities. The value of any commodity is regulated by the uncontrollable laws of supply and demand. The right of the debtor to pay in the cheapest money is a right that has been conceded to him ever since the formation of the Government and long before. That always brings into use the cheapest money and checks the demand for the dearer. This has been the practical working of a double standard, and the effect has been such that there has never been such change in the coinage value of those metals to make them correspond with their market value. The only change that there has been was to make gold correspond with the market value of silver.

In 1834 the market value of gold and silver varied about 6 per cent., the silver being the lowest. The right of the debtor in those days was recognized. Albert Gallatin, and other distinguished statesmen contended that it would be a great act of injustice to the debtor class to increase the value of silver, since the debt of the country was based upon that (it being the cheaper) to make it correspond with the market value of gold. Their views were acknowledged to be correct, and Congress changed the gold eagle from 270 grains to 258, a reduction of 12 grains. This is the only change that has ever been made between the gold eagle and the standard silver dollar from 1792 until 1873, when this vicious legislation was enacted against the silver dollar. Had it not been for the use of both metals as equal legal tenders, I have no doubt their fluctuation in value would have been much greater. With a single standard nothing can be substituted for the metal used as such standard when a demand is made upon us for that metal. There is nothing to check the advance.

The standard silver dollar was not made by accident. It was made by Mr. Hamilton, after having ascertained the value of the Spanish milled dollar, which was in use in the Colonies prior to the formation of the Government. All debts were based upon that dollar. It was found to contain 371¼ grains of pure silver. On the recommendation of Mr. Hamilton, Congress declared that that should be the standard silver dollar of the United States, as in no other way could justice be done alike to both creditor and debtor.

I want the gentlemen on this floor who advocate the single standard to tell the House what they propose to do. I want them to point out to this House in what way this advance in gold is to be checked. Our policy provides for checking it. I have shown how the double standard will check it. I am also in favor of restoring silver because silver is a product of this country and it would give it increased value to make it a legal tender. Our mines constitute a portion of our national wealth. We have but few industries that produce fifty or sixty millions a year. The silver mines of this country produce wealth to that amount and furnish employment to thousands of our laboring population. Are we to allow this designing legislation of 1873 to further depreciate the value of one of our most valuable products? I would do nothing to depreciate the value of gold. It is also a product of this country, but is not produced to more than one-half the extent that silver is.

I believe in protecting the industries of our own country and maintaining the value of the product of such industries. The same gentlemen on this floor who favor the demonetization of silver, that tends so much to depreciate the value thereof, have been the most clamorous for protection to their own industries. Our mining interests have been very much embarrassed for the last few years because of this legislation. The decline in their bullion falls directly upon the laboring man who digs it out of the ground. I have a further reason for favoring the remonetization of silver. As was said by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. DURHAM,] we have a right to pay all our bonded indebtedness in silver as well as in gold, and I have never been able to understand why it was that a Congress professing to represent the interests of the people should destroy the value of more than one-half of that which they have to pay with. I want gentlemen who favor this policy to explain why they do so.

The only reason that can be assigned for the legislation of 1873, as it is plainly seen, is that an abundance of silver would tend to cheapen it. This is a risk that all men take who agree to receive payment in a commodity likely to change its value like gold or silver. The only way that the bondholder could evade receiving it in payment was to have it demonetized, so that there would be only a gold coin in existence, since their debt was payable in coin and silver was as much coin as gold. Is it not strange that a Congress of the United States could be induced to destroy the value of this great mining interest, furnishing labor to so many thousands of men and producing wealth to the amount of fifty or sixty millions of dollars; that the country could be induced to adopt legislation that benefits a single class alone, small in number, and a non-producing class at that?

It is said by gentlemen on this floor that are in favor of contraction of either hard or soft money that our productive industries cannot prosper unless the cost of producing commodities for exportation corresponds with the cost of like articles produced in other countries, and which are likely to come in competition. In order to reduce their cost they propose to reduce the quantity of money in the country, because the quantity of money in any country or its representatives, used in performing exchanges of commodities, regulates the value of all commodities. As the quantity of money is reduced the value of commodities is reduced, and consequently the price of labor. If the quantity of money is reduced here to correspond with the quantity of money in monarchical countries, the price of commodities here would be the same as there, and the price of labor that produces them must also be the same.

You gentlemen have now pursued this policy until you have reduced many of our laboring-men to beggary and want. More than two thousand families in the city where I live, it is said, are depending upon the charities of the city for sustenance. The New York Herald, a few days ago, informed us that nearly fifty thousand mechanics and laborers are out of employment in that city, and a large portion of that number bordering on starvation. You pursue this policy of contraction as you have done and propose to continue to do, to reduce the cost of commodities in order to compete with foreign nations, and you will bring our laboring-men down to the condition of the laboring-men of Great Britain and other countries. It is this that I have been fighting ever since I have been upon this floor. It is that we may have more money and cheaper money that I am now contending for the remonetization of silver. I prefer cheap money and well-paid labor to dear money and poorly paid labor.

No government coin is countenanced by any other nation. Our coin is a commodity whenever it leaves our shores. The coins of other nations are commodities when they come here, and there is nothing in the argument so often adduced to which I have referred. Whenever a commodity of this country passes to another it is subject to the laws of trade there. When their commodities come here they are subject to the laws which govern trade here. Our coin or currency have nothing whatever to do with their value in foreign countries. Their value is regulated by the supply and demand in their own country, and the amount of money in circulation to perform the exchanges of the nation.

A favorite remark of contractionists and demonetizers of silver is "let us have honest money." I have come here to make honest money. The Constitution of the United States has conferred power upon Congress to coin money and to regulate its value as well as the value of foreign coins. How do we regulate the value of money? That is just what we are now trying to do—regulate the value of silver money. We are trying to make it a legal tender for all debts, public and private; that is just the way that Congress regulates the value of money. Whenever they make money, whether coin or paper, only a partial legal tender it is dishonest legislation and dishonest money is the result. We have depreciated money. I have never cast a vote here and never expect to cast one to make anything money for one purpose that is not money for all. If that policy prevails we will never have money that can be called dishonest, because it will always be at par.

Money is valuable just as it is useful, and whenever a man gets into a field with his money, whether metallic or paper, that he cannot use, he must submit to a shave to get something that he can use. If gold had been legislated against as silver has been, and silver been favored with legislation as gold has been, gold would be dishonest money because it would be depreciated, as Treasury notes and silver now are. No man cares what his money is made of. The question is what can he do with it.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, to see the day, and that very soon, when there will be no depreciated money; if this Congress will exercise its power under the Constitution to make money and shall make all money a full legal tender. Let this bill pass, the gold-broker will be panic-stricken, as silver will perform the same exchanges that gold does. Let this Government honor its own paper and receive its own notes in payment of debts due to it, the gold-brokers will leave their gold board like rats deserting a sinking ship. That is just what I want to see. I want to see legislation in favor of the people and not in favor of gold-gamblers and bondholders, and no speculation in money except for legitimate business purposes. Money is not something to invest in, but is a tool of exchanges, and its offices are to perform exchanges.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLAND. I now yield for ten minutes to the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. PHILLIPS.]

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I regret very profoundly that the time should be so limited within which to discuss a measure of so much moment as the one before the House, one requiring facts and information on which the safe and judicious action of this House so much depends. The experience of the civilized world teaches us that we should approach this question with great caution and diffidence. Germany tried to demonetize its silver coin and brought herself to the verge of ruin, and has now been compelled to suspend her action. When we, a nation producing from $75,000,000 to $90,000,000 in silver each year, as ours has been estimated to do, estimating amounts that cannot be officially computed, proposes to strip itself of this peculiar means of paying its debts which we naturally possess, when the balance of other trade is against us, and to reduce the value of one of our products, we naturally ask why? As the gentleman just said, if you go to the gold standard you will raise the standard of values higher than it ever reached before, and you will increase your debt from 30 to 40 per cent. and diminish the power of this country to pay its debts; and I give the estimate not as to the relation of values of gold to silver, but as to the effect of reducing to a single or gold standard, which would still further enhance the standard. I say in all candor, and I say in no agrarian spirit, that the debt which the people owe was contracted when the silver dollar was one of the coin standards. Indeed, the silver dollar is peculiarly the American standard. It has been the true unit of the American standards of value and has been so since 1792, when the plan for its issue came from one of our most illustrious statesmen, General Hamilton.

Why should it now be disturbed? Because gold is at present more valuable. The creditors of the Government "want some more."

I warn them that while every patriotic American will adhere to the strict terms of the contract, it is not for them to step forward and violate that contract. I say to pay in coin is in strict fulfillment of the contract, save when it is expressly stipulated that it shall be paid in gold. When they demand a higher standard, which will impose a heavier burden upon labor and the producing industry of the country, they come before the country with an unjust demand, as violators of the contract.

I think it is high time that we took the proper steps to secure the coinage of the old American silver dollar, the constitutional coin of the country. I will say, as I have before said, that we have the means of producing the material in our country, $75,000,000 a year in silver coin. Already, with the issue of fractional coins, we have raised the price of silver nearly to the value of greenbacks; it was 7½ per cent. below when the steps to issue the subsidiary coin were taken. Coin the American silver dollar and make it receivable for all contracts, and you will force Germany, the leading nation of Europe in that respect, to remonetize silver, and it will place silver along-side of gold in value as it was before. We have this silver, and as American statesmen it is our duty to adopt this measure. We cannot afford to stand here as the representatives of any one interest, or if there be but one interest let it be the interest of the many rather than the few. Gold and silver both constantly fluctuate in value. Following the discovery of America, gold fell in relation to silver 50 per cent. in twenty-five years. Then, when the great silver mines of Potosi were discovered, the value was again disturbed. Gold rose and silver fell. At that time, too, some nations tried to demonetize silver. Again, on the discovery of gold in California, at Australia gold went down in relation to silver. You will observe that we have always measured one of these by the other. Both might have increased in amount so as to have fallen in value so far as the value of the other products of the earth were concerned. Both of the products, gold and silver, intrinsically rise and fall. They may be said to regulate, or indicate, the standard of increased or diminished production in either. The stamp and the credit and authority of the United States give them their fixed value, make them a standard for debts and other things. It does much more. The demand for them as money is nearly all the demand there is for either, since demand for plate and jewelry is very small.

By coining the American silver dollar we put our credit on a sounder basis. By coining the American silver dollar and giving its old powers, all the paper we issue, interest-bearing and non-interest-bearing, has a better coin basis. By coining our old dollar we make ourselves a power still greater in the money world, and we are enabled to pay our debts without burdening the people more severely. Surely no other course can commend itself to the American statesmen.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLAND. I believe that now the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] is entitled to control the discussion for one hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] as entitled to the floor for one hour.

Mr. KASSON. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] for five minutes.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I have not time to make any elaborate argument nor shall I attempt it. I propose, in the few minutes allowed me, to appeal to the common sense and the conscience of this House to reject a bill of such injurious and monstrous propositions.

At the close of the last session of Congress this question was fairly and deliberately referred to a joint committee of the two Houses, which committee has been in session most of the time since. For us now to take this business out of their hands and to pass this bill seems to me, to say the least of it, to be indecent. Is it not enough for this House to know that this bill is of vital and vast importance in its relation to the commerce and credit of the country, the credit of the nation as well as of individuals? Is it not enough for us to know that the great body of men connected with our financial interests, especially the custodians of the savings of the people, those who represent the savings-banks in which are deposited hundreds of millions of the savings of the people—is it not enough to lead us to hesitate, when we know that these men regard this bill with alarm, as a sweeping menace of confusion and disaster?

Why in the name of reason should we shut our eyes to the fact that the value of silver in the commerce of the world changes from day to day, as does the value of wheat and cotton and wool? When this bill or the substance of it was first brought forward here some four or five months ago, the price of silver in London was 47*d.* sterling per ounce. A month or two ago it was 52 or 53*d.* sterling per ounce, and day before yesterday it was quoted at 57*d.* per ounce.

Why should we shut our eyes to the fact that this proposition, which is brought forward here and pressed with so much persistency, is a proposition to make a fourth standard of currency? We have now a gold standard, a greenback standard, and a subsidiary-coin standard. Now it is proposed, that instead of delaying this question until the committee has reported, to make a fourth standard, that of the silver dollar, that shall cover all the rest, that so far as possible shall be a universal legal standard, receivable for customs in all our custom-houses, receivable in payment of the interest upon most of our national debt, which would be practicably bad faith and a step in the direction of repudiation. Moreover, the commerce and credit of the country have been in fierce combat with a vicious and depreciated currency for more than a dozen years.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KASSON. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] for five minutes.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the remonetization of silver. I advocated such measure during the last session of Congress, and fully discussed the proposition in the late canvass, and am satisfied that nine-tenths of the people indorse it. I cannot, however, in the five minutes allotted me discuss the bill and proposed substitute. I suppose the committee which reported the bill is in favor of the substitute offered by the gentleman from Missiouri, [Mr. BLAND,] commonly known as the Kelley bill. I am sorry that the previous question is operating so as to cut off amendments, for I fear the substitute as well as the original bill is not perfect. I call the attention of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] to lines 7, 8, and 9 of the substitute, as follows: "And that said dollar shall be a legal tender for all debts public and private, except where payment of gold coin is required by law," and ask him as well as other gentlemen of the committee the meaning of the language.

Mr. BLAND. I will tell the gentleman there is a great deal of our railroad debt which is payable in gold coin. There are many contracts and debts which the law specifically requires to be paid in gold coin. We do not want to interfere with them.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Nor would I interfere with contracts in any manner, but I do not understand that the law makes any debt specifically payable in gold coin. It is true that until we remonetize silver I suppose all obligations of the Government are payable in gold coin eventually, but the very object of the bill is to utilize the silver dollar by making it a legal tender for all these debts, as we have the right to do under the original contract. If that is the effect of the substitute, all right; but I think it would be better if the same was more explicit.

Now, Mr. Speaker, one word as to the policy of the legislation. There is a large amount of public indebtedness, as well as private, when made we agreed to discharge by the payment of dollars, and the law said those dollars were either gold or silver of a certain weight and fineness, and we have the right to discharge the same according to the terms of the contract in whichever dollar is of the least value. In the exercise of that right we paid gold dollars up to 1873, for the reason that gold dollars were less valuable than silver dollars, and for no other reason, and now we should have the power to use the silver dollar because it is the least valuable, and would certainly use the gold dollar hereafter in the event it should become less valuable than silver, and all this because our contract gives us the option. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] who opposes this bill so strenuously is one of the merchant princes of New York. I have no doubt he has always kept his contracts; at the same time I have no doubt he has always paid in the cheapest material he could under his contract, otherwise he would not be a merchant prince. Correct financial principles for one man are correct financial principles for forty millions of people; the only difference is in the magnitude of the transaction.

Mr. KASSON. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I do not think I shall use the whole of the ten minutes granted me, but only enough to state the reasons which will guide my vote on this bill.

I suppose that the officer of the United States Army who had charge of the excavations at Hell Gate, an hour before the explosion, could have given you the lay of the ground on every square foot of Hell Gate ledge and the depth of the water at all stages of the tide, because, by years of patient study, he had learned all about it; but if he had pretended to tell any one, just after the explosion occurred, how the ledge lay, how deep the water was, and what the situation of the channel was in regard to navigation, he would have proved himself a charlatan and a cheat. After those tons of dynamite had exploded under the ledge, there was a new set of conditions; and like a sensible officer he would have said to all comers, "I must put down my sounding apparatus; I must make a careful exploration of this ledge before I can tell you anything accurately or definitely of the situation." In the course of a few weeks he was able to do that, and do it intelligently and thoroughly.

I have stated this as an illustration of my view of the present state of the silver question. For several centuries the relation between silver and gold has been very accurately understood, and has continued without great and violent fluctuations. These two metals have been used by the governments of the world, in some definitely ascertained proportions, as the basis for standard coin; and men have known with tolerable accuracy something about their then relative value. But within the last few years, and notably within the last few months, there has been an explosion under the silver question as it stands related to gold—an explosion as much greater than the explosion under Hell Gate ledge as the continents of Europe, Asia and America are greater than Hell Gate itself. Now, while the fragments of this mighty explosion are falling in confusion all over the world, while the upheaval is still going on, and while we are still involved in the uncertainty which it has caused everywhere; when we have sent out our explorers by the wise order of both Houses of Congress to make soundings and report what they find; even while we are waiting for their coming, (and they tell us we may expect them soon,) it is proposed, in the hot haste of a two hours' debate, under the tyranny of the previous question—the two hours being parceled out into fragments of five or ten minutes apiece—it is proposed in this Chamber that we settle this world-wide question and determine it to-day.

If I had no other reason to urge against this bill, this to my mind would be overwhelming and unanswerable. Who in this brief space of two hours can go into the philosophy of the great revolution that has occurred? Who can state its causes calmly and dispassionately? Who can point out the probable future course of silver in the markets of the world? We know that a year or two ago it was bought and sold at 60¼ pence per ounce; that on the 13th of July last it had by extraordinary fluctuations tumbled down almost to 46 pence per ounce; and that now again, faster than the thermometer indicates the changes of temperature, it is up again we are told to 57. Yet on this rising and falling tide, in the midst of fluctuations almost equal to the political passions of a presidential campaign, we are asked to settle for ages this question, when the intelligence that we require is near at hand, but not yet received; we must settle it before we hear. It is said that Rhadamanthus and his brother-judges in the lower world, when the accused was brought before them, first castigated him, then made him confess that he was properly punished, and then heard his case.

Now, perhaps that is a mode of procedure fit for the court below, but it is not a method altogether fit for the House of Representatives.

What I ask for, Mr. Speaker, is information and time for deliberation before we proceed to settle this great question. There is no emergency pressing us to a decision to-day.

I am free to say, if I am forced to choice of evils, that I like the substitute better than the original bill. I have no objection to voting for the substitute, but I shall vote against the bill, whether the substitute be adopted or not, as the case now stands.

Let me call the attention of gentlemen to another fact: Can they say this country is going to get any good out of this bill? Pass it and what can be done? Every man who owns silver bullion in America or who can buy it from abroad can take it by the car-load to the mint of the United States and have it coined under our laws as they stand to-day without cost to himself, and can take away in silver coin all the difference between the value of his bullion and the nominal value of his coin. The owner of the bullion will make the difference and the Government makes nothing. Why should we give away all the possibly great difference which in July last would have been 30 per cent. to the accidental owner of bullion or the one who chooses to speculate in it? Why should we offer so great a premium to domestic and foreign speculators in metals, and forbid our national Treasury to have any share in it? And where will gentlemen find any good to the people by this policy?

There is no time in this brief debate to discuss the philosophy of a single or double standard. I am willing that in some way, properly restricted, we shall enlarge the scope of our silver coinage. I hope the commission may show us how this can safely be done. But I am unwilling to undertake so grave a work without full information and deliberation.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced the passage of joint resolution (S. R. No. 29) to extend the time for the making of a report by the Army commission created by the act of July 24, 1876; in which concurrence was requested.

It further announced disagreement to amendments of the House to the bill (S. No. 155) to amend sections 533, 556, 571, and 572 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to courts in Arkansas and other States.

GOLD AND SILVER COINAGE.

Mr. GARFIELD. Has my time expired?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has two minutes remaining.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to say in the remaining moments left to me that it is impossible within the brief space we have, even to go carefully through the history of the legislation which has brought us where we are. That legislation has been denounced as a "legislative trick," as a delusion, as something intended to cheat the American people. I will not even on this occasion go so far as the gentleman who advocated the bill, but let me read from the Congressional Globe of January 9, 1872, the reason given by the distinguished gentleman who introduced, or at least had much to do with the original bill. I read from the language of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] who now sits near me.

I wish to ask the gentleman who has just spoken [Mr. Potter] if he knows of any government in the world which makes its subsidiary coinage of full value? The silver coin of England is 10 per cent. below the value of gold coin. And acting under the advice of the experts of this country, and of England and France, Japan has made her silver coinage within the last year 12 per cent. below the value of gold coin, and for this reason: it is impossible to retain the double standard. The values of gold and silver continually fluctuate. You cannot determine this year what will be the relative values of gold and silver next year. They were 15 to 1 a short time ago; they are 16 to 1 now.

Hence, all experience has shown that you must have one standard coin which shall be a legal tender for all others, and then you may promote your domestic convenience by having a subsidiary coinage of silver which shall circulate in all parts of your country as legal tender for a limited amount, and be redeemable at its face value by the government.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. KASSON. I will yield now fifteen minutes of my time to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT.]

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I will yield a portion of my time to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Thanking the gentleman from New York for his courtesy, I will conclude the reading of the extract which I have already begun:

But, sir, I again call the attention of the House to the fact that the gentlemen who oppose this bill insist upon maintaining a silver dollar worth three and a half cents more than the gold dollar, and worth seven and a half cents more than two half dollars, and that so long as those proportions remain you cannot keep silver coin in the country.

I have read the whole of that extract, Mr. Speaker, in order to do full justice to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] who reported the bill. Now, I am sure he was not guilty of a legislative trick. I am sure he gave the House full notice of what they were doing and the reason why he asked them to do it. And he gave as a reason that at that moment silver was worth more than gold and you could not keep two standards from fluctuation in reference to each other. Just now it happens that silver is a little below the value of gold, and the gentleman will see and the House will see we must have a basis for our judgment broader than the uncertain chances of an uncertain market. I have not quoted the passage to affirm that I wholly disbelieve in the double standard, but to show the great difficulty of realizing it.

I wish to make another remark. When the report of that commission is made I hope it will instruct us as to the international relations of this question. One nation alone cannot put silver up or put it down and control all the markets of the world. If seven or eight of the leading nations of the world should form a monetary treaty on the subject, and should agree that silver be adopted, to be issued within certain limits in each, I have no doubt the silver coin could be kept in equipoise with gold. But let one-half of the leading nations of the globe drop the silver coinage and let only one like our own insist upon it, and then we will see a flood of silver coin pouring into the hands of our brokers, who would bring it to the Treasury, and fill their own pockets with the difference between silver bullion and silver coin.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] has twelve minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Subscribing to all the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has said, and said so much better than I could possibly hope to do it, I was very glad to yield a portion of my time to him, and I will supplement what he said in regard to the position of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] whose remarks I myself was about to quote when I took the floor, by saying that in the same speech, in regard to the care with which the bill demonetizing the silver dollar was considered and passed, the gentleman from Pennsylvania used the following language:

> We proceeded with great deliberation to go over the bill, not only section by section, but line by line, and word by word. The bill has not received the same elaborate consideration from the Committee on Coinage in this House, but the attention of each member was brought to it at an early day of the session. Each member procured a copy of the bill and there has been a thorough examination of the bill again.

And I venture to refer those members of the House who wish to follow up the history of this legislation to the remarks which I caused to be printed in, I think, the last number of the RECORD of the last session, in which I carefully considered the whole question of the bill submitted by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BLAND.] I do not propose now to go over that ground. There is no time for it. But I do propose to say to this House that there are no questions which ever come before deliberative bodies of more consequence and of more delicacy and difficulty than those that relate to finances and the monetary concerns of the country. If we are sick and wise we send for a doctor; if we are in trouble and have litigation we consult a good lawyer; and if we fail to send for the doctor or if we fail to send for the lawyer the suffering falls only upon the individual who is so negligent of his own welfare. But when there is a great question of finance, affecting every operation of trade, every man in the community, from the highest in the country to the lowest in the land, unsettling values, making a new standard of values, increasing the pressure of debt or diminishing the obligation to pay, then in haste, before a body who will not themselves pretend that they understand these financial questions, we are asked here to pass judgment upon a proposition which goes to the foundations of society and affects every transaction and every man, not only here but throughout the civilized globe. I plead for time, I plead for knowledge, I plead for information; and I ask this House, the Representatives of the American people, to listen to the voice which, we are told, is to come to us from the commission which we appointed at the close of the last session. We are told to-day by a member of that commission that by the middle of next month they will be able to throw a flood of light upon this question, upon which a commission has been sitting in England; a question which has given rise to a conference among the nations comprised in the Latin Union, causing them to suspend their coinage until the future of silver is more fully developed; a question which has disturbed to the very foundations the trade of China and of India and called forth minutes in council and elaborate papers from all quarters. We are told that all this is to be brought before this House from a competent commission, assisted, I am glad to say, by experts of the highest character. And yet this bill is pressed upon us at this moment as if some great interest were suffering that requires action on this day. I know of no interest that is suffering unless it be that silver stocks are not selling at as high a price now as they did some six months ago. I know of no interest in this country that cannot wait long enough to get the facts and get the truth. But I do know if we make any mistake upon a question of this gravity and moment that then every interest in this country will suffer; that the rich man will find his property confiscated, and that the poor man will be no better off for that confiscation, but will suffer in the general confusion resulting from the unsettling of values, for the simple reason that when you undertake to violate or vitiate or interfere in anywise with the sanctity of contracts capital leaves the country, values fall, and the debtors who might have paid their debts with a margin between the debt and the value of the property find that that value disappears and that there is no margin with which they can meet their obligations, and the property is transferred from the debtor to the creditor. While the debtor is ruined the creditor is no better off, because the property which he has been compelled to take in payment of his debt will no longer bring the amount for which it was pledged.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the position of things to-day in the city of New York and, I have no doubt, throughout the country; mortgages are being foreclosed and property transferred in vast amounts from the poor debtor to the rich creditor, and yet the rich creditor knows not where to raise the money to pay the taxes which he is thus called upon unexpectedly to pay. But, sir, in dealing with this question, which emphatically involves the question of a double standard, what is needed to bring us to a proper solution of it? I do not say that silver may not be remonetized with advantage, but I say that if it be remonetized it must be at its true value. What is its true value? It has ranged for the last six months between 46¾ and 60¼ pence per ounce, and at this instant a telegram has been received saying that it has gone up to 58¼ in London. And yet in face of these violent fluctuations we are going to legislate a value into the silver coin which it does not derive from the law of supply and demand. You may by adding to the demand or by reducing the supply increase the price, but the matter must finally be decided by a law higher than the action of legislators, the eternal laws of truth, which have determined that values must be the result of demand and supply. Now, on the question of demand, how much additional demand do these gentlemen suppose they can put into silver by making it a legal tender for the payment of debts? If you make it a legal tender there will not be any diminution in the supply of silver; it will merely be a transfer of silver from those countries where it is not now wanted to where a factitious demand has been created for it; it will merely be a transfer from one place to another. That is all that the action of the House can accomplish. This country will thus become the market for the silver which all the rest of the world desires to get rid of, and the loss which belongs to all will be inflicted upon this country alone. By adopting the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] that is, for an international conference, taking the whole subject into consideration, it will be possible to give to silver general stability of value and restore it to its true place in the commerce of the world without inflicting an unnecessary and a grievous loss upon the people of the United States, whose interests and welfare we are bound to protect and preserve against the natural desire of other commercial nations to saddle upon us the loss arising from the general depreciation in the value of silver.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, my respect for the judgment of the members of the House, as well as the necessities of the time for debate, require me to confine my remarks chiefly to a statement of facts, both of legislation and of statistics, bearing upon this question. Upon those facts, and my propositions briefly stated, I am compelled to leave the question to the judgment of a majority of the House.

I am glad, however, of an opportunity to state reasons for the persistent opposition made to the original bill, as presented to the House at its last session. Now we have the opportunity to choose between that bill and a substitute, which was only offered yesterday and is far less objectionable. It was then a proposition to create a new paper money, called coin-notes, which were to be issued alike for gold and silver, and were a new legal-tender paper. The depositor of bullion was to have the right to receive the coin-note, and then, in exchange for that, to receive the stamped bullion or the coin; and in case of his receiving the coin, it was then to go into the circulation of the country by his disbursement, he gaining all the profit, which now by existing law goes into the Treasury for the public benefit. This involved so serious a change in the laws regulating the mintage of this country that I did not believe it possible that the House would, upon consideration, sustain the bill. The present law directs the Government to buy the silver at market rates, and the artificial value given to the coin accrues to the Treasury, not to the bullionist. The people are thus saved from an equal amount of taxation to supply the Treasury; and it has resulted that during the last fiscal year there has been paid into the Treasury of the United States a profit on the minor silver coinage alone of about $2,000,000 which came from that provision of law through the depreciation of silver, and which the proposed law would have nullified. The proposition is in the interest of the bullionists themselves, is against the public interest, and the House could not be willing to pass the bill in the form in which it was then presented and as it is still pending.

Now another point. We have now two legal tenders: gold and paper. The bill originally proposed to make three additional legal tenders: the gold and silver coin notes representing the bullion deposited for coinage, and then the silver coinage from the bars or bullion so deposited, and in which the silver coin notes were to be redeemed. This would have furnished to the people five different legal tenders, making inextricable confusion in all the business of the country.

It will thus be seen that the proposition submitted by this committee to the House is one which proposes to make a new legal standard of the most fluctuating, and at that time the most depreciated, of all the several legal standards submitted to the country. Beginning in January, 1876, silver represented, in the standard value of gold, a trifle over ninety-five cents upon the dollar. During the first seven months of this year, with various intermediate fluctuations that are shown to the eye of any gentleman looking at this chart, the value of silver descended from ninety-five cents to a fraction over seventy-nine cents on the dollar on the 13th of July.

It was therefore proposed at the end of the last session to introduce a new legal standard which had fluctuated sixteen cents on the dollar during the first seven months of the present year; and it was proposed to put that entire profit upon the legal-tender value of the silver coin, above the actual value of the bullion, into the pocket of the producer of the bullion, instead of permitting it to go into the Treasury of the United States, where it then went by existing legislation.

Mr. BUCKNER. Does not the gentleman assume in his argument that gold is an unvarying standard of value?

Mr. KASSON. I submit that there are some points that ought to be considered as beyond dispute. Among those points is the statement made by all responsible publicists of the world, that gold has fluctuated less than any other standard of value among the nations of the earth. If gentlemen will consult the work of Professor Jevons, covering a period of nearly one hundred years, and giving the prices during that time of thirty or forty of the most essential raw commodities, they will get information on that point that I cannot now give them. I refer also to Horace White's brief essay on the silver question, (1876.)

Now, under these circumstances, it would have deranged the business interests of the community inextricably if that proposition had become a law of Congress. For example, there are about $1,500,000,000 of deposits in the savings-banks and the other monetary institutions of the country, belonging to individuals. Those individuals have the right to call for those deposits according to the terms of the contract. Those deposits were made mainly in paper. During the time I have mentioned that value of our paper money fluctuated only between 87¼ and 89¾ cents on the dollar in gold, or 2½ per cent. That has been the amount of fluctuation of our paper legal tender, against 16 cents on the dollar of fluctuation of silver during the same period.

Had this proposition become a law, then all the moneyed corporations of the country, representing $1,500,000,000 of deposits by merchants, traders, laborers, widows, and orphans, would have had the right to have repaid all those deposits in silver worth 13½ cents on the dollar less than the paper money which was deposited, if they could have procured the silver.

Let me call attention to another fact, to the claim that this will give us the privilege of paying our debts in silver instead of gold or paper, as the case may be, for that is the great argument in favor of this bill. Have gentlemen considered where the blow would fall? Every possible injury to the permanence of the money standard falls not upon the wealthy man, who can guard himself against loss, or upon the speculator, who keeps himself in accord with every change, but it falls upon the laborer and upon the producer of the country. Take the laboring man who is paid his wages at the end of the day, the week, or the month; he accumulates no surplus; your capitalist will pay him in the poorest money and not in the best that you give to the country. And when the laborer comes to pay that poor money for the supplies the laborer must purchase, he will find that he is charged for those supplies just in proportion to the poverty of the money he presents. If, as in the case of our paper money at one time, it is worth only forty cents on the dollar, then the laborer will be required to pay two and one-half times as much in the poor money for the articles he purchases as he would be required to pay in good money.

On every occasion when this question has come up, I have urged gentlemen to remember that it does not concern the capitalists of the country half as much as it does the laborer and producer of the country. The best money the country can furnish should be given to that class, because every shave of every dollar falls upon the man who has no accumulation, upon the man who does not speculate, and who has no ability to protect himself.

Take the payment of our debts held abroad, and consider that subject for a few moments. According to my estimate we have paid not less than $600,000,000 in a way that I am sorry to say we have been obliged to pay it; that is, by the processes of the bankruptcy courts of the country. During the last five years our railroad corporations have gone into insolvency thick and fast. Their bonds held abroad have realized but a small percentage, and then the debts have been canceled. The result is, that in addition to the bonds taken up in this country, our debts owned abroad are less to-day by hundreds of millions of dollars than they were five years ago.

Then, again, look at the balance of trade. Gentlemen say that if we could pay our debts abroad with cheap money we would be doing a great thing for this country. But as a nation we are not paying debts abroad this year. During the last year we have had, irrespective of bullion and money exchanged, a favorable balance of trade of $79,000,000, which foreign countries are paying to the United States in gold or its equivalent.

And now what do you propose to do? When we have become a creditor nation—when exchange is 2½ cents below par to-day in favor of the United States—par being about $4.86½ and the price being $4.84—when we are receiving from abroad every quarter millions on millions in discharge of debts owing to us, gentlemen propose to create a new and cheaper money in which Europe can pay her debts to the United States whenever the balance of trade is in our favor, and the payments may be made in the United States.

Are our foreign creditors going to send us gold unless they are obliged to do so in payment of this balance of trade? Are you by your legislation going to permit them to pay that balance in silver which yesterday represented on the dollar of 1837 97.40 cents, or will you get one hundred cents for every dollar that Europe owes to the United States?

Why, sir, the proposition is in the interest of foreign debtors, and strikes me as a direct injury to the merchants and producers of America, to be avoided only by express contracts. Our European debtors now remit gold for the wheat and the corn of my section of the country. By this bill you propose at this time and in the present condition of trade, with silver at its present value, to enable them to make their remittances in money worth two and six-tenths cents on every dollar less than the gold which they are paying to-day, no stipulation being made to the contrary, and when foreign silver shall be unloaded upon us the depreciation will be greater.

I commend these facts to the most serious consideration of my colleagues on this floor. I am glad that is a business proposition to which attention is called, that it concerns the material interests of the country, and that men are bound in conscience to vote for the best interests of their country. Do gentlemen say, as I believe my friend from Kansas [Mr. PHILLIPS] did, that we are producing $77,000,000 of silver annually? It is an entire mistake resulting from a careless examination of the tables. The amount stated is the combined product of gold and silver. Over $20,000,000 of it is in gold. You cannot attack the gold standard in favor of silver or the silver standard in favor of gold without striking at one or another of the great producing interests of this country.

Again, Mr. Speaker, at the rate at which the work is now going on in the mints, they will turn out this year $54,000,000 in gold coin. And need I say also—certainly not to you, Mr. Speaker, who originated the bill—that they are already at work night and day in supplying the country with silver coin? Since the passage of the resumption act of 1875 we have issued over $25,000,000 of silver money for the uses of the people. That is to go on under existing laws until it amounts to $50,000,000 of silver. I thought at the last session, and am still of the opinion, that we can go on and furnish $25,000,000 more of the present silver coinage before the time will arrive at which we shall have supplied the wants of our people for minor coinage.

The situation then is this. Our mints are fully occupied with the production of gold and silver coin. They are taxed to their utmost capacity. The San Francisco mint is now $800,000 behind the demand of the people for the trade-dollar for foreign export, being unable to make the supply equal to the demand. Now under these circumstances, it is proposed to make a new coin the value of which, according to the original bill, shall be 412.8 grains (a value which the silver dollar has never had in the history of this country) or according to the substitute 412½ grains, the value under the act of 1837. Under your new legislation you propose to put this coin into the circulation of the country and make it a legal tender for all amounts.

Let me say to the House (for I desire as far as possible to give facts rather than arguments) that yesterday the legal-tender paper dollar was worth 93.35 cents. Two half dollars of the United States, as now coined, were worth 91.1 cents; your silver dollar of 1837 (412½ grains) was worth 97.4 cents. It is now proposed to make this additional legal tender, which yesterday was worth 97.4 cents and to-day is between 98 and 99 cents. The fluctuations for the future no man can determine, any more than he could have foreseen the fluctuations in the past. Silver has been as low as 46¾ pence per ounce, while in 1859 it was up to 62.16 pence. It may reach that point again or it may go down again. It now rises in value by reason, in part, of the order of the German government suspending the demonetization of silver for the present; and I beg to state a fact, which I have on the highest authority, that France has already accumulated about $100,000,000 of silver, a large part of which, when the proper point is reached, will be thrown upon the markets; and when that time comes, your silver goes down. Thus you have a standard varying from week to week and from day to day. Can you, gentlemen, put this burden upon the country? Or, if you do it, is it possible that you will not at the same time so derange business that the returning prosperity of the country and the revival of business enterprise already begun will not be seriously checked?

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. Has not silver been down so low as 46¾*d.*, and is it not now 58*d.*?

Mr. KASSON. I do not know what the gentleman refers to except it be what I have already stated.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. The question is simply this: Have we increased its value by using it as subsidiary coin?

Mr. KASSON. We have used it as subsidiary coin with a different ratio of value from the silver dollar.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. And what has been the effect?

Mr. KASSON. It has been thus affected probably to some extent, but I do not know how much, as we have only coined $25,000,000 of it.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. KASSON. My time is nearly up, and I must be excused.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. Is not the value of silver given to it because it is used as coin?

Mr. KASSON. No; it is an article in the market but has an artificial vale as coin. But the gentleman must excuse me, as my time is nearly out.

The whole question, then, I apprehend, cannot be in the judgment of this House whether the original bill shall be adopted. It embraces so many contingencies shown by observation and examination to be outside of the ordinary judgment of legislative bodies that I apprehend that is out of the question. What I have said, therefore, I desire to apply largely to the substitute for the bill. It concerns the propriety, at this time, before the fluctuations of silver are so determined that you can possibly establish its ratio of value to the gold dollar, the propriety of taking any action in the present condition of affairs and of our knowledge. From fifteen to one it has fallen; that is, the value as to gold has fallen; at one time to over twenty to one; that is to say, over twenty pounds of silver required to be equivalent to one pound of gold.

I submit, in view of the action of this commission of ours, which is charged especially to find if there be not a safe ratio we can adopt as to relative values of silver and gold, that we should await their report and find if it be possible to adjust a relative value between the two metals. If it be, I am for adopting it; but if it be not, then let us stand by the least fluctuating standard as the most beneficial to the people of our country in respect to their own debts and in respect to the payment of the obligations that Europe seems now likely to owe annually to the amount of nearly $100,000,000 to the people of the United States.

Mr. BLAND. I will yield now for ten minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have none of the remarks quoted from me to withdraw. They were not made on the bill demonetizing the standard silver dollar which was passed, which was a substitute, never read in this House, and being a substitute was not the bill to which I had spoken.

In answer to the learned gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] and the equally learned gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] I have only in humility to confess that, unlike them, I was not at my birth inspired with all wisdom, all knowledge, and all coming experience, and that I have therefore, unlike them, frequently had to sit humbly at the feet of teachers, and especially in the presence of that master teacher, the Disposer of Events, whose logic is the volume I have studied most assiduously and devoutly, though it has often compelled me to abandon cherished conclusions which, in the absence of their gifts, had been deduced from imperfect knowledge.

I did believe when I made those remarks that we must have a single standard because gold and silver fluctuated; gold more, as is shown by the history of commerce, than any other commodity produced by man. But I have learned, sir, through the sad experiences of the past three years; from the parliamentary commission appointed to inquire into the depreciation of silver referred to by the gentlemen; from the minutes of the Indian board on the same subject; from the writings of Wollowski, Cernuschi, De Lavaleye, and other philosophers of Europe, that the double standard alone can give stability to the currency of a country; that when gold depreciates silver appreciates; that when silver depreciates gold appreciates; that the nation that maintains a double standard has an unvarying currency, while that which relies upon either gold or silver suffers from depreciation or appreciation—depreciation affecting one class, appreciation the other, as between creditor and debtor.

The minute of the Indian board has this paragraph on the recent fluctuations in the value of these metals:

> The divergence now noticeable in the values of gold and silver does not necessarily prove a diminution in the value of silver. It may be equally well accounted for by a rise in the value of gold; and, in fact, it is probable that since the commencement of this divergence in November, 1872, there has been an increase in the value of gold as well as a decrease in the value of silver. The actual values, measured in silver, of general commodities, whether in India or in England, afford, as yet, no evidence of any recent sudden or violent fall in the value of silver; and if a priori considerations strongly indicate that silver must have fallen, such considerations also make it probable that gold must have risen in value. Appended to this resolution is a series of tables of prices in London and in India, the information contained in which points to two conclusions: First, that gold has risen in value since March, 1873, and especially since last December; secondly, that it is not shown that silver has fallen in value, i. e., as compared with commodities in general, either in London or in India, during the same period. These conclusions are open to correction on a wider review of the economical causes which have been at work during the period; but they appear to indicate a rise in the value of gold as at least one of the causes which have disturbed the equilibrium of the two metals. The bearing of both conclusions upon the questions now before the government of India is important.

In supporting the substitute, which is my bill of last session, I plead in the name of justice and of honesty for the maintenance and enforcement of the wise provisions of the laws under which we have issued two thousand millions of bonds. No exigency, said the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] demands immediate action! Why, sir, the highest of exigencies, justice to the wronged and oppressed American people, demands it. They are in idleness and in want by our legislation shrinking the value of their labor and accumulated property. It is we who are dooming men of skill and industry to idleness and vagrancy. I ask that gentlemen to-day shall restore and enforce the law of March, 1869, which, being an act to maintain the public credit, declared that all our obligations should be paid in coin of gold or silver. I ask you in the name of honor, of honesty, and justice to your constituents, outraged and oppressed, to stand by the letter and spirit of the funding act of 1870, which in providing for the issue of 4, 4½, and 5 per cent. bonds provided that they should be paid in the then standard coin of the country.

What was that standard coin? It was a gold dollar which was not the unit of value, and a silver dollar such as the substitute proposes, which was then, and had been from 1792, the unit of the monetary system of the United States. This substitute proposes to vindicate and execute both of those acts. In doing this it proposes to relieve the labor of the country from the grasping dishonesty which, by appreciating one metal, requires two days' labor, two barrels of flour, two bales of cotton, two hogsheads of tobacco, two tons of iron, to pay the amount of interest that one did when silver was demonetized. That is the whole question, whether labor and enterprise shall by an ingenious contrivance have their products so reduced in value by the appreciation of a metal and the making of that metal the sole money of the country, that poverty and despair shall everywhere prevail? In the name of outraged justice, in the name of humanity, here and abroad, I plead with you, gentlemen of the House, to stand by the coins of gold or silver pledged by the acts of 1869 and 1870. Stand by your contract and thus vindicate the honor of your country and the rights of the poorer classes of your countrymen.

Ten minutes will not suffice to read the passages I have marked in these papers, but I will invite your attention to some facts illustrative of the Indian money problem, and to a brief extract or two from the report of the British parliamentary commission to show that what I am contending for is deemed reasonable by authorities who, though not inspired like the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] have studied the question of currency in the light not only of all recent experience, but in the light of the history of the world, under the discipline and restraints of the scientific institutions of England and the states of the continent.

The report of the parliamentary commission informs us that India absorbed during the forty years between 1835-'36 and 1874-'75, £200,000,000 or a thousand million of dollars of silver, and that she has need of much more as I shall show hereafter. It also tells us that, misled by the example of nations that claim to be more enlightened, she began a system of public works, the capital for which she borrowed from England on coin-bearing bonds; that these works are unproductive, and that English capitalists no longer send her silver in settlement of the balance of trade, but bills of exchange drawn against her bonds held by them; so that, while India suffers from the lack of silver, the market of England was suddenly overstocked with that metal.

Here is a table showing the net imports of silver into India from 1867 to 1875-'76, which with a statement of the amount of bills annually drawn will illustrate the net imports of silver after deducting exports:

1866-'67	£6,960,000
1867-'68	5,590,000
1868-'69	8,600,900
1869-'70	7,320,000
1870-'71	940,000
1871-'72	6,515,000
1872-'73	705,000
1873-'74	2,450,000
1874-'75	4,640,000
And in the year just concluded, that is, 1875-'76	1,555,000

Statement showing the permanent effect of an increase of "council bills" on the flow of silver to India and upon the Indian exchanges.

1865-'66	£6,998,899
1866-'67	5,613,746
1867-'68	4,137,285
1868-'69	3,705,741
1869-'70	6,980,122
1870-'71	8,443,509
1871-'72	10,310,339
1872-'73	13,939,095
1873-'74	13,285,678
1874-'75	10,841,615
1875-'76	12,389,613

These tables are taken from the London Economist, because they give the facts more in detail than does the report, but they are sustained by its assertions.

The commission regard the conditions illustrated by these tables as but temporary, and show how large a market India still offers for silver. On this point let me cite the language of the report:

> Colonel Hyde, for fourteen years director of the mint in Calcutta, was examined by the commission, and in the course of his testimony he was asked whether he believed that India had already been supplied with adequate silver currency. He stated in reply his belief that the capacity of India for absorbing silver currency remained great. He gave as the grounds of his belief that in many parts of India, especially in the distant and more isolated parts, transactions were not carried on by currency but by barter. He explained that "wherever large public works have been in progress, such as railways, roads, and irrigation schemes, silver had been generally distributed in such districts," and that where this had taken place, the use of silver currency had superseded barter arrangements to a great extent. Where the natives have once been taught the convenience of silver currency, there the currency remains. Another witness, Mr. Mackenzie, also spoke strongly on the absorption of silver by India. He said: "It appears from historical periods she has always gone on absorbing silver, and there seems at present no cessation to this absorption." He also spoke of the circulation in many districts being "totally inadequate, "a large amount appears either to be hoarded or converted into ornaments, and remains in the district."
> A practical distinction should, in the opinion of your committee, be drawn between the addition made to a currency in countries where all transactions have been previously carried on in the same form of currency; and where accordingly an increased supply would simply have for its effect a rise in prices, and, on the other hand, an addition made to the currency by the extension of that currency over fields where transactions were previously carried on in a totally different form.
> If, at a former period, only a portion of India used silver to any extent in the ordinary transactions of life, and if now the extent of territory using it has been doubled, it is clear that India requires more silver than formerly; and the facts of the case seem to warrant the conclusion that the use of silver coin has greatly extended in India, and will continue to extend, not so much by the use of more silver in the territories already occupied by the existing currency, as by the gradual increase of its use in the remoter parts of India.

These facts seem to me to be sufficient in themselves to dispose of the terrible suggestion that the restoration of the standard dollar to our coinage will overwhelm us by a ceaseless tide of worthless silver flowing from all lands. What it will do will be to restore the old relation of 15½ to 1 between silver and gold.

The gentleman from New York said that the report of the commission had compelled the Latin Union to suspend their coinage. How then does it elaborately discuss the effects of that suspension?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I desire to correct the gentleman. He misunderstood me; I made no such statement.

Mr. KELLEY. Then my ears deceived me and the ears of gentlemen around me were deceived.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I merely stated the fact that the Latin Union had suspended coinage, but not as a consequence of the report of the silver commission.

Mr. KELLEY. I am glad to have the explanation made and hope the correction will be made in the RECORD. The commission discussed elaborately the effect of the action of the Latin Union. Their report also tells me that in four years France—a nation that has not one legal tender, nor two legal tenders, but three legal tenders; in which gold, silver, and the irredeemable notes of the Bank of France are all legal tender and are each at par with the others because the government receives and pays whatever it makes legal tender—France absorbed in four years preceding the making of this report not $100,000,000, as stated by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] but $167,500,000 of silver, and goes on absorbing it and her industries are undisturbed, while those of Germany and the United States that are pursuing the ignis fatuus of a single standard, the metal for which they cannot obtain, are paralyzed unto death Sir, France has the equilibrium and suffers no crisis. She has gold and silver, and they regulate her currency by each compensating for the fluctuations that may occur in the other.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Since the country became fully informed of the effect of the coinage act of February 12, 1873, omitting the silver dollar as a legal tender from the coinage of the United States, there has been an unmistakable determination among the people that it should be restored. The passage of this act at a time when specie payments were not arresting the attention of the country and the absence of any general and definite information as to the effect of that law, either in Congress or out of Congress, had created a wide-spread belief that the measure was designed to promote special interests, and not the general good. A people greatly in debt and feeling seriously the weight of taxation cannot be unmindful of the medium through which payment shall be made. The act of 1869, declaring that the entire public debt, a large portion of which had been contracted on the basis of a paper money greatly under the value of coin, should be paid in coin, has been condemned by a large portion of our people as an unjust discrimination in favor of capital, and this act of February 12, 1873, which in effect declares that this great public debt and all other debts, public and private, should not only be paid in coin but in gold coin, this measure, with the succeeding measures proposing to retire and cancel the greenback money, leaving gold only as a medium of payment, was well calculated to excite serious alarm. The least-informed citizen could perceive that the debt he might have contracted would be greatly enlarged by the shrinking in value of the property on which he might rely for payment. Is it remarkable, then, that a vigorous public opinion should at least demand the restoration of the silver dollar as a full legal tender to our coinage?

This act of February 12, 1873, in a most striking manner illustrates the contest between labor and capital, and the ingenious and far-reaching methods by which capital constantly obtains the advantage. On the 1st day of January, 1873, it may be safely assumed that the debt of the United States, the debts of States and municipal governments, of corporations and citizens, taken in the aggregate, greatly exceeded the indebtedness of this country at any other period. Subsequent events fully demonstrate that it was the intention of the men who for years have controlled our legislation and financial policy to retire at an early moment the legal-tender greenback money. At this period, without a note of warning, not by a direct provision but by a mere omission in the enactment of a voluminous statute, one of the precious metals, used for the coinage of money in all the ages and fully recognized by the Constitution and entering into every contract, public and private, in this country up to that hour, is ignored and set aside and the most precious and valuable of all the means of payment known to the world, gold coin, must be sought for by the debtor to meet the demands that press upon him. This, with the resumption act, will be found to be one of the most extraordinary instances of bad faith ever charged upon a government. It entails and will entail, if it shall be consummated, on a great multitude of people destitution and ruin, while a comparative few—capitalists of Europe and America—will by this disingenuous and fraudulent legislation add hundreds of millions to their wealth.

The vast body of debts, public and private, made on the basis of a greatly inflated volume of paper money, and which by the act of 1869 "to strengthen the public credit," so called, this coin act of 1873 and the resumption act of 1875, are to be made payable in gold coin, present as a united series of measures a most revolting instance of public injustice. Capital here achieves a heartless victory over the debtor and the laborer, and the suffering which this victory may bring to countless firesides may sooner or later provoke retaliation. The memory of a great act of injustice is not a pleasant feature in the history of even a monarchy, and much less so in that of a republic where justice and good faith are the foundations of government.

This bill, or rather this substitute for the original bill, simply re-enacts the silver-dollar law of 1837, which is substantially the same as the law of 1792, and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to restore the coinage of the silver dollar of 412½ grains of silver, with unrestricted coinage and unlimited legal tender, except where the contract is expressly payable in gold. It is simply the restoration of the law in regard to the silver dollar as it stood when repealed by the act of February 12, 1873. The absolute justice of this measure is too manifest for dispute. It can only be opposed on the theory that legislation in the interest of capital, however unjust and oppressive, can never be recalled. That theory is not yet fully crystallized in our Government and a vigilant people will see that it shall not be.

It yet, sir, is remarkable that the entire weight of gentlemen who administer the financial affairs of this Government is against the restoration of the silver dollar. Unhappily the small body of people to whose benefit this order of legislation inures, greatly enlarging their already ample estates, are infinitely more vigilant and possessed of infinitely more leisure than the people whom it will oppress. They are always at the seats of power, and their arguments, and theirs only, reach the ear of those who administer the affairs of Government. The people are never represented by the lobby, either in the halls of this Capitol or in your departments of Government.

Even as to the resumption act, it has been asserted, since the last adjournment of Congress, that the legal-tender notes, when redeemed in coin, would be re-issued; that it was not the purpose of the Treasury Department to finally cancel the money of the people; but the Secretary of the Treasury tells us, in his last report to Congress, "that the policy which tolerated the continuance of these notes as money after the close of the war must be regarded as a public misfortune." And again: "They have served their end, they existed only as evidence of Government indebtedness, to be provided for as other debt obligations." It is therefore apparent that influences, strong and potential, are at work to reduce, in a very short period, the currency and money, and all values in this country, to the single standard of gold coin, no matter how oppressive and no matter how wide-spread the disaster and ruin it may bring.

Specie payments—no, gold payments—are to be forced upon the country, the greenbacks funded in gold-interest-bearing bonds, and the issues of the national banks brought down to the gold standard, and yet the most rose-colored estimate only claims $181,678,000 in silver and gold coin and bullion in the United States, with at least $700,000,000 of Federal, State, and local taxation upon our people.

The Director of the Mint informs us that the gold and silver coinage of the last year was as follows:

Coinage.	Pieces.	Value.
Gold	1,949,468	$38,178,962 50
Silver, (trade dollars)	6,132,050	6,132,050 00
Silver, (subsidiary coin)	64,104,950	12,994,452 50
Minor	14,915,000	260,350 00
Total	87,101,468	57,565,815 00

The export of gold vastly exceeds the import. Only $38,178,962.50 coined in the past year, yet, at the bidding of the great capitalists at home and abroad, we must repudiate the greenback and fund it in gold-interest-bearing bonds, and ignore silver coin as no longer consistent with the views and interests of the gentlemen of princely estates who control our financial affairs.

If labor and the great interests that are immediately identified with our productive industries do not intend to be crushed out, they must insist, as freemen only can insist, and by a force of public opinion that cannot be resisted, that this reign of injustice and oppression shall cease.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, it has been urged by the opponents of this bill that this measure has been foisted upon the House and the country without due consideration. Sir, this bill was pending at the last session of this Congress six weeks; it has been discussed throughout the country in the public press and in nearly every congressional district in the country, and when the gentleman from Ohio claims that here, without consideration, we are endeavoring to pass a measure of this importance, and compares it to the explosion of Hell Gate, I apprehend that he had probably forgotten that when silver was demonetized in this country it was a Hell Gate explosion, and that he helped to apply the torch. The country was not informed of the fact that such a measure was pending in the House at that time.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] pleaded for time, for consideration, but I apprehend the fact that the pleading is for an extension of time wherein to oppress the debtor class of this country. It is simply a question, as was remarked by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] that instead of one day's work paying a certain amount of debt we shall require two days' work; that is the effect of establishing a single standard of values. Is it not a matter of history that a famine occurred in Ireland which nearly swept the people of that green isle from the face of the earth because its people depended upon one standard of food?

If it were possible by legislation to decree that nothing but wheat should be used for bread, would it not be a consequence that the price of wheat would be double? But when there are two or three articles that may be used, the actual effect is that the price of the one governs the other and there is a medium standard established beween the two.

There has been a reference again to this commission who have been authorized to inquire into this matter, and it is urged that we should postpone action until we receive the report which that commission will lay before the House.

Mr. Speaker, I am apprehensive that the gentlemen who raised this objection, at least I fear they would, if this commission reported favorably upon the subject, resort to some other means to defeat this measure as heretofore. Pleading for time is pleading for the creditor class against the debtor. Some suggestions have been made in regard to the substitute for the bill. That is a provision that the silver dollar shall be a legal tender for all debts except where the contract requires the payment of gold coin. The sole object of that amendment is to protect the kind of contracts known to exist in this country calling specifically for payment in gold coin as the payment mentioned in contracts. We know that on the Pacific coast in many cases contracts have been made requiring payments in gold coin. It was not the object of the committee, and it should not be the object of this House, to interfere with any debt required to be paid in gold coin. So far as public debts are concerned I know of no such contracts, and the law is now, except by the law of 1873, that all public and private debts must be paid in gold and silver. The gentlemen who oppose this bill pretend to be especial advocates on this floor—and especially the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON]—of the workingmen, the widows, and orphans. He is not representing that class upon this floor, and I venture to assert that if you ask the workingmen, the widows, and orphans what they demand in this country there would be a unanimous voice in favor of this bill. But if he asks the creditor class, the men who hold the obligations of the country in behalf of public and private debts, they would demand payment in gold coin. He refers to the report of the Director of the Mint on this question of the variation of the prices of gold and silver, and the whole argument is an assumption when they undertake to say that gold is the only standard. It is merely an assumption, because gold has appreciated and was occasioned by the demonetizing of silver in Germany and the United States. Mr. Groschen, on behalf of the British Parliament, expressed himself with reference to these commodities having appreciated. I hope that this Government will in restoring to us a double standard compel Germany to retrace her steps in that regard.

I confess that I am in favor of the bill as originally introduced. I agree that the certificates authorized to be issued for bullion deposited in the Treasury would take the place of your national-bank notes and furnish a secure paper currency for this country, and that the coin mentioned there would be a legal tender for all debts as is provided in the substitute. But I am not particular upon this point. For that reason the committee has permitted the substitute to be voted upon by the House in order that the House may take their choice between the two bills. I now call for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The time allowed for debate has expired.

Mr. DURHAM. I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment to the substitute. I do not desire to argue it, but there is some doubt whether or not it is provided for in the act of 1873.

Mr. FORT. Will it be in order to ask that the time for debate upon this bill be extended?

The SPEAKER. It can be extended by unanimous consent.

Mr. FORT. There are a great many of the humbler members of this House who would like to say something upon this important measure.

The SPEAKER. How long a time does the gentleman suggest?

Mr. FORT. One hour.

Mr. BUCKNER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] will be read.

Mr. FORT. I would like to have the privilege of having printed in the RECORD some remarks upon this subject.

The SPEAKER. That permission can be given, if there is no objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD some remarks upon this subject, in addition to those which I made to-day.

There was no objection.

The amendment of Mr. DURHAM was read as follows:

Provided, That a seignorage of 1½ per cent. shall be charged upon the dollars coined under this act.

Mr. KELLEY. I object to that amendment.

Mr. PAGE. I ask unanimous consent to have considered as pending an amendment to line 9 of the proposed substitute, to insert after the word "law" in that line the words "or express contract."

Mr. KEHR. I object to that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The time for debate having expired, and the main question having been ordered upon the bill, amendments, and substitute, the first question will be taken upon the substitute offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The substitute (H. R. No. 4189) was as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following:

That there shall be, from time to time, coined at the mints of the United States, silver dollars of the weight of 412½ grains standard silver to the dollar, as provided for in the act of January 18, 1837; and that said dollar shall be a legal tender for all debts, public and private, except where payment of gold coin is required by law.

The question was taken, and the substitute was adopted.

The bill, as amended by the adoption of the substitute, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 167, nays 53, not voting 69; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Anderson, Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, John H. Bagley, jr., John H. Baker, Banning, Bland, Blount, Boone, Bradford, Bradley, Bright, John Young Brown, William R. Brown, Buckner, Horatio C. Burchard, Samuel D. Burchard, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. Caldwell, Campbell, Cannon, Carr, Cason, Caswell, Cate, Caulfield, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, John B. Clark, jr., of Missouri, Clymer, Collins, Conger, Cook, Cowan, Cox, Crounse, Culberson, Cutler, Davis, Dibrell, Durham, Ellis, Evans, Faulkner, Felton, Finley, Forney, Fort, Foster, Franklin, Fuller, Glover, Goode, Gunter, Andrew H. Walker, Walling, Ward, Warner, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Wigginton, Wike, James Williams, Wilshire, and Woodburn—69.

So the bill (H. R. No. 4189) was passed.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. ATKINS said: My colleague, Mr. HOUSE, is absent upon an investigating committee; if present he would vote "ay."

Mr. GUNTER. My colleague, Mr. GAUSE, is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. BLAND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri desire to have the title of the bill amended so as to correspond with the title of the substitute? The title to the substitute will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill authorizing the coinage of the standard silver dollar and restoring its legal tender character.

Mr. BLAND. That is the title which I desire to have adopted.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the title as just read will be regarded as the title of the bill.

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. CROUNSE. What is the regular order?

The SPEAKER. The business of the morning hour.

Mr. CROUNSE. I, call, then, for the regular order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe that this motion is in order, even before the business of the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The House yesterday made an order that the post-office appropriation bill should be in order after the morning hour.

Mr. HOLMAN. Although I presume that my motion is in order I withdraw it for the present.

BURLINGTON AND MISSOURI RIVER RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER. The motion being withdrawn, the Chair will not decide until the occasion requires whether it is in order or not. The regular order being demanded, the morning hour begins at five minutes before three o'clock; and the pending business is the bill (H. R. No. 4075) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862," approved July 2, 1864. The gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. McCRARY,] who reported the bill from the Committee on the Judiciary, is entitled to the floor.

Mr. McCRARY. I have no desire to discuss the bill further myself. I will yield the floor to the gentleman from Nebraska, [Mr. CROUNSE,] whose constituents are especially interested in the measure.

Mr. FRYE. Before the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCRARY] yields the floor, I wish to ask him a question. When the bill was last under consideration, I understood him to close his speech by saying that if no gentleman desired to discuss the bill he would move the previous question. I say to him now that there are members of the Judiciary Committee who desire to discuss the bill, and I ask him whether he yields the floor to the gentleman from Nebraska with the understanding that that gentleman is to move the previous question.

Mr. McCRARY. I do not wish of course to cut off any member, and particularly members of the Judiciary Committee, who may wish to debate the bill. I expect that the gentleman from Nebraska will yield to them if they desire to be heard.

Mr. CROUNSE. How much time will those gentlemen desire?

Mr. FRYE. I do not know. I understand several gentlemen desire to discuss the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Maine that the bill will hold its place in the morning hour from day to day until the previous question shall be called and sustained. The Chair will recognize hereafter the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCRARY] who reported the bill to call the previous question.

Mr. McCRARY. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Nebraska, [Mr. CROUNSE.]

Mr. GLOVER. With the permission of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCRARY] I desire to offer an amendment to the bill.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I would like to put one question to the gentleman from Iowa.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the bill is open to amendment whenever the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER] shall be recognized.

Mr. CROUNSE. Have I the floor?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the floor.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I desire to ask the gentleman before he goes any further, to let us have an understanding as to the time when the previous question will be called. I understand that several gentlemen desire to speak on the bill, and others who are called out of the House for the time being wish to be here and vote. Let us have some understanding as to the time when the gentleman from Iowa will call the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can only say that the debate on this bill will continue during the morning hour from day to day until the House shall determine to second the demand for the previous question.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Will not the gentleman from Iowa designate some hour or some day when he will call the previous question?

Mr. CROUNSE. As to when the previous question shall be demanded, that question can be better settled after I understand who wants to speak upon the bill and for what purpose. I am advised that since this bill was brought before the House nearly a week ago a pressure has been brought against it which I fear almost to confront. I understand that every effort will be made to defeat the bill by amending it to death, by referring it back to the committee, and by all other means known to parliamentary law. I wish to proclaim here in advance that if there is any honest intention, any intention in good faith on the part of any member to amend the bill so as better to carry out the purposes for which it was introduced, I shall give the broadest latitude for such amendments and also for discussion. The purpose of the bill is such that it will bear the fullest examination and discussion; but I would not like by any indulgence of mine, or by the abandonment of any advantage which I may now possess, to allow the bill to be defeated by any of those resorts. I will listen to any amendment which may be suggested; amendments which any gentleman desire to offer may be read for information.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to correct one statement of the gentleman from Nebraska if he will allow me. He stated, I believe, that there is no honest purpose, as he understands, to perfect this bill.

I simply desire to say that I shall offer three amendments for the purpose of perfecting the bill and doing justice to the people who are the constituents of the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. CROUNSE. Is the gentleman from Maine in favor of the purpose of the bill? Did he not tell me it was his object to defeat the bill? That is a plain question; answer it.

Mr. FRYE. My purpose is, if the bill is to pass, that it shall pass in a perfect form, so the rights of the people of Nebraska shall be protected.

Mr. CROUNSE. That is an evasive answer. I will take care of the interests of the people of Nebraska. I do not ask the gentleman to volunteer to defend them.

Mr. FRYE. But I desire to do so.

Mr. CROUNSE. I ask the gentleman from Maine whether he is in favor of the purpose of the bill and whether he did not declare to me that it was his purpose to defeat it?

Mr. FRYE. I believe that the bill is an outrage in itself.

Mr. CROUNSE. That is enough.

Mr. FRYE. I believe I can make it a great deal better than it is now by putting on some amendments.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Nebraska yield the floor?

Mr. CROUNSE. Not to the gentleman from Maine to offer his amendments.

Mr. GLOVER. I ask the gentleman from Nebraska to allow me to offer an amendment.

Mr. CROUNSE. I am willing to yield so the amendment may be read for information.

Mr. GLOVER. I desire to offer this amendment to protect the interests of the people, not of Nebraska alone but of all the people of the United States, and I hope the House will give attention to the reading of the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out of section 1 lines 20, 21, and 22, and insert the following words:

That the lands granted to the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad by section 19 of the act above mentioned shall not be located beyond or outside of a line of ten miles on each side of said road, and that the lands outside of said ten miles on each side of said road which may have been conveyed by the United States to said railroad company shall be reconveyed by said railroad company to the United States, except such lands as may have been sold and conveyed prior to the passage of this act; and that for such lands the sum of $1.25 per acre shall be paid into the United States Treasury. And this provision shall be complied with by said railroad company before any of the other provisions of this act shall take effect or be in force: And provided further, That the lands granted to the said Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company by the United States shall be subject to the same conditions in regard to the sale of such lands as are imposed upon the Union Pacific Railroad Company and branches.

Mr. GLOVER. I desire to have it understood that this amendment is pending.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CROUNSE. I simply allowed the amendment to be read for information, and do not yield the floor to have it come in as a pending amendment.

The SPEAKER. If the demand for the previous question is not seconded, then the gentleman from Missouri can offer his amendment.

Mr. FRYE. I do not understand that the previous question has been demanded.

The SPEAKER. It has not, but the gentleman from Nebraska is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CROUNSE. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that the purpose of this bill was set forth fully by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCRARY] when he reported it. The bill has been considered in the Committee on the Judiciary, and was reported after full argument for and against it, and after due consideration, and therefore I now demand the previous question, which will give us an hour for debate after it has been seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. GLOVER. I hope that the previous question will be voted down.

Mr. CROUNSE. I hope not. I hope the question will be decided here, so it may be determined whether these corporations shall run from Congress to Congress.

Mr. KASSON. Is the gentleman from Nebraska willing to allow me a few moments to call attention to a communication received from some people in Iowa on this subject? I understood there would be an opportunity for debate.

Mr. CROUNSE. After the previous question is seconded, I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa for the purpose of calling attention to that communication.

Mr. KASSON. But there will be no opportunity for amendment, and I desire to protect certain interests in my State adversely affected by this bill.

Mr. CROUNSE. I demand the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes 82.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. GLOVER. I desire now to move to the bill the amendment which has just been read, and if the House desires, I will then move to recommit it.

Mr. HOLMAN. O, no!

Mr. CROUNSE. Very well; I will now merely move my amendment.

Mr. KASSON. I ask the gentleman from Missouri to give me the opportunity to offer another amendment and an opportunity to explain it before he calls for the previous question.

Mr. GLOVER. I have no objection to yielding to the gentleman from Iowa to offer his amendment.

Mr. FRYE. I have three amendments to offer to the bill.

Mr. KASSON. I move to strike out all after the word "requirements," in line 15, page 2, to and including the word "act," in line 16, and to insert in lieu thereof the following words: "all the other branches of the Union Pacific Railroad."

Mr. FRYE. I have another amendment which I desire to offer.

The SPEAKER. That can only be admitted by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the portion proposed to be stricken out be now read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "requirements," in the fifteenth line of section 1, down to and including the word "act," in the sixteenth line, to wit these words: "provided by sections 9 and 15 of said last-mentioned act;" and insert in lieu thereof the following words: "of the other branches of the Union Pacific Railroad."

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to understand whether the amendment which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] proposes to offer is an amendment to that of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER] or an amendment to the original text.

Mr. FRYE. It is an amendment to the original text, as are the other two which I hold in my hand.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair will entertain them.

Mr. FRYE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after "1864," in line 22, section 1, the following:

"Except that the lands received by the said grant to the said Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company in Nebraska shall be subject to the operation of section 3 of said act of July 1, 1862, in like manner as the land granted by Congress to the Union Pacific Railroad Company and branches.

Mr. FRYE. I have another amendment which I desire to offer.

The SPEAKER. To the original text?

Mr. FRYE. Yes, sir.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "said," in line 3, section 2, to and including the word "Nebraska," in line 6, and insert "Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company in Nebraska may operate its line in connection with the said Union Pacific Railroad; and all railroad companies whose roads now connect with or may hereafter connect with the said Burlington and Missouri River Railroad in Nebraska shall have and enjoy all the rights, privileges, and immunities in respect to rates, time, and transportation over the said Burlington and Missouri River Railroad in Nebraska that are conferred upon the said Burlington and Missouri River Railroad in Nebraska in respect to the Union Pacific Railroad, by this act."

Mr. FRYE rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri has the floor for debate.

Mr. GLOVER. How much time does the gentleman from Maine desire?

Mr. FRYE. About twenty minutes.

Mr. GLOVER. I give fifteen minutes to the grentleman from Maine.

Mr. FRYE. Will the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER] yield to me to make a motion to recommit?

Mr. HOLMAN. O, no; we want to pass the bill with these amendments.

Mr. FRYE. If the gentleman from Missouri will yield to me for that purpose, I will move to recommit the bill with the amendments.

Mr. HOLMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri is a very important one, and an attempt has been made for years to get this important measure of policy in regard to this land grant before the House in a tangible form. It is now before the House in a very satisfactory form, it appears to me; and I trust that the bill will pass at this time as proposed to be amended.

Mr. FRYE. Then I desire to discuss the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Missouri does not yield to allow the gentleman from Maine to make a motion to recommit the bill.

Mr. GLOVER. I do not yield for that purpose. I yield the gentleman from Maine fifteen minutes for discussion.

Mr. FRYE. This bill is one of great importance, and I trust that I may have the attention of the House while I explain certain objections which lie in my mind to it. At the last session of Congress we passed a bill relating to the Union Pacific Railroad Company in my opinion at that time, unconstitutional and unjust. But it had this excuse, that the Government of the United States was a creditor to that road in $35,000,000, and that the legislation was for the purpose of protecting that creditor. In this bill there is no such excuse found. It simply in its operation allows the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad Company, a corporation of great wealth and power, running to-day the Burlington and Missouri, to take from the Union Pacific Railroad Company—running parallel to it for hundreds of miles and within twenty miles of it—freight and passengers, and thus reduce the earnings of the Union Pacific Railroad Company and cripple its power to meet the requirements of the law which this House passed at its last session.

Now, sir, this is not a conflict between the people and a railroad company. It is a conflict between two great railroad corporations, and the interests of the people only come in incidentally. Let us take the history of the Burlington and Missouri road. It was chartered by the State of Iowa, and in the Pacific acts of 1862 not one word will be found relating to it. When the grants of land were made in 1862 to the Union Pacific, no grants of land were made to the Burlington and Missouri; but in 1864, in the act increasing the grant to the Union Pacific Railroad Company, in sections 18, 19, and 20, the Burlington and Missouri Railroad Company of Iowa is given a land grant and is allowed certain privileges, certain immunities, and a right of way through the State of Nebraska, to connect with the Union Pacific Railroad at the one-hundredth meridian.

Now, sir, this Burlington and Missouri Railroad Company when it came before this House, came with a bill, which I have in my hand, simply declaring that it was a branch of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, like the other three branches chartered and to which land grants were given, and as such entitled to all the rights and privileges they or either of them enjoyed.

This bill which I hold in my hand, and which the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CROUNSE] sent to our committee, declares in terms that the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad is a branch of the Union Pacific Railroad Company. Go back five or six years and you find that in receiving this charter the same Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company came before the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Harlan, and claimed that it had never been a branch of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, and had never been subject to the limitations to which that company was. It claimed to be exempt from the ten-mile limitation imposed upon that road and all its branches. The Secretary decided in favor of its claim; found that it was not a branch and was entitled to go outside of the ten-mile limit and select an equal number of acres with those hitherto pre-empted within the ten-mile limit. The same question was again argued and insisted upon before Secretary Browning, who decided adversely to the company. Again it was argued before Secretary Delano, who gave a favorable opinion, on the ground that in no sense was it a branch of the Union Pacific Railroad Company. Twelve hundred thousand acres had been pre-empted within the ten-mile limit. Under this decision, this road selected that number of acres of the cream of the lands of Nebraska—outside of that limit—exercising such a care to obtain the very best that in some instances it selected land lying one hundred miles away from its tract. It received patents for the 1,200,000 acres, and then, to make itself absolutely certain, obtained the Attorney-General to test the validity of its patents in the courts, and Mr. Justice Miller affirmed the opinion of Secretaries Harlan and Delano.

Mr. HOLMAN. Secretary Browning?

Mr. FRYE. No; Secretaries Harlan and Delano.

To-day that company, having 1,200,000 acres of land obtained solely on the plea that it never was a branch of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, asks to make them a branch. Having gained all it wished by not being a branch, it says now let us have all the rights, muniments, and advantages of being a branch of the Union Pacific Railroad Company.

Now I do not know, Mr. Speaker, if there is any way in which to reach them and recover these lands, but I do want to call attention to an amendment which I think can reach them in another particular. The Union Pacific Railroad act provides that after the lapse of three years after the time the road is completed all the lands granted to the road shall be subject to pre-emption at $1.25 an acre. This road has obtained these lands; they are worth to-day from $2.50 to $20 an acre; let the company be compelled to hold them subject as the other branches of the road are to pre-emption at $1.25 an acre. If this road is really a branch of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, with all the rights and immunities of that road, I wish to put in this provision in the interest of the people of Nebraska and in the interest of immigration.

Again it will be noticed that this bill provides that the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company shall prorate over the Union Pacific Railroad Company from Fort Kearney to Cheyenne. Now the original proposition was to give the prorate to the eastern line of the State of California. Only look at this monstrous proposition! West of Cheyenne the actual cost of building the Pacific road was four, and may be six times greater than east of that point. The cost of transportation over the mountains west of Cheyenne is probably twice that over the plains east. And yet this road, diverting freight from the Union Pacific road, asked us to compel that road to carry this freight over the mountains at the lowest rate per mile it carries it over the plains.

Why, sir, let this road do that, let a half dozen other roads do it, and you will wipe the Union Pacific Railroad out of existence, and you would never get one single dollar of the thirty-five millions you have advanced to that road.

They saw that, and backed down from that proposition; and they now ask to be allowed to prorate to Cheyenne. Then where are they? The Union Pacific Railroad Company has charged an average. It has increased the charges for freight over the plains east, and decreased the charge of freight over the mountains, and thus made its average. This prorate as far as Cheyenne would actually cost them more than it would if they had their own road and it stopped east of the mountains, because the increased cost of the carriage over the mountains has been added in part to the decreased cost over the plains.

Now, is that what they want? O, no. They propose to land their freight at Cheyenne. Where is it going from Cheyenne? It is going west. How? By the Union Pacific Railroad Company.

This bill provides for experts. Now, those experts will take into consideration the fact that the Union Pacific Railroad has had no haul of this freight except from Kearney Junction: they will take into consideration the increased cost of transportation over the mountains, and then they will increase the charge on the freight landed at Cheyenne one-third or one-half, and these gentlemen know it. Then there will be an outcry all over the western country that there is discriminations against this road and those roads landing freight at Cheyenne. They will then come to Congress with that outcry—you have seen the effect of it in the West—and they will drive through Congress, if they can, their original prorate bill. This bill provides that the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company shall have the right to prorate——

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FRYE. I think the gentleman will yield to me a few minutes more.

Mr. GLOVER. How much more time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. FRYE. Perhaps ten minutes.

Mr. GLOVER. I will yield to the gentleman for ten minutes longer.

Mr. FRYE. This Burlington and Missouri River Railroad alone asks for the right to prorate with the Union Pacific Railroad Company. I suppose the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CROUNSE] was instructed by the resolution of the republican convention which met in his State and a copy of which I hold in my hand. That resolution itself declared that the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company ought to prorate over the Union Pacific Railroad. But it also declared, and instructed its members of Congress to see to it that it was done, that the Atchison and Nebraska, the St. Joseph and Denver, the Midland Pacific, and the Omaha and Northwestern Railroads shall also be allowed to prorate over the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad.

Now that is a question of the utmost importance to those roads and to the people of Iowa and Nebraska. If the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad alone, a road but a few hundred miles long, is permitted to prorate over the Union Pacific Railroad, what shall be done with all those great roads emptying freight into the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad? Shall she stand there and close the door to the other roads and say, We will fix the rates of freight that you shall pay for going over our road? You will only be putting them into a worse position than the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad can possibly be in to-day. If you enact this bill into law, then propriety and justice demand at your hands that you shall do what the republican convention of Nebraska demanded should be done, compel the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company to allow these other roads, emptying their freight into it, to prorate over it, and thus the people of those States and these roads will obtain a benefit. One of the amendments which I have offered provides for that.

Again, if you look at this bill you will find that it provides that the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company shall prorate over the Union Pacific Railroad. Where is the provision in the bill that the Union Pacific Railroad Company shall prorate over the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad? And if you amend the bill so that the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company shall permit these other railroads to prorate over that, where is your provision in this bill which permits the Union Pacific Railroad to prorate back again over those roads?

Will you give this privilege all to one road? The Burlington and Missouri River Railroad has now opened its broad mouth and swallowed up 1,200,000 acres of the best land in Nebraska; will you allow it to open its mouth again and swallow this privilege and this discrimination and this right, and compel all these other roads to stand one side, to go to that road as a beggar in order that their freights may go over it; or compel the Union Pacific Railroad to stand one side and have no power to take its freight over the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad and the other roads running into that?

The Union Pacific Railroad Company brings coal from Wyoming. When that coal gets down to Fort Kearney, where this Burlington and Missouri River Railroad connects with it, they cannot send a single ton over the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad. Why? Because the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company has put up its rate of freight so high that the Union Pacific Railroad cannot afford to send it into Nebraska or Iowa. Why do they do that? They do it because there are coal mines in Iowa, because starting from those coal mines this Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company gets four times the haul that it would get if the freight of coal were given to it at Fort Kearney junction and then carried eastward. Now, who suffers? The people of Nebraska, the people of Iowa are the sufferers by an increased price of coal. Who are the gainers? The capitalists owning the mines in Iowa are the gainers and the holders of the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad stock.

Sir, this bill is one of the utmost importance. In the brief time given to me I have only had an opportunity to call attention to a few amendments which seem to me in the interest of justice and of fair, decent legislation. I believe that the bill ought to be recommitted to the Judiciary Committee, there to be considered again with care, and, if reported back, reported in such a shape as to deal justly with this company, justly with the other railroad corporations, and justly with the people of Iowa and Nebraska.

Mr. CROUNSE rose.

Mr. GLOVER. How much time does the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CROUNSE] desire?

Mr. CROUNSE. Fifteen or twenty minutes, to meet the several objections which have been urged against the bill.

Mr. GLOVER. I cannot yield to the gentleman more than fifteen minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri has forty minutes remaining.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman from Nebraska, before he proceeds, allow me to submit an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. CROUNSE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. I offer the following as an additional proviso:

But if the said company shall decline to accept the other provisions of this act, the provisions aforesaid shall still be in full force; and the issue of patents to said company for lands outside of the said ten-mile limit is hereby declared to be illegal and void; but the patents for lands heretofore sold by said company situate outside of said limits shall be legalized by the payment aforesaid.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CROUNSE] is now entitled to the floor for fifteen minutes.

Mr. CROUNSE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to repel at the outset the imputation which perhaps the remarks of the gentleman last on the floor sought to put upon me, that this bill was brought forward by me in the interest of any railroad. I wish to say that I scarcely know by name the officers of the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad Company, or those of the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company. This bill is in the interest of the people of Nebraska, and in the interest of the commerce of the nation; and any attempt to bring in prominently here the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad, or the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad, to arraign them upon charges which I never before heard and cannot discuss, and so divert the attention of the House, is calculated to raise a false issue and turn attention in the wrong direction. I stand here demanding relief for the people of my State, and in that interest I will contend, whether it is against the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company, or whether it is against the Union Pacific Railroad Company.

My course here in that direction has been too emphatic and too distinct to need any explanation or apology at my hands. I have brought in bills here for the taxation of the lands of both these companies, and I am prepared to join hands with the gentlemen when he, in good faith, brings forward any bill to recover lands that either of these companies may have wrongfully obtained. But what I wish here is that no dust may be thrown, that no false issues may be raised, that this question may be fairly and squarely met whether the Union Pacific Railroad Company runs this Congress or whether Congress has and will exercise the reserved power to alter and amend, or even repeal its charter, if we see fit.

I regret that the time allotted to me is not sufficient to enable me to review this matter fully; but in the few minutes accorded me let me say that in 1862 the first charter of the Pacific Railroad Company was granted. That road was to start in the interior of Nebraska, at the one hundredth meridian of longitude. From that meridian three or four different branches were projected and chartered by the same bill, pointing eastward, one running immediately east to Omaha, at the Missouri River, known as the Iowa branch; another diverging to the northeast, called the Sioux City branch; another extending down to Kansas; the grand purpose and object of the bill being to subsidize one grand-trunk road and different branches to the river, to subserve the public interest. By some manipulation in Congress the Sioux City branch was allowed to go down the river and connect almost in sight of the eastern terminus of the Iowa branch, but a short distance from the city of Omaha, thus making it of but little service to the people of Nebraska or of use to the public.

The Kansas branch was allowed to run direct to Denver. From Denver to Cheyenne, on the Union Pacific Railroad, an independent road was built, and by a bill introduced by the gentleman from Missouri representing the Saint Louis district, and passed in the last Congress, the Kansas Pacific and this road to Cheyenne, as a whole, were put on a prorating basis with Union Pacific road, so that we are bereft of any branches in Nebraska of any account except this one which it is sought by this bill to make a branch of service to the people of Nebraska and to the commerce of the country.

The gentleman who inveighs so loudly against the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad has no word to say against any legislation which has been made for the benefit of the Union Pacific Railroad, but he is particularly solicitous that no amendment should be made which shall be in the least prejudicial to that company. That company came forward in 1864 and had its charter amended to the extent of doubling its land grant. It had the first-mortgage bonds of the Government made second-mortgage bonds, the preference being given those which might be issued to private individuals. As respects all these he has no word of fault to find. However, in this same amendatory act the people demanded something. The fifteenth section says that the road and its several branches shall be operated as one continuous line, without discrimination as respects rates and times of transportation of freight and passengers. The object is patent, and was specially emphasized, that these roads were built by Government aid and for the benefit of the people.

Now, sir, in that same amendatory act this Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company, then crossing the State of Iowa, was allowed to extend its road across the Missouri River into Nebraska and also compelled to connect with the Union Pacific Railroad in order to get its subsidy. It was made by the language of the act a branch of the Union Pacific Railroad, being compelled to connect with it at the one-hundredth meridian of longitude or some point east of it. In consideration of that it was given a land grant, but no money or bonds were issued to it as had been issued to the Union Pacific Railroad. Running parallel to and at points at no great distance from the Union Pacific Railroad, the limit of land grant of the latter extended or lapped over that of the former. For this reason the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company could receive but a very limited amount of lands along the line of its extension in Nebraska, and therefore it is I suppose that whatever lands it got had to be got somewhere else. As I understand it, the Secretary of the Interior held that in view of it getting no lands along its road in places, while the other roads got lands and bonds, and because the lands which it was to have had been already taken up, it was entitled to land in other places.

And these are the lands about which such clamor is made. If they have been unlawfully taken, I will be glad to help the gentleman to recover them. I am not here to aid that road in any illegal act, but I do ask that that question shall be brought up in its proper time and place and not thrust in at this time for the purpose of embarrassing action on this bill. The question presented in the bill is a simple one and I do not want it loaded with amendments which may endanger its passage or render it nugatory or of little value if passed.

This road, Mr. Speaker, runs almost parallel with the Union Pacific for nearly two hundred miles, as has been already said. It is a road built by grant of Government lands, the same as the Union Pacific Railroad, and in its operation should be a benefit rather than a subject of oppression to the people, and would be, if the spirit which prompted the construction of these great highways were carried out. Our commerce is largely West. In that direction and north of Cheyenne lie the new mining fields, the Spotted Tail, Red Cloud, and other Indian reservations, military forts and garrisons, and Nebraska is the nearest State where supplies are produced.

Now, how does the matter stand? How has this Union Pacific Railroad been operated? The Burlington and Missouri River Railroad strikes it at Kearney, some two hundred miles west of Omaha, in Nebraska. When you reach the point of junction with the Union Pacific Railroad you have to pay for fare and freight to Cheyenne, and west of there, as I am assured, precisely the same price that is paid from Omaha. No allowance is made in fare or freight for the two hundred miles run on the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad before the point of junction is reached. The more populous portion of Nebraska is the southern part. This road runs through its capital. Yet, upon the commerce of that section of the State embargo is laid because it cannot move westward without being discriminated against by having these undue charges imposed upon it. That road virtually says, "If you want to have any commerce with the West, it must go around by way of Omaha. You must bring it over our road. And if any one wishes to go to the Pacific coast, he must travel by our road or we will make no allowance for the distance he has traveled over the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad to the point of junction, but we will charge the same from the point of junction as from Omaha, without making any allowance for the travel over the Burlington and Missouri River road." It is against that "discrimination" it is proposed to make provision. I am aware of the magnitude of the undertaking in which I am engaged. The Union Pacific Railroad, with all its forces, is quite enough against which to contend, but there are other connections and considerations opposed to this legislation.

At Omaha, or at Council Bluffs, opposite it, center three other great railroads, running from there into Chicago. These also have formed a combination as against the public and for their own profit, which they do not wish disturbed, as this bill in effect proposes by the operation of a rival line south of them and the Union Pacific. The Union Pacific charges its own terms for freight and passengers. There is no way to avoid it. West of Omaha the Union Pacific fixes such rates as it pleases, and it fixes them, too, at such figures as have no parallel scarcely in the Union.
